assumption of one's own (or another's) power to exact obedience or of the right to determine what others should believe or do; often it suggests an opposition to liberal or libertarian and sometimes to anarchic or anarchistic; as, an authoritarian church; an authoritarian economic policy; an authoritarian system of education; the authoritarian type of mind. "The decline of authoritarian control and the rapid changes in our ways of living have made changes in our education imperative" (Christian Century). Dogmatic, as here compared, implies the attitude of an authoritative or authoritarian teacher or preacher and the laying down of principles or dogmas as true and beyond dispute. "Art is never dogmatic; holds no brief for itself—you may take it or you may leave it" (Galsworthy). "Now physics is, or should be, undogmatic; mathematics is, and must be, dogmatic. No mathematician is infallible; he may make mistakes; but he must not hedge. Even in this age which dislikes dogma, there is no demand for an undogmatic edition of Euclid" (Eddington). In depreciative use, dogmatic implies an assertive (sometimes an arrogant) attitude that discourages, if it does not inhibit, debate. "Mr. Raycie made no pretence to book-learning. . . . But on matters of art he was dogmatic and explicit, prepared to justify his opinions" (E. Wharton). Doctrinaire usually, but not invariably, implies a dogmatic disposition; it usually suggests an opposition to practical, for it emphasizes a disposition to be guided by one's theories or the doctrines of one's school of thought in teaching, in framing laws, or in policies or decisions, especially those affecting others. "The rationalist mind. . . is of a doctrinaire and authoritative complexion: the phrase 'must be' is ever on its lips" (W. James). "The most profound contribution to political thought in America, namely, the Federalist, was not the work of doctrinaire thinkers but of men of affairs" (Frankfurter). Oracular, with its implied reference to an ancient oracle (a priest or priestess through whom the gods or a god made a revelation), suggests the possession of hidden knowledge and the manner of one who delivers his opinions or views in cryptic phrases or with pompous dogmatism. "What really annoys him is that [anyone] . . . should take a gnomic and oracular tone in place of trying to be ingratiating, whimsical, and entertaining" (J. C. Powys). Ana. *Masterful, domineering, imperative, imperious, peremptory: despotic, tyrannical, arbitrary, autocratic, *absolute.

diction. *Language, vocabulary, phraseology, phrasing, style.

Ana. Speech, tongue, idiom, *language: enunciation, pronunciation, articulation (see corresponding verbs at PRONOUNCE).

dictionary, n. Dictionary, onomasticon, gazetteer, synonymicon, lexicon, wordbook, glossary come into comparison as denoting a work of reference which embodies an alphabetized vocabulary with definitions or explanations of each term. Dictionary is now the usual term for a book which gives not only the words that belong to a language (or in an abridged dictionary, the most important and most common words of a language) but also their meanings, their accepted spelling or spellings, their pronunciation, etymology, and the like; as, Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language. It is also the general term applied to a book that embodies an alphabetized list of names with explanatory information or that presents an alphabetized list of terms with their synonyms; as, a dictionary of proper names, formerly often called by the now learned word onomasticon; a biographical dictionary; a geographical dictionary, now commonly called a gazetteer;

a dictionary of synonyms, also, though rarely, called a synonymicon. The term is also applied to a book that lists and defines terms used in a particular field or department of knowledge; as, a chemical dictionary; a dictionary of the fine arts. Lexicon, though often used interchangeably with dictionary, especially as a name for the type (as, "In the lexicon of youth . . . there is no such word As—fall!"—Lytton), is especially applied to a dictionary of an ancient language such as Greek, Hebrew, Sanskrit, or the like, originally with definitions in Latin but now usually in the vernacular. Consequently, lexicon is often, but not invariably, the preferred designation of a dictionary that interprets words of one language in terms of another; as, a Latin-English lexicon; an English-French lexicon. Both in general and in technical use, the term often specifies a dictionary for students of any language, any science, or the like. Wordbook is often preferred when the distinctive vocabulary of a class, the people of a locality, or other restricted group is presented with definitions; as, "The Sailor's Word-Book" by W. H. Smyth. Glossary applies to a book or, more often, to an appendix to a book, containing a list of words so ancient, so unusual, so abstruse, so technical, or the like, that they need to be glossed (see gloss under ANNOTATE), or defined for the benefit of the ordinary reader; as, this collection of Burns's poems has an adequate glossary; few can read Chaucer without the aid of a glossary; a glossary of medical terms.

didder, v. *Shake, tremble, quake, dither, shimmy, totter, quiver, shiver, shudder, quaver, wobble, teeter.

Ana. Vibrate, sway, fluctuate, oscillate, waver, pendulate (see SWING).

dido. *Prank, caper, antic, monkeyshine.

differ. 1 In form differ from. Differ with (see DIFFER, 2).

Ana. Disagree, dissent (see affirmative verbs at ASSENT): diverge, deviate, depart (see SWERVE).

Ant. Concur, coincide.

2 In form differ with. Differ with, differ from are not always clearly distinguished. To express mere divergence of opinion, both differ with and differ from may be used, though in current good use differ with tends to be preferred; as, "I differ with the honorable gentleman on that point" (Brougham); "I do not rashly differ from so great a grammarian" (Cowper). When, however, to the implication of disagreement in opinion is added a hint of dispute or contention, differ with is the preferred phrase. "I have differed with the President. . . on many questions of great general interest and importance" (D. Webster). To express unlikeness between persons or things differ from alone is used; as, the twins differ from one another in appearance; "Day differs from day in respect of the importance of the public events they bring forth" (C. E. Montague); "how widely the world as known to science differs from the final analysis of material objects into electrons and protons" (Inge).

Ana. Disagree, dissent (see affirmative verbs at ASSENT): *contend, cope, battle, fight: *oppose, combat, withstand, resist.

Ant. Concur, agree.

difference. Unlikeness, *dissimilarity, divergence, distinction.

Ana. Discrepancy or discrepancy, inconsistency, inconsonance, discordance (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSONANT): variation, modification (see under CHANGE, v.): disparity, diversity (see corresponding adjectives at DIFFERENT).

Ant. Resemblance. — Con. Similarity, *likeness, similitude, analogy, affinity.

different. Different, diverse, divergent, disparate, various come into comparison only when they are used to qualify plural nouns and mean not identical or alike in kind or character. Different often implies little more than distinctness or separateness; as, four different persons told me the same story. Sometimes, however, it implies contrast or contrariness; as, they approached the subject from different points of view. Diverse is stronger, and implies marked difference and decided contrast; as, "I obtained from three cultivated Englishmen at different times three diverse pronunciations of a single word" (J. R. Lowell); "The isolation of the Church of England causes distress to all Anglicans, but the remedies suggested are very diverse" (Inge). Divergent implies a movement away from each other and usually connotes the impossibility of an ultimate meeting, combination, reconciliation, or the like; as, they took divergent paths; "he was bothered very much by divergent strands in his own intellectual composition" (H. G. Wells); "A great part of the quarrel between science and religion arises from divergent opinions... about what it [the world] will be" (Inge). Disparate implies absolute or essential difference, often as between incongruous or incompatible things or ideas; as, "two divergent, yet not wholly disparate emotions" (F. W. H. Myers); "For if men are so diverse, not less disparate are the many men who keep discordant company within each one of us" (Pater). Various (see also MANY) commonly lays stress on the number of sorts or kinds; as, "in various shapes of Parsons, Critics, Beaus" (Pope); "An exuberant energy which displayed itself in various fields" (H. Ellis).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. *Distinct, separate, several: *single, particular: various, sundry, divers (see MANY).

Ant. Identical, alike, same. — Con. *Similar, like, uniform, akin, analogous, comparable.

difficult. *Hard, arduous.

Ana. Perplexing, puzzling, mystifying (see PUZZLE): intricate, involved, complicated, *complex, knotty: *obscure, enigmatic, cryptic: exacting, *onerous, burdensome.

Ant. Simple. — Con. *Easy, facile, light, effortless, smooth: *clear, perspicuous, lucid.

difficulty. Difficulty, hardship, rigor (or rigour), vicissitude are here compared as general terms that are synonyms only when they mean something which demands effort and endurance if it is to be overcome or one's end achieved. Difficulty, the most widely applicable of these terms, applies to any condition, situation, experience, or task which presents a problem extremely hard to solve or which is seemingly beyond one's ability to suffer or surmount: the term does not imply insolubility or insurmountability or even intolerableness but it does suggest the need of skill and perseverance or patience; as, "the wise gods have put difficulty between man and everything that is worth having" (J. R. Lowell); "Ten thousand difficulties do not make one doubt, as I understand the subject; difficulty and doubt are incommensurate" (Newman); "the simplest way out of the difficulty was to do nothing and dismiss the matter as no concern of theirs" (Conrad). Hardship stresses suffering, toil, privation, or the like, that is almost beyond endurance or is extremely hard to bear: the term does not necessarily imply any effort to overcome or any patience in enduring (as, "Men to much misery and hardship born"—Milton; the hardships of life in a slum area), but in current use, it is so frequently applied to the suffering, toil, and privation encountered in an attempt to accomplish an end, that it often comes very close to difficulty in its implications; as, "The search for truth... makes men and women content to undergo hardships and to brave perils" (C. W. Eliot); "they had practically overcome the worst hardships that primitive man had to fear" (Cather). Rigor, in the sense in which it is here considered, usually applies to a hardship that is imposed upon one, sometimes by oneself as through asceticism or ambition, but more often by an austere religion, a tyrannical government or other power, a trying climate, an extremely exacting enterprise or undertaking, or the like; as, "to undergo much pain, many hardships, and other rigours" (Bp. Burnet); the rigors of an explorer's life; "A vast deal of sympathy has been lavished upon the Puritan settlers because of the rigours of their religion" (A. Repplier); the rigors of an arctic winter. Vicissitude (as here considered: for stricter sense, see CHANGE, n., 2) applies to a difficulty or hardship incident to one's life, especially as it is subjected to influences beyond one's powers of foresight or control, or to a rigor incident especially to a career or way of life one has chosen: oftentimes, the word may be intended to imply alternations of fortune, but this implication is so obscured by the context that the term actually suggests reference to something that demands effort and endurance if it is to be overcome; as, "the fierce vicissitudes of deadly combat" (Lecky); "it is the work he performed during these years, often in illness, danger, and vicissitudes, that should earn him particular gratitude from his Church" (T. S. Eliot).

Ana. *Obstacle, impediment, snag, obstruction: *predicament, dilemma, quandary, plight, scrape, fix, jam, pickle: pinch, strait, emergency, exigency, pass (see JUNCTURE).

diffident. Modest, bashful, *shy, coy.

Ana. Shrinking, flinching, blenching (see RECOIL): hesitant, reluctant (see DISINCLINED): timorous, *timid.

Ant. Confident. — Con. Assured, sure, sanguine (see CONFIDENT): self-confident, self-assured, self-possessed (see corresponding nouns at CONFIDENCE): brash, brazen, impudent, *shameless.

diffuse. Prolix, redundant, verbose, *wordy.

Ana. *Profuse, lavish, exuberant: desultory, casual, *random: copious (see PLENTIFUL): *loose, relaxed, slack, lax.

Ant. Succinct. — Con. *Concise, terse, laconic, pithy, summary: compact, *close.

dig, v. Dig, delve, spade, grub, excavate, exhume, disinter come into comparison when they mean to use a spade or similar utensil in breaking up the ground to a point much below the surface and in turning or removing the earth so broken up. Dig, the common and usual word both in literary and colloquial use, originally implied, and in some use still implies, a loosening of the earth around or under something so as to bring it to the surface; as, to dig in the ruins of Pompeii; to dig for gold; to dig up roots embedded in the earth. Delve, which is now archaic in its literal sense, more regularly implies the use of a spade (the implement) or, in its more common extended sense, of efforts comparable to the use of a spade, than does dig: it also carries a stronger connotation of laboriousness and depth of penetration and usually, but not invariably, the work of a farmer or gardener, or of one who cultivates an interest or follows a hobby; as, "When Adam delve, and Eve span, Who was then the gentleman?" (Old Proverb); "a smug and spectacled best scholar, spending... time delving among the chronicles... in the reading-room of the British Museum" (R. Macaulay). Dig and spade have taken the place of delve in its literal sense and may imply all the operations necessary to manual (as opposed to mechanical) preparation of soil for planting of any vegetables or flowers or for the harvesting of root crops; as, to dig a garden; to dig (or spade) up potatoes; to dig in (or spade in) fertilizer. In extended and figurative use, dig may imply a result comparable to that obtained by spading (as, "[The ants] dug deeper and deeper to deposit their eggs"—Goldsmith), or a bringing to the surface or out of concealment (as, to dig up a man's past), or prolonged laborious effort as in study or research (as, "Laurie 'dug' to some purpose that year, for he graduated with honor"—L. M. Alcott). Grub strictly implies a more superficial digging, such as that done in clearing ground for agricultural use or in breaking up and turning the topsoil, but in current use, it carries so strong a suggestion of laborious, dirty, and often, back-breaking work in a garden or farm that in literal use it seldom connotes actual digging and, frequently, as in extended use, not even work on the ground but some equally dirty and grueling labor; as, "Both the parlormaid and her employer...if they are fond of flowers...will grub in a garden all day...without considering the dirt involved...in the least derogatory to their dignity" (Shaw); "Grubbing among Roman remains and relics" (A. Lang). Excavate suggests making a hollow in or through something such as the ground, a mass of rock, a mountainside, by or as if by means of a spade or shovel or a machine which performs the operations of spading and shoveling; as, to excavate the ground for a foundation wall and cellar; to excavate a tomb; to excavate a tunnel; archaeologists engaged in excavating the site of an ancient city. Exhume implies a digging or excavating that has for its aim or result the removal of something buried beneath the surface of the ground; as, to exhume all the bodies buried in an old cemetery; the archaeologist exhumed a particularly fine piece of sculpture. Disinter usually implies the exhuming of that which has been buried by human hands; as, he was permitted to disinter the remains of his parents and transfer them to the new cemetery; when the suspicion that he had been murdered grew rife, the coroner ordered his body to be disinterred. Ana. Pierce, penetrate, probe, *enter.

digest, n. *Compendium, syllabus, pandect, survey, sketch, précis, aperçu.

Ana. Collection, assemblage, gathering (see under GATHER): *abridgment, conspectus, abstract, brief, synopsis, epitome.

digging or dig. In plural form diggings or digs. Chambers, quarters, lodgings, *rooms, apartment, flat, tenement.

dignity. 1 *Decorum, decency, propriety, etiquette.

Ana. *Excellence, virtue, merit, perfection: nobleness or nobility, morality, ethicalness or ethics (see corresponding adjectives at MORAL).

2 *Elegance, grace.

Ana. *Worth, value: beautifulness or beauty, loveliness, comeliness (see corresponding adjectives at BEAUTIFUL): grandness or grandeur, magnificence, stateliness, nobleness or nobility, majesticness or majesty, augustness (see corresponding adjectives at GRAND).

digress. Deviate, diverge, depart, *swerve, veer.

Ana. *Wander, stray.

digression. Digression, episode, excursus, divagation come into comparison when they denote a departure from the main course of development, especially of a narrative, a drama, an exposition, or the like. Digression applies to any deviation, especially one at the expense of unity of effect, from the main subject of a discourse; it may or may not suggest intention or design. "In this long digression which I was accidentally led into, as in all my digressions.... there is...an excellence seldom looked for...in a digression...; though...I fly off from what I am about, as far, and as often too, as any writer in Great Britain, yet I constantly take care...that my main business does not stand still in my absence" (Sterne). Episode (see also OCCURRENCE) usually, but not invariably, applies to an incidental narrative which, though separable from the main subject, arises naturally from it; sometimes an episode is definitely a purposeful digression for some end such as giving variety to the narration, heightening the illusion of reality, or elucidating a motive; thus, in Paradise Lost, Raphael's account of the war in heaven is in this sense an episode because it breaks the chronological order of the poem and reverts to events which occurred prior to those told in the first book. "Descriptive poetry...may be interspersed with dramatic episodes" (S. Alexander). Episode is used not only of a literary work but of any form of art, or of a life, in reference to something that seems apart from the main subject or course of a thing. "Delight in the virginal beauty of fresh blossoms, in the dewy green of water-meadows...is evident in numberless pictures of the earlier schools of Europe; but there these amenities of nature are but an episode" (Binyon). "Miss Dix's biographer, Dr. Tiffany, considers her war work an episode, not equal in quality to her life-work" (Dict. Amer. Biog.). Excursus applies to an avowed and usually formal digression elucidating at some length an incidental point. "This started an ethnological excursus on swineherds, and drew from Pinecoffin long tables showing the proportion per thousand of the caste in the Derajat" (Kipling). Divagation is often used in preference to digression when aimless wandering from the main course or inattentiveness to logic is implied. "Froissart's style of poetry invites the widest...liberty of divagation, of dragging in anything that really interested him" (Saintsbury).

dilapidate. *Ruin, wrack, wreck.

Ana. *Decay, disintegrate, crumble, decompose: *neglect, ignore, disregard, forget, slight, overlook.

Con. Repair, rebuild, *mend: *renew, restore, renovate, rejuvenate.

dilate. 1 *Discourse, expatiate, descant.

Ana. *Relate, recount, rehearse, recite, narrate, describe: expound, *explain: *discuss, argue.

2 *Expand, distend, swell, amplify, inflate.

Ana. Enlarge, *increase, augment: *extend, protract, prolong, lengthen: widen, broaden (see corresponding adjectives at BROAD).

Ant. Constrict: circumscribe: attenuate. — Con. *Contract, shrink, compress, condense.

dilatory. *Slow, laggard, deliberate, leisurely.

Ana. Procrastinating, delaying, dawdling, dallying, dillydallying (see DELAY): *negligent, neglectful, lax, slack, remiss.

Ant. Diligent. — Con. *Busy, assiduous, sedulous, industrious: *quick, prompt, ready.

dilemma. *Predicament, quandary, plight, scrape, fix, jam, pickle.

Ana. Perplexity, bewilderment, mystification (see corresponding verbs at PUZZLE): *difficulty, vicissitude.

dilettante. 1 *Amateur, dabbler, tyro.

Con. Artist, *expert, adept.

2 *Aesthete, connoisseur, virtuoso.

Con. *Artist, artificer, architect: *writer, composer, author: craftsman, workman (see WORKER).

diligent. Assiduous, sedulous, industrious, *busy.

Ana. Persevering, persisting or persistent (see corresponding verbs at PERSEVERE): *indefatigable, tireless, untiring, unwearied, unflagging.

Ant. Dilatory. — Con. *Slow, laggard, deliberate, leisurely: desultory, casual, happy-go-lucky (see RANDOM).

dillydally. Dally, dawdle, procrastinate, *delay, lag, loiter.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. *Trifle, toy: *play, sport: linger, tarry (see STAY).
Con. Hurry, hasten, *speed.

dilute, v. Attenuate, *thin, rarefy.

Ana. Temper, attempt, *moderate, qualify: *weaken, enfeeble: dissolve, *liquefy, deliquesce: *adulterate, sophisticate.

Ant. Condense: concentrate (in chemistry, esp. in past participial form).

diluvium. Drift, *wash, alluvium, alluvion, silt.

dim, adj. Dusk, dusky, *dark, darkling, obscure, murky, opaque, gloomy.

Ant. Bright: distinct. — Con. Brilliant, radiant, luminous, effulgent (see BRIGHT): manifest, patent, *evident, plain, clear.

dimensions. Extent, *size, area, magnitude, volume.

diminish. Reduce, *decrease, lessen, abate, dwindle.

Ana. Wane, ebb, *abate, subside: *moderate, temper, attempt: lighten, alleviate, mitigate (see RELIEVE): attenuate, extenuate (see THIN).

Con. Enlarge, augment, *increase: *extend: *intensify, enhance, heighten, aggravate.

diminutive, adj. Little, *small, wee, tiny, minute, miniature.

Con. *Large, big, great: *enormous, immense, huge, vast, colossal, mammoth.

din, n. Din, uproar, pandemonium, hullabaloo, babel, hubbub, racket agree in meaning a disturbing or confusing welter of sounds or a scene or situation marked by such a welter of sounds. Din emphasizes the pain suffered by the ears and the completely distracting effect of the noise as a whole; it now often, but not invariably, suggests prolonged and deafening clangor or insistent ear-splitting metallic sounds; as, the din of a machine shop; to escape the din of heavy traffic; the din of a New Year's Eve party. "Think you a little din can daunt mine ears? . . . Have I not heard great ordnance in the field, And heaven's artillery thunder in the skies? Have I not in a pitched battle heard Loud 'larums, neighing steeds, and trumpets' clang?" (Shak.). Uproar and pandemonium both imply tumult or wild disorder, usually in a crowd of persons, but often among wild animals or in the elements; when the reference is to men, uproar usually suggests the clamor of a multitude vociferously, sometimes riotously, protesting, arguing, defying, or the like, and pandemonium, the din produced when a group or crowd usually under discipline breaks bounds and runs riot or becomes uncontrollably boisterous; as, the suggestion threw the assemblage into an uproar; pandemonium followed the announcement of the armistice. "Draw not the sword; 't would make an uproar, Duke, You would not hear the end of" (Keats). "The modern parent . . . does not want a fictitious Sabbath calm while he is watching, succeeded by pandemonium as soon as he turns his back" (B. Russell). Hullabaloo is often interchangeable with din or uproar, especially in a construction following make (as, to make a din, an uproar, or a hullabaloo), but it seldom carries the suggestions of piercing, ear-splitting noise or of vociferation and turmoil which are respectively so strong in din and uproar. When it refers to a welter of sounds, it suggests great excitement and an interruption of peace or quiet; as, the hullabaloo made by hunters and hounds in the chase; the children are making a great hullabaloo at their party. When it refers to a situation, it suggests a storm of protest, an outburst of passion or wrath, a torrent of comment or sensational gossip, or the like; as, the project was not again brought before the public until the hullabaloo about it had died down; the lavish wedding made a great hullabaloo. Babel, with its implied reference to Genesis xi. 9, stresses the confusion of vocal sounds resulting either from their multiplicity and variety, or from differences in tongues; as, the babel of a polyglot assembly or of a busy market; unable to endure the babel of a crowded reception. Hubbub denotes the confusing mixture of sounds characteristic of activities and business; it implies incessant movement or bustle rather than turmoil; as, a sound heard above the hubbub of the city streets. "Strollers on the common could hear, at certain hours, a hubbub of voices and racing footsteps from within the boundary wall" (Shaw). Racket, like din, stresses the psychological effect of noises more than their character or origin. It implies, however, annoyance or disturbance rather than pain and distraction, and is applicable to any combination of sounds or any scene that strikes one as excessively or inordinately noisy. "We wanted quiet, not racket" (Steele). "Something like forty feet of chain and wire-rope, mixed up with a few heavy iron blocks, had crashed down from aloft on the poop with a terrifying racket" (Conrad).

Ana. Clamor, clamor, stridency, boisterousness, blatancy (see corresponding adjectives at VOCIFEROUS): clash, percussion (see IMPACT).

Ant. Quiet.

dinner. *Banquet.

dint. *Dent, indentation, indenture, nick, notch.

Con. See those at DENT.

dip, v. 1 Dip, immerse, submerge, duck, souse, dunk are here compared as meaning to plunge a person or thing into, or as into, water or other liquid. Dip, as here compared, implies a momentary or partial plunging into a liquid, or figuratively, a slight or cursory entrance into a subject; as, "The priest shall dip his finger in the blood" (Leviticus iv. 6); to dip a dress in cleansing fluid; to dip into a book. Immerse implies that the person or thing is covered by the water or other liquid, or figuratively, buried or engrossed in something; as, to immerse the persons being baptized; to immerse a dress in boiling dye for several minutes; to immerse oneself in thought; "I am at present wholly immersed in country business" (Addison). Submerge implies complete and often prolonged immersion, or a covering by water as in an inundation; as, to submerge a submarine (or, the submarine submerged); several houses were completely submerged by the flood; figuratively, even more often than literally, it suggests a being overwhelmed, or sometimes, overpowered and rendered helpless (as, "the last and most violent religious rebellion against the French Crown . . . seemed likely to submerge that monarchy"—Bello) or a sinking to the lowest state, grade, status, or the like (as, "Almost unheard of for such a girl to enter into relations with a man of that submerged class"—Mencken). Duck implies a sudden plunging (usually of a person) into water and an almost immediate withdrawal. "I say, duck her in the loch, and then we will see whether she is witch or not" (Scott). Souse adds to duck the suggestion of more prolonged immersion and often of a thorough soaking; as, the boy was soused before he was freed from his captors; to souse offenders; "a blazing caldron in which Beelzebub is sousing the damned" (Arnold). In its earliest and still current sense, souse implies steeping of meat, fish, or the like, in a pickle or tart liquid for the sake of preserving and flavoring it; as, soused mackerel. In figurative use, souse therefore often implies not only immersion but a being saturated or, in the case of liquor drinking, a becoming intoxicated; as, he came home night after night thoroughly soused; to souse oneself in a subject that interests one. Dunk, originally a dialect term in German-settled parts of the United States but now in general use, means to dip and soak something, as bread or a doughnut, or the like, in coffee, tea, or milk before eating it. In extended applications, it is equivalent to duck or immerse (cf. the name Dunkers, applied to the German Baptist Brethren, a religious denomination practicing trine immersion).

2 Dip, lade, bail (or, less correctly, bale), scoop, ladle, spoon, dish are here compared as meaning to remove a liquid, a fluid, or a friable or soft substance from a container by means of an implement, usually a vessel with a handle. In this sense they are often followed by up or out. Dip suggests literally or figuratively the process of plunging the utensil (usually called a dipper) into the substance and lifting it out full or nearly full; it is the preferred word when the labor involved is to be implied or the action is described; as, to dip water from a boiler; to dip out the milk from a can; to dip into one's memory for facts one has nearly forgotten. Lade usually adds to dip the suggestion of emptying a container or removing its contents; it is used chiefly in industry or in laborious operations; as, having no pump, they were compelled to lade out the water from the well; to lade ale wort into the tun tub; to lade out smelted silver into molds for casting. Bail is used chiefly in reference to boats in which water has accumulated or is accumulating; like lade, it implies emptying or an attempt to empty, but it suggests the use of a vessel (sometimes any available vessel) such as a pail, a bucket (formerly called a bail), a basin, or the like; as, to bail the water out of a rowboat. "By the help of a small bucket and our hats we bailed her [a boat] out" (R. H. Dana, jr.). Scoop, ladle, spoon throw the emphasis on the kind of implement employed in an operation consisting usually of dipping, conveying, and pouring. Scoop suggests a shovellike implement, often a small kitchen utensil for dipping out flour, sugar, or the like, or for gouging out pieces of a soft substance, such as cheese, and frequently for a much larger and heavier implement used in digging or excavating operations, or in the removal of a heap of things from one place to another; as, to scoop out three cups of sugar; to scoop up the catch of fish into barrels. Ladle implies the use of a ladle, or long-handled implement with a bowl-shaped end and often a pouring lip; it is especially used of substances which are liable to be spilled; as, to ladle soup; to ladle out the punch; to ladle out the melted tar. The term sometimes implies the use of a mechanical device for conveying liquid from one container from which it has been dipped to another into which it is poured. Spoon implies the use of a spoon of any size, but especially a tablespoon, when the service of food to another's plate is also implied; as, the girl who spoons up vegetables in the cafeteria; to spoon out food to the baby. Dish implies transference to the individual plate or dish of the portion of food that is ladled or spooned or otherwise lifted; as, to dish out the vegetables; to dish up the ice cream.

diplomatic. Politic, smooth, bland, *suave, urbane.

Ana. Astute, *shrewd: courteous, courtly, polite (see CIVIL): artful, wily, crafty (see SLV): tactful, poised (see corresponding nouns at TACT).

dipsomaniac. Alcoholic, inebriate, *drunkard, sot, soak, toper, tosspot, tippler.

direct, v. 1 Direct, address, devote, apply are synonymous when used reflexively meaning to turn or bend one's attention, one's energies, or the like, to something. They are less closely related but still often synonymous in other constructions when they mean to turn, bend, or point (as one's attention, one's thoughts, one's efforts) to a certain object or objective. Between direct and address there is often very little perceptible difference. One directs or addresses oneself to a task, or to one's work, or to the study of a problem. One directs or addresses one's attention to a certain thing, one's remarks to a given person, one's book to a special type of reader. Also, one directs or addresses a letter when one writes on the envelope the name of the recipient and the place of delivery. In general, however, modern usage shows a tendency to prefer direct when an intent or aim is implied or indicated and address when an appeal to the mind or feelings is expressed or understood; as, the Democratic members directed their energies to the defeat of the measure; a demagogue addresses his arguments to the least intelligent in his audience. "Mrs. Yeobright...sat by the breakfast-table...her eyes listlessly directed towards the open door" (Hardy). "Those to whom it [propaganda] is addressed" (A. Huxley). Devote often adds to direct and address the implication of persistence. One devotes oneself to a task, a work, the study of a problem, or one devotes one's energies to the prosecution of a work, when one resolutely continues at the task, work, etc., to which one has directed or addressed oneself. Quite as often, and in distinction from the other words, devote implies dedication or setting apart for a certain end or use; as, to devote oneself to the public good; to devote one's leisure to charity. "Small farms devoted to fruit and berry raising" (S. Anderson). Apply distinctively suggests concentration. One applies oneself to a task, to one's work, or the like, when one gives one's entire attention to that to which one has directed or addressed oneself. In modern English idiom, apply oneself and apply one's mind often equal "concentrate" or "give one's entire attention"; as, he learned early to apply himself; an anxious person cannot apply his mind to the task in hand. Sometimes apply comes very close to direct and address, with, however, the additional implication of employment. "That they may sample several kinds of knowledge... and have a chance to determine wisely in what direction their own individual mental powers can be best applied" (C. W. Eliot).

Ana. Turn, bend (see CURVE): *set, fix, settle: endeavor, strive, try, *attempt.

Con. Divert, deflect, *turn: digress, diverge, deviate, *swerve.

2 Direct, aim, point, level, train, lay are synonyms only when they mean to turn something toward its appointed or intended mark or goal. One directs something or someone to its (or his) destination or objective when one heads it (or him) toward the proper course or guides it (or him) along that course; as, to direct one's eyes to the door; to direct a stranger to the railroad station; to direct a searchlight to the opposite shore. "'Tis Heav'n each Passion sends, And diff'rent men directs to diff'rent ends" (Pope). One aims a weapon or something used as a weapon when one by careful calculation or estimation of counterinfluences turns it toward the exact spot or the object one designs to hit; as, to aim a pistol at a burglar; to aim a blow at a man's stomach; to aim a law at tax evaders. One points something at (sometimes to) a person or thing when one turns its point or tip to the spot one wishes to indicate or to penetrate, puncture, or the like; as, to point one's finger at one's choice; to point a sword at an opponent's breast; to point a boat to shore; she felt all eyes were pointed at her. One levels a weapon (esp. a spear, a lance, a rifle, etc.) or something which serves as a weapon at (or against) something when one brings it to the position or line (often a horizontal position or line) where it will do its most deadly or most effective work; as, to level a spear at a foe; to level a rifle at a deer; to level a charge against the mine owners. "Like an arrow shot From a well-experienc'd archer hits the mark His eye doth level at" (Shak.). One trains or lays a gun, a cannon, or the like, when one sets it in position and pointed directly at its mark; as, when the smoke screen dissipated, the cruiser discovered the enemy's cannon trained on it; the distinguished visitors could go nowhere without finding a battery of cameras trained upon them; to lay a gun for a shot.

Ana. Steer, pilot, *guide, lead, engineer.

Ant. Misdirect.

3 Manage, control, *conduct.

Ana. *Govern, rule: lead, *guide: administer, *execute.

4 *Command, order, bid, enjoin, instruct, charge.

Ana. *Prescribe, assign, define.

direct, adj. Direct, immediate, as applied to relations and as meaning marked by the absence of interruption (as between the cause and the effect, the source and the issue, the beginning and the end), though frequently used with little distinction, often retain their etymological connotations. Direct suggests unbroken connection between one and the other or a straight bearing of one upon the other; immediate suggests the absence of any intervening medium or influence; thus, direct knowledge is knowledge gained firsthand, but immediate knowledge is that attained by intuition or insight rather than through inference from facts or premises; direct contact stresses the bearing of one thing upon the other, but immediate contact implies the coherence or cohesion of one and the other; direct descent implies descent in a straight line from an ancestor; one's immediate family is composed of those who are the nearest in relation only, or one's father, mother, brothers, and sisters; a direct cause leads straight to its effect, but an immediate cause (which may or may not be the direct cause) is the one which serves as the last link in a chain of causes and brings about the result.

directly. Directly, immediately, instantly, instantaneously, forthwith, straightway (or straightaway), right away, at once, anon come into comparison when they mean without delay or loss of time. Directly, like immediately, implies the absence of any intervening time; as, Do it directly, immediately. In modern usage, however, directly (cf. the similar development of presently) has acquired the sense of "soon, before long"; as, I am coming directly. Instantly retains the implication of absolutely immediate sequence; as, answer me instantly; the report followed instantly upon the flash. Instantaneously implies the imperceptibility of the interval of time between the beginning and end of an action or process; as, light passes instantaneously through the earth's atmosphere; "Clare had instantaneously consented to accept Mr. John Todhunter as lord of her days" (Meredith). Forthwith implies less quickness than instantly, but nevertheless it connotes dispatch. "Immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith" (Acts ix. 18). Straightway (or the less common straightaway, both now rather literary or archaic) and the American colloquialism right away differ little from directly or immediately; as, "And straightway the damsel arose, and walked" (Mark v. 42); come right away. At once, like instantly, suggests not the slightest loss of time; as, come to me at once. Anon is now obsolete or archaic for at once; as, "Tel me anon, withouten wordes mo" (Chaucer).

dirigible. Airship, zeppelin, *aerostat, balloon, blimp. dirty, adj. Dirty, filthy, foul, naughty, squalid agree in meaning conspicuously unclean or impure. Dirty is the general term for that which is sullied or defiled with dirt of any kind; as, dirty hands; dirty linen; dirty streets. Filthy is a much stronger term than dirty in its suggestion of offensiveness; it usually also suggests dirt which besmears or clutters up rather than that which merely soils; as, his clothes are filthy; a filthy hovel; a filthy street. Foul carries a still stronger implication of revolting offensiveness; etymologically, it implies an accumulation of that which is rotten, putrid, or stinking; as, a foul sewer; a foul dungeon; a foul pond. In somewhat extended use, it comes nearer to loathsome or disgusting; as, a foul smell; a foul sight. Nasty, which originally was not clearly distinguishable from foul, now applies chiefly to that which is repugnant to a person who is fastidious about cleanliness, sweetness, freshness of appearance, or the like; as, a nasty ship; a nasty odor; the care of pigs is nasty work. In British colloquial usage nasty has been softened to a mere synonym for "objectionable, disagreeable" (as, nasty weather; a nasty fall; a nasty temper; to be nasty to someone); in the United States it was formerly tabooed in polite speech in the sense of foul, and is now used with increasing frequency in its British sense. Squalid adds to the idea of dirtiness or filth that of extreme slovenliness or neglect; as, squalid poverty; "The East, so squalid and splendid, so pestilent and so poetic" (E. Wharton).

In their extended use, all of these terms may imply moral uncleanness or baseness, or obscenity. Dirty, however, stresses meanness or despicability (as, "The creature's at his dirty work again"—Pope); filthy and foul imply disgusting obscenity, filthy stressing the presence of obscenity, and foul, its hateful ugliness (as, filthy talk; a foul jest); nasty implies extreme offensiveness or unpleasantness (as, a nasty mind; "he hated it as a gentleman hates to hear a nasty story"—E. E. Hale); squalid implies sordidness as well as baseness (as, "the squalid scenes and situations through which Thackeray portrays the malign motives and unclean soul of Becky Sharp"—C. W. Eliot). The first four terms also apply to weather, meaning the opposite of that which is clear, thereby implying rainy, snowy, stormy, or foggy weather. Otherwise, they are distinguishable only by the degree in which they express disgust or distaste.

Ant. Clean.

disability. *Inability.

disable. Cripple, undermine, *weaken, enfeeble, debilitate, sap.

Ana. *Injure, damage, harm, hurt, impair, mar, spoil:

*maim, mutilate, mangle, batter: *ruin, wreck, wrack.

Ant. Rehabilitate (a disabled person).

disaffect. Alienate, *strange, wean.

Ana. Upset, agitate, *discompose, disquiet, disturb: sever, sunder, divorce (see SEPARATE).

Ant. Win (men to a cause, allegiance, etc.).

disapprove. Disapprove, deprecate agree in meaning to feel or to express an objection to or condemnation of a person or thing. Disapprove implies an attitude of dislike or distaste on any good grounds (social, ethical, intellectual, or the like) and an unwillingness to accept or to praise; the word may or may not, however, connote rejection or the expression of condemnation. "Gard loved his sister, but there were times when he wished for a way of making her understand how thoroughly he disapproved of her" (M. Austin). "[D. H.] Lawrence disapproved of too much knowledge, on the score that it diminished men's sense of wonder" (A. Huxley). Deprecate, as compared with disapprove, stresses the implication of regret, frequently profound, occasionally diffident or apologetic; as, "Shaping the plays to modern taste by the very excisions which scholars will most deprecate" (FitzGerald); "Wallace earnestly deprecates the modern tendency to disparage reason" (Inge); "There is nothing I more deprecate than the use of the Fourteenth Amendment...to prevent the making of social experiments" (Justice Holmes).

Ana. Reprehend, reprobate, censure, *criticize: *decry, disparage.

Ant. Approve. — Con. *Commend, recommend, applaud, compliment: endorse, sanction (see APPROVE).

disarming. Disarming, ingratiating, insinuating, insinuating come into comparison as meaning winning or designed to win another's favor or interest in spite of his disinclination or indifference. Disarming usually implies actual or potential anger, hostility, or opposition in the person to be won, and some quality such as innocence, candor, humility, or the like, in the person who wins, that allays or prevents irritation; as, though his words were critical, his smile was disarming. "I have brought Richard's wife, Sir," he said with a pleased, perfectly uncalculating, countenance, that was disarming" (Meredith). Ingratiating carries a stronger implication of design than disarming; it often suggests a sedulous, sometimes even a servile or fawning, attempt to please or to win favor or attention; as, "What really annoys him is that any...heretic should take a gnomish and oracular tone in place of trying to be ingratiating, whimsical, and entertaining" (J. C. Powys); "her manner is quiet and ingratiating and a little too agreeable; she speaks a little too gently" (G. Bottomley). Insinuating and insinuating distinctly imply subtlety and suavity in winning favor or confidence; they often, however, carry a strong implication of artfulness, insinuating, in particular, sometimes strongly suggesting williness in flattery. "I cannot flatter and speak fair, Smile in men's faces... But thus... simple truth must be abused By silken, sly, insinuating Jacks" (Shak.). "Englishmen of honourable name, distinguished appearance, and insinuating address" (Macaulay). "Craftily and insinuatingly introduced by the subtlety of Satan" (Evelyn).

Ana. Mollifying, conciliating, propitiating, placating, appeasing, pacifying (see PACIFY).

Con. Irritating, nettling, exasperating, provoking or provocative (see corresponding verbs at IRRITATE): infuriating, maddening, enraging (see ANGER, v.).

disarrange. Derange, disorganize, *disorder, unsettle, disturb.

Ana. *Misplace, mislay: displace, *replace: upset, *overturn.

Ant. Arrange. — Con. *Order, systematize, methodize.

disarray. Disorder, chaos, *confusion, jumble, clutter, pie, snarl, muddle.

Con. *Method, system: ordering or order, arrangement, marshaling, organization (see corresponding verbs at ORDER).

disaster. Disaster, calamity, catastrophe, cataclysm come into comparison when they denote an event or situation that is regarded as a terrible misfortune. A disaster is an unforeseen mischance or misadventure (such as a shipwreck, a fatal railroad accident, the failure of a great enterprise) which happens, either through culpable lack of foresight or through adverse external agency, and brings with it destruction, as of life and property, or ruin, as of projects, careers, great hopes, and the like. Calamity is a grievous misfortune, particularly one which involves a great or far-reaching personal or, especially, public loss, or which produces profound, often widespread, distress; as, the rout at Bull Run was a disaster for the North; the assassination of President Lincoln, a calamity; the wreck of the "Don Juan" was a disaster; as involving the loss of Shelley, it was a calamity. "We have heard of his decision.... It is a disaster—for me a calamity" (Galsworthy). Catastrophe (properly a denouement of any sort) is here compared in the sense of a disastrous conclusion; in strict use, it emphasizes the idea of finality; as, the captain's folly hastened the catastrophe. "What had become of them [the inhabitants of a deserted village]? What catastrophe had overwhelmed them?" (Cather). Cataclysm (etymologically a deluge, hence, in geology, any violent convulsion involving profound geological changes) is often used figuratively, especially of an event or situation that brings with it an overwhelming of the old order or a violent social or political upheaval. "In the general upheaval of doctrine... during the Reformation cataclysm" (J. H. Blunt). "A thought so imperishably phrased that it sums up not only the cataclysm of a world, but also the stoic and indomitable temper that endures it" (Loves). Ana. Mishap, *accident, casualty: adversity, *misfortune, mischance.

disbar. Shut out, eliminate, rule out, suspend, debar, *exclude, blackball.

disbelief. *Unbelief, incredulity.

Ana. Atheism, deism (cf. nouns at ATHEIST): skepticism, agnosticism (see under SKEPTIC): rejection, repudiation, spurning (see corresponding verbs at DECLINE).

Ant. Belief. — Con. Faith, credence, credit (see BELIEF).

discard, v. Discard, cast, shed, molt, exuviate, slough, scrap, junk are synonymous verbs when they mean to get rid of as of no further use, value, or service. Discard literally implies the getting rid of a card or cards from one's hand in any of several games of cards, usually because they are worthless or can be replaced by better cards: in its more common extended sense, it implies a getting rid of something which one can no longer use to advantage or which has become a burden, an annoyance, an interference, or the like; as, "he sorted and re-sorted his cargo, always finding a more necessary article for which a less necessary had to be discarded" (Cather); "modern research, which discards obsolete hypotheses without scruple or sentiment" (Inge); "in portrait-painting, where a painter discards many trivial points of exactness, in order to heighten the truth of a few fundamentals" (C. E. Montague). Cast (as here considered: see also THROW) may imply a seasonal process such as the throwing off of skin by a reptile or, now less often, the loss of hair or teeth by an animal or of leaves by a tree (as, "Creatures that cast their skin are, the snake, the viper"—Bacon), but, especially when followed by off, away, or out, it more frequently implies a discarding, a rejection, a discharging, a repudiation, or the like (as, cast off clothes; "the state... Cannot with safety cast him"—Shak.; "His wife was casting him off, half regretfully, but relentlessly"—D. H. Lawrence). Shed is now the ordinary, general term for the seasonal or periodic casting of skin, hair, leaves, and the like (as, deciduous trees shed their leaves every autumn; male deer shed their antlers annually; it is warm enough to shed one's overcoat). The term is also used to imply a throwing off or discarding of anything that is a burden to carry, that represents a past stage in one's development, or the like; as, "statesmen may try to shed their responsibility by treating the situation as a natural phenomenon" (J. A. Hobson); "Jane... was acquiring new subtleties, complexities, and comprehensions, and shedding crudities" (R. Macaulay). Molt is the specific term for the periodic shedding of feathers, skin, shells, hair, and horns by various animals such as birds, reptiles, crustaceans, and stags, and the growth of new feathers, shells, etc.: in general use, however, it more often suggests a process of a change in plumage including the shedding of feathers and their renewal; as, "The eagle when he moults is sickly" (Carlyle); while hens are molting they do not lay eggs. In an extended sense, molt, even more often than shed, implies change, flux, or transition; as, "England is moulting. Opinions... are... in a state of flux" (G. Smith). Exuviate (a technical term), like molt, may be used generally of shedding any covering, but commonly it implies the casting off of a shell; as, "The young crayfish exuviate two or three times in the course of the first year" (T. H. Huxley). Slough implies the shedding of skin, such as that periodically shed by a snake or other reptile or, especially in intransitive use, such as that which forms on the surface of a sore or wound; as, the snake often sloughs its skin in mid-September; the scab is sloughing off from the sore. The term is also common in extended use in the sense of to discard or throw off that which has become objectionable, burdensome, or the like; as, to slough a bad habit; "This talented author has sloughed off most of her more irritating sentimentalities" (Times Lit. Sup.). The last two words, scrap and junk, have literal reference to the throwing away of fragments, parts, or pieces that are useless to the owner or can no longer be used by him. Scrap suggests a discarding as rubbish or refuse, but it may carry an implication of some use to another, such as a processor or a dealer in parts or accessories; as, to scrap out-of-date machinery (cf. scrap iron); to scrap a plan as impractical; all the old ideas of combat had to be scrapped; "The English language that Shakespeare was born to had used up and scrapped a good deal of the English of Chaucer" (C. E. Montague). Junk, a slang term, differs little from scrap except in stressing a throwing away and in carrying little implication of value to a second-hand dealer or to a processor of waste; as, to junk all their old furniture before moving into their new home.

Ana. *Abandon, forsake, desert: reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE, v.): dismiss, *eject, oust.

Con. *Adopt, embrace, espouse: utilize, employ, *use; retain, *keep, hold back.

discern. Perceive, descry, observe, notice, remark, note, espy, behold, *see, view, survey, contemplate.

Ana. *Discover, ascertain: divine, apprehend, anticipate, *foresee: pierce, penetrate, probe (see ENTER).

discernment. Discernment, discrimination, perception, penetration, insight, acumen, divination, clairvoyance are comparable when they denote keen intellectual vision. All imply power to see below the surface and to understand that which is not evident to the average mind. Discernment stresses accuracy, as in reading character or motives or in appreciation of art. "She [Marie de Médicis] had not had the discernment to discover the calibre of this young favourite" (Belloc). Discrimination emphasizes the power to distinguish and select the excellent, the appropriate, the true. "There was a time when schools attempted . . . to cultivate discrimination and to furnish the material on which selection can be founded" (Grandgent). Perception implies quick discernment and delicate feeling. "[He] was of a temperament to feel keenly the presence of subtleties; a man of clumsier perceptions would not have felt as he did" (G. Eliot). Penetration implies a searching mind and power to enter deeply into something beyond the reach of the senses. "It did not require any great penetration to discover that what they wished was that their letters should be as kind as was consistent with proper maidenly pride" (De Quincey). Insight emphasizes depth, or understanding sympathy, of discernment. "You have lived long, and got much experience, but not insight—not that inner vision that sees further than the eyes" (Hudson). Acumen suggests characteristic penetration and keenness and soundness of judgment. "A paradox which your natural acumen, sharpened by habits of logical attention, will enable you to reconcile in a moment" (Cowper). Divination is instinctive insight; clairvoyance, preternaturally clear or acute perception, esp. of what is not ordinarily discernible. "By some secret divination . . . she guessed all his wants, and supplied them" (Carlyle).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

"With the clairvoyance of a genuine love, she had pierced the mystery that had so long embarrassed Frank" (Stevenson).

Ana. Intuition, understanding, *reason: perspicaciousness or perspicacity, sagaciousness or sagacity, shrewdness, astuteness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD).

Con. Stupidity, dullness, density, crassness (see corresponding adjectives at STUPID): blindness (see corresponding adjective BLIND).

discharge, v. 1 *Free, release, liberate, deliver, emancipate, manumit, enfranchise, enfranchise.

Ana. *Eject, expel, oust, dismiss: eliminate, *exclude.

2 *Dismiss, cashier, sack, fire, bounce, drop.

Ana. Displace, supplant, supersede, *replace.

3 *Perform, execute, accomplish, achieve, effect, fulfill.

Ana. Finish, complete, *close, end, terminate.

disciple. 1 Pupil, *scholar, student.

2 Adherent, *follower, henchman, satellite, sectary, partisan.

Ana. Votary, devotee (see ADDICT, n.): *enthusiast, zealot, fanatic.

3 Disciple, apostle, evangelist come into comparison when they denote one of the followers and close associates of Jesus in his lifetime. Disciple, the most comprehensive term, may be applied to anyone who comes under this description. In actual use, however, the term is far more restricted in its reference, for it commonly designates any one of those persons chosen by Jesus to assist him in his labors of preaching and converting, such as one of twelve (also called an apostle) or one of seventy (Luke x. 1, A.V.) or seventy-two (Luke x. 1, D.V.). When disciple is used in distinction from apostle, it commonly refers to one of the latter group. Apostle strictly designates one of the twelve who were the closest associates of Jesus, who were commissioned by him to go and to preach to all nations, on whom the Holy Ghost descended after his ascension (Acts ii), and who carried on his work after his death. In this strict sense, the term is applied not only to one of the original twelve, but also to Matthias, who was chosen after the defection of Judas, and to Paul, who was always regarded as the equal of the twelve in office and dignity. An evangelist (as here compared) is one of the four writers of the gospels included in the New Testament (Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John). Of these, Matthew and John are commonly identified as the apostles of the same name.

discipline, v. 1 Train, educate, *teach, instruct, school.

Ana. Lead, *guide: control, manage, direct, *conduct: drill, exercise, *practice.

2 *Punish, chastise, castigate, chasten, correct.

Ana. Subdue, overcome, reduce, subjugate (see CONQUER): *restrain, curb, bridle, check, snaffle, inhibit.

disclose. *Reveal, divulge, tell, discover, betray, bewray.

Ana. Confess, admit, own, *acknowledge, avow: *declare, proclaim, announce, publish, broadcast, advertise.

Con. Conceal, *hide: cloak, mask, dissemble, *disguise.

discol, discoidal. *Round, circular, annular, spherical, globular, orbicular.

discomfit. Disconcert, *embarrass, faze, abash, rattle.

Ana. *Annoy, vex, irk, bother: perturb, *discompose, agitate, upset, disturb: check, *arrest, interrupt.

discommode. Incommode, *inconvenience, trouble, molest.

Ana. Disturb, perturb, upset, fluster, flurry, *discompose: vex, irk, bother (see ANNOY).

discompose. Discompose, disquiet, disturb, perturb, agitate, upset, fluster, flurry are synonymous when they mean to excite one so as to destroy one's capacity for clear or collected thought or prompt action. Discompose is sometimes only slightly more suggestive of mental confusion than disconcert or discomfit; usually, however, it implies greater emotional stress and an actual loss of self-control or self-confidence. "He was still discomposed by the girl's bitter and sudden retort. It had cast a gloom over him" (Joyce). Disquiet stresses the loss, not of composure, but of something far deeper, such as one's sense of security or of well-being, or one's peace of mind. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me?" (Psalms xlii. 11). "He was indubitably not happy at bottom, restless and disquieted, his disquietude sometimes amounting to agony" (Arnold). Disturb, unlike the preceding words, carries no implication of a loss of one's balance or of an excess of emotion; usually it implies marked interference with one's mental processes that is caused by worry, perplexity, disappointment, interruption, or the like. "Constance and Amy were profoundly disturbed by the prospective dissolution of a bond which dated from the seventies" (Bennett). "Nothing is more disturbing than the upsetting of a preconceived idea" (Conrad). Perturb implies deep disturbance and unsettlement of mind; it usually connotes a cause for disquietude or alarm. "In this perturbed state of mind, with thoughts that could rest on nothing, she walked on" (Austen). Agitate emphasizes the loss of calmness and self-control and implies obvious signs of nervous or emotional excitement. It does not, however, always suggest distress of mind or a cause of worry. "Miss Clara was so agitated that she was incoherent" (DeLand). "Growing more and more irritated, more and more agitated" (V. Woolf). "[She] burst into tears. For it was a happiness that agitated rather than soothed her" (S. M. Crothers). Upset, like agitate, implies a nervous reaction, but it usually presupposes a cause that brings one disappointment, or distress, or sorrow. "They wouldn't have believed they could be so upset by a hurt woodpecker" (Cather). Fluster, in its earlier sense and still in occasional use, carries a suggestion of the excitement and confusion induced by drinking intoxicants (as, "flustered with new wine"—Tennyson) but in current use it commonly suggests the agitation, bewilderment, and sometimes fright, induced by sudden, and often unexpected, demands, commands, needs, or the like. "The aged housekeeper was no less flustered and hurried in obeying the numerous... commands of her mistress" (Scott). "Scared with threats of jail and halter... that fluster'd his poor... wits" (Tennyson). Flurry suggests the excitement, commotion, and confusion induced by great haste or alarm; as, they reached the station, hot and flurried, just as the train pulled out; "Thoughts, with their attendant visions, which... flurried her too much to leave her any power of observation" (Austen).

Ana. Discomfit, disconcert, rattle, faze, *embarrass: vex, irk, bother, *annoy: *worry, harass, plague, pester. Con. Appease, *pacify, conciliate, mollify, placate, propitiate.

disconcert. Rattle, faze, discomfit, *embarrass, abash. Ana. Bewilder, nonplus, perplex, *puzzle: *discompose, fluster, flurry, disturb, perturb.

discontinue. Desist, cease, *stop, quit.

Ana. Suspend, intermit, stay (see DEFER): *arrest, check, interrupt.

Anf. Continue.

or condition. Discord implies not only a want of harmony or of concord between persons or between things but also, usually, a positive clashing which manifests itself in personal relations by quarreling, factiousness, antagonism, and the like, in relations between sounds by a resulting dissonance or cacophony, and in relations between other things that are incongruous or incompatible by creating unpleasant impressions or mental disturbance. "They were firm and understanding friends. I know of but one approach to discord in their relations" (A. Repplier). "In this state of enlightenment there is no more discord between the will, the intellect, and the feelings, and the objects of our reverence" (Inge). "The seeker after truth... must disclaim responsibility for the way in which his discoveries fit into the general scheme of things. For the moment they may seem to produce discord rather than harmony" (S. M. Crothers). Strife throws the emphasis on a struggle for superiority rather than on the incongruity or incompatibility of the persons or things that disagree: commonly, it applies to relations between persons, but when used in reference to things, it is nearly always figurative. Also, the term may imply any of widely different motives for the struggle, such as rivalry, emulation, difference in opinion, disagreement, deep antagonism, or violent hostility; as, "domestic fury and fierce civil strife" (Shak.); "Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife Among themselves" (Milton); "I strove with none, for none was worth my strife" (Landor); "a face in which a strange strife of wishes, for and against, was apparent" (Hardy); "The crowd swells, Laughing and pushing toward the quays in friendly strife" (Amy Lowell). Conflict (as here considered: see also CONTEST) implies a clashing and a struggle, but it stresses not the aim or end but the process, usually connoting a series of ups and downs, or the uncertainty of the outcome, or the trials, difficulties, or torments it involves. In this sense the term may apply to battles, wars, etc., but usually it applies to a mental, moral, or spiritual state of a person or group of persons, or to its outward manifestations; as, "pale With conflict of contending hopes and fears" (Cowper). "Who, if he be called upon to face Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined Great issues, good or bad for human kind... through the heat of conflict, keeps the law In calmness made" (Wordsworth). "No more for him [Lincoln] life's stormy conflicts" (Whitman). The term is also used in a milder sense to imply an incompatibility between, or the impossibility of reconciling, two things which come together, as at the same time or upon the one person; as, a conflict of engagements; a conflict of duties. Contention may be, but now seldom is, used in place of strife in any of the senses of the latter word: in current good English, following scriptural use it applies chiefly to strife that manifests itself in quarreling, disputing, controversy, and the like: it may even be applied to a condition of affairs marked by altercations or brawls. "Cast out the scorner, and contention shall go out; yea, strife and reproach shall cease" (Proverbs xxii. 10). "Let the long contention cease! Geese are swans, and swans are geese. Let them have it how they will" (Arnold). Dissension may imply discord or strife between persons or parties, but it lays greater stress on a breach between those persons or parties than do any of the preceding words; thus, to say that there is dissension in a church or political party is to imply that it is broken up into contentious or discordant factions. "France, torn by religious dissensions, was never a formidable opponent" (Macaulay). "He [Richelieu] left the seeds of philosophic dissension vigorous in French soil" (Belloc). Variance usually implies a clash between persons or things owing to a difference in opinion, character, nature, or the like, that makes for discord, conflict, or strife. The term also often suggests apparent or actual incompatibility or impossibility of reconciliation; as, "to remain at variance with his wife seemed to him... almost a disaster" (Conrad); "ascertained facts, with which religious tradition is often at variance" (Inge); "religious doubters who vaguely feel that their faith is at variance with science" (H. Ellis).

discordance. Dissonance (see under DISSONANT).

discordant. 1 *Inconsonant, incongruous, uncongenial, unsympathetic, incompatible, inconsistent, discrepant.

Con. *Consonant, congruous, congenial, sympathetic, compatible: harmonizing or harmonious, according or accordant, agreeing (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

2 *Dissonant.

discount. *Deduction, rebate, abatement.

discourse, v. Discourse, expatiate, dilate, descant come into comparison as meaning to talk (sometimes write) more or less formally and at length upon a subject. Discourse frequently implies the manner or attitude of the lecturer, the monologist, the preacher, or the like; it often suggests detailed or logical and sometimes profound, witty, or brilliant discussion; as, "Jonson is a real figure—our imagination plays about him discouraging at the Mermaid, or laying down the law to Drummond of Hawthornden" (T. S. Eliot); "We talk in the bosom of our family in a way different from that in which we discourse on state occasions" (Lowes). Expatriate (etymologically, to spread out) implies ranging without restraint or, sometimes, wandering at will over a subject; it connotes more copiousness than discourse and often, therefore, carries a hint of long-windedness; as, "We will expatriate freely over the wide and varied field before us" (Landor); "the promoter of the raffle... was expatiating upon the value of the fabric as material for a summer dress" (Hardy). Dilate implies a discoursing that enlarges the possibilities of a subject, as by dwelling on each small detail; as, "She proceeded to dilate upon the perfections of Miss Nickleby" (Dickens); "those joys on which Stevenson dilates in that famous little essay in 'Virginibus Puerisque'" (Quiller-Couch). Descant (originally, a melody or counterpoint sung above the plain song of the tenor, which was the first attempt at part music) stresses free comment, but it often also connotes delight or pleasure in this free expression of one's opinions, observations, or the like; as, "To praise his stable, and descant upon his claret and cookery" (Goldsmith); "he descanted to his heart's content on his favorite topic of the [prize] ring" (Shaw).

Ana. *Discuss, argue, dispute: converse, talk, *speak: lecture, harangue, orate, sermonize (see corresponding nouns at SPEECH).

discourteous. Impolite, uncivil, ungracious, *rude, ill-mannered.

Ana. Brusque, curt, crusty, gruff, blunt (see BLUFF): boorish, churlish (see under BOOR).

Ant. Courteous. — Con. *Civil, polite, courtly, gallant, chivalrous.

discover. 1 *Reveal, disclose, divulge, betray, bewray. Ana. Impart, *communicate: *declare, announce, publish, advertise, proclaim.

2 Discover, ascertain, determine, unearth, learn come into comparison when they mean to find out something which was not previously known to one. Discover may presuppose investigation or exploration: on the other hand, it may presuppose accident. But it always implies that the thing existed, either actually or potentially, in fact or in principle, but had not been hitherto seen or known, or brought into view, action, use, or actual existence; as, to discover an island, a planet, electricity, a new field for industry; to discover a new writer, the true character of a friend, the uses of a weed; to discover the laws of heredity, the process of refining gold. "Those rules of old discovered, not devis'd" (Pope). Ascertain seldom, if ever, implies accidental discovery: it usually presupposes an awareness of one's ignorance or uncertainty, and conscious efforts, such as study, investigation, observation, and experiment, directed to the end of finding the truth or of discovering the facts. "Old paintings were compared to ascertain the dresses of the period" (Shaw). "Scientific experiment has ascertained how many trials are needed by a rat [in finding his way through a maze]" (Grandgent). Determine (as here compared: see also DECIDE) differs from ascertain only in its greater emphasis upon the intent to establish the facts or the truth or to decide a dispute or controversy. Its use is chiefly, but not exclusively, legal and scientific; as, experts were called to determine the presence or absence of poison in the vital organs; if the site of his birthplace can be determined, the memorial will be erected there; to determine the local reaction when ragweed pollen is injected beneath the skin. Unearth, which literally means to exhume, is more often used in its figurative sense of to bring to light or out into the open something that has been hidden, forgotten, lost, or is exceedingly difficult to trace. Frequently it also suggests intensive or prolonged investigation preceding discovery; as, to unearth old records; to unearth the evidence necessary for a conviction. Learn, in this sense as well as in its more usual meaning, implies acquirement of knowledge; as here compared, it commonly suggests little or no effort on the part of the one who discovers; as, it was only today that I learned his name. "Judy learned that the ayah must be left behind" (Kipling). "They have not yet even learned that 'science' is not the accumulation of knowledge... but the active organization of knowledge" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Discern, observe, perceive, espy (see SEE).

3 *Invent, create.

discreet. Prudent, forethoughted, foresighted, provident. See under PRUDENCE.

Ana. *Cautious, circumspect, wary: politic, diplomatic (see SUAVE).

Ant. Indiscreet. — Con. Rash, reckless, temerarious, foolhardy (see ADVENTUROUS): foolish, fatuous, asinine, *simple.

Ana. Wisdom, judgment, *sense: subtlety, logicalness or logic (see corresponding adjectives at LOGICAL).

Con. Crassness, density, dullness, stupidity (see corresponding adjectives at STUPID).

discuss. Discuss, argue, debate, dispute, agitate agree in meaning to discourse about something in order to arrive at the truth or to convince others. Discuss implies an attempt to sift or examine, especially by presenting considerations pro and con; it often suggests an interchange of opinion for the sake of clarifying issues and testing the strength of each side. "Hobart couldn't discuss. He could talk; he could assert... but he couldn't meet or answer arguments" (R. Macaulay). Argue usually implies conviction and the adducing of evidence or reasons in support of one's cause or position. "Agrippa advised a republican restoration and Maecenas argued for a principate" (Buchan). Debate stresses formal or public argument between opposing parties, or (sometimes) deliberation with oneself. "They had gathered a wise council to them of every realm, that did debate this business" (Shak.). "Enid... debating his command of silence given... held commune with herself" (Tennyson). Dispute, in the sense of discuss or debate, is somewhat archaic. "[Paul] spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God" (Acts xix. 8). It now ordinarily implies contentious or heated argument. Agitate stresses both vigorous argument and a practical objective; it usually implies active propaganda and a determination to bring about a change. "When workers working ten hours a day agitate for an eight-hour day, what they really want is... sixteen hours off duty instead of fourteen" (Shaw). "If you really expect success, agitate, agitate, agitate" (H. W. Page).

Ana. *Explain, expound, interpret, elucidate, explicate: *discourse, expatiate, dilate, descant.

disdain, v. Scorn, scout, *despise, contemn.

Ana. Spurn, repudiate, reject (see DECLINE, v.).

Ant. Favor: admit. — Con. Accept, *receive, take: *acknowledge, own.

disdain, n. Scorn, despise, contempt. See under DESPISE.

Ana. Aversion, *antipathy: insolence, superciliousness, arrogance (see corresponding adjectives at PROUD).

Con. *Regard, admiration, respect, esteem: *reverence, awe, fear.

disdainful. Supercilious, overbearing, insolent, arrogant, lordly, *proud, haughty.

Ana. Spurning, repudiating, rejecting (see DECLINE, v.): scorning, despising, contemning, scouting (see DESPISE): aversion, *antipathetic, unsympathetic.

Con. Obliging, complaisant, *amiable: considerate, attentive, *thoughtful.

disease, n. Disease, affection, ailment, malady, complaint, distemper, as here compared, designate a physical disorder, especially one which causes illness or loss of health. Disease implies derangement or disturbance of vital functions either in the body or organism as a whole, or in one of its organs or parts, traceable to a cause such as a parasite, a toxin, or a diet deficiency; as, his suffering is caused by the wound and not by disease. Specifically, as used in names of physical disorders, it implies that the special symptoms and, often, the causes, are known; as, Bright's disease; contagious diseases; diseases of the heart; plant diseases. Affection is seldom, if ever, used absolutely, for the term implies an attack upon a particular part or organ; it therefore requires a qualifying or complementary word or phrase; as, an affection of the liver; pulmonary affections. Ailment is rarely used except in reference to human beings; it is more often applied to chronic than to acute diseases; though it implies sickness or debility, it does not in itself connote seriousness; as, the minor ailments of the aged; he suffers from a grave ailment. Malady, like ailment, is applied chiefly to human diseases which cause illness or suffering, but unlike the latter word it often names a serious and deep-seated organic affection or a possibly fatal acute disease. "Addison's disease, a malady which was nearly always fatal until steps were taken to supply the missing hormone" (C. C. Furnas). Complaint distinctively suggests the invalid's point of view. It is applied chiefly to affections of the stomach, the bowels (as, summer complaint), the heart, etc., which involve spells or attacks of pain. "To the proper temperament a congenial complaint... is... a source of agreeable emotions" (C. E. Montague). Distemper, once applied to human ailments, is now, with rare exceptions, used only of animals. It serves either as an inclusive term covering certain infectious diseases or specifically as the name for a serious, often fatal, contagious catarrhal disease which affects dogs, or as an alternative name for strangles, an infectious febrile disease of horses.

Figuratively, certain of these terms also come into comparison, especially as applied to mental, spiritual, or similar disorders. Disease usually connotes manifest derangement requiring remedies or a cure; as, diseases of the body politic. "This strange disease of modern life, with its sick hurry, its divided aims" (Arnold). Ailment implies something wrong that makes for unsoundness, weakness, or loss of well-being. "A bodily disease... may, after all, be but a symptom of some ailment in the spiritual part" (N. Hawthorne). Malady, especially as contrasted with disease, implies a deep-seated morbid condition or unwholesome abnormality. "How would they be troubled by this beauty, into which the soul with all its maladies had passed" (Pater). Distemper takes its figurative implications from its earlier reference to human ailments considered as the result of disturbed "humors" and stresses a lack of balance or of a sense of proportion. "To seek of God more than we well can find, Argues a strong distemper of the mind" (Herrick).

disfigure. Disfeature, *deface.

Ana. Mangle, batter, *maim, mutilate; *deform, distort, contort, gnarl, warp; *injure, damage, mar, impair.

Ant. Adorn. — Con. Embellish, beautify (see ADORN).

disgrace, n. Disgrace, dishonor (or dishonour), disrepute, shame, infamy, ignominy, opprobrium, obloquy, odium, scandal are here compared as meaning the state, condition, character, or less often the cause, of suffering disesteem and of enduring reproach or severe censure. Disgrace in its weakest and earliest, yet most precise, sense implies a loss of the favor or esteem one has enjoyed; as, Queen Elizabeth's favorites were constantly in danger of disgrace if they offended her in the slightest degree. "He was shut up in an attic... and forbidden to speak to his sisters, who were told that he was in disgrace" (B. Russell). The term, however, often implies complete humiliation and, sometimes, ostracism. "You may find yourself at any moment summoned to serve on a jury and make decisions involving the disgrace or vindication... of your fellowcreatures" (Shaw). Dishonor may often be employed in place of disgrace, but in very discriminating use it suggests a previous condition of being honored or of having a high sense of honor; it therefore may imply the loss of the honor that one has enjoyed or the loss of one's self-respect or self-esteem; as, to prefer death to dishonor; "But now mischance hath trod my title down, And with dishonor laid me on the ground" (Shak.). "The shackles of an old love straiten'd him, His honour rooted in dishonour stood, And faith unfaithful kept him falsely true" (Tennyson). Disrepute stresses either the loss of one's good name or the attribution of a bad name or reputation; as, the actions of certain of its guests have brought the hotel into disrepute; the disrepute into which this once famous name has now fallen. Shame implies particularly humiliating disgrace or disrepute such as is caused by an illicit union, illegitimate birth, inferior blood, relationship to a traitor or criminal, commission of a crime, or the like; as, to live in shame; a child of shame. "Is it not... a pity to live no better life? 'God knows it is a shame!'" (Dickens). "If mixture of blood be a shame, we [the British] have purchased at the price of that shame the glory of catholicism" (Quiller-Couch). Infamy, etymologically the antithesis of fame or glory, usually implies notoriety as well as exceeding shame. "Men who prefer any load of infamy, however great, to any pressure of taxation, however light" (Sydney Smith). "I have come, not from obscurity into the momentary notoriety of crime, but from a sort of eternity of fame to a sort of eternity of infamy" (Wilde). Ignominy, more than infamy—which in some ways it closely resembles, stresses the almost unendurable contemptibility or despicability of the disgrace or its cause; as, "The ignominy [horsewhipping] he had been compelled to submit to" (Meredith); "Was she now to endure the ignominy of his abandoning her?" (D. H. Lawrence); "The ignominy of returning to Spain, having accomplished nothing, became more obvious the more it was considered" (Froude). Opprobrium adds to disgrace the implication of being severely reproached or condemned; as, the opprobrium which often attaches itself to the term "politician." "Spain... has been plundered and oppressed, and the opprobrium lights on the robbers, not on the robbed" (Buckle). "The name 'educator,' for many intelligent people, has become a term of opprobrium" (Grandgent). Obloquy (see also ABUSE, n.) adds to disgrace the implication of being abused or vilified; as, "And undergo the perpetual obloquy of having lost a Kingdom" (Clarendon). "He [Mark Twain] never thought of publishing them ['Tom Sawyer' and 'Huckleberry Finn'] anonymously, as he published 'Joan' at first, lest it ['Joan of Arc'] should suffer from the obloquy of a pen-name that had been compromised by so many dubious ventures" (Van W. Brooks). Odium applies to the disgrace or the opprobrium that is attached to the fact or state of being an object of widespread or universal hatred or intense dislike; as, "Whatever odium or loss her manoeuvres incurred she [Queen Elizabeth] flung upon her counselors" (J. R. Green); "As a preliminary Augustus... revised the senatorian roll. This was always an invidious task... in the end he was compelled to make the nominations himself and face the odium" (Buchan); "Many materialists... seek to eliminate the odium attaching to the word materialism, and even to eliminate the word itself" (W. James). Scandal (as here compared: see also OFFENSE, 3; DETRACTION) applies to the disgrace or shame that is attached to any act, practice, condition, or the like, which arouses severe censure, creates objectionable gossip, or reflects on the competency, the intelligence, or the morals of those who are associated or involved; as, the fall of the bridge was a scandal both to the engineers and to the officials responsible for its construction; "It was that spring that... Miss Jane Jay, to the scandal and grief of her sisters, made up her mind not to go to church any more" (Deland). "A sinful man—why Mrs. Caroline expected nothing better: but a sinful woman—Oh! that was a scandal, a shame!" (Meredith).

Ana. Degradation, debasement, abasement, humbling, humiliation (see corresponding verbs at ABASE): *stigma, brand, blot, stain.

Ant. Respect, esteem. — Con. Admiration, *regard; *reverence, awe, fear: honor, repute, glory, renown, *fame.

disguise, v. Disguise, cloak, mask, dissemble, as here compared, agree in meaning to assume a dress, an appearance, or an expression that conceals one's identity, intention, true feeling, or the like. Disguise, which etymologically implies an alteration in one's dress, now frequently retains that implication with the added suggestion either of concealment of identity or of the assumption (as on the stage) of another identity; as, to escape captivity disguised as a woman; they disguise themselves as Turks for a joke. The term, however, may take for its object a feeling, an intention, a motive, or the like, when one's words, one's expression, or one's acts imply a contrary feeling, intention, etc.; as, "I disguised my impatience and suspicion of him and waited" (Hudson). "However we may disguise it by veiling words we do not and cannot carry out the distinction between legislative and executive action with mathematical precision" (Justice Holmes). Cloak implies the assumption of something which covers and conceals identity or nature in the manner of a long heavy loose cloak or wrap; as, the appearance of good will cloaked a sinister intention; "Wife-worship cloaks a secret shame" (Tennyson). Mask implies a disguise comparable to that of a mask, or a covering for the face or head, which prevents recognition of a thing's true character, quality, presence, or the like; as, icy spots masked by newly fallen snow; to mask troops by secreting them in trenches. "Masking with a smile The vain regrets that in their hearts arose" (W. Morris). Dissemble, which is used as often as an intransitive as a transitive verb, stresses simulation for the purpose of deceiving as well as disguising; it, therefore, is the preferred term when actual deception is achieved. "Ross bears, or dissembles, his disappointment better than I expected of him" (Gray). "The Scripture moveth us... to acknowledge and confess our manifold sins and wickedness; and that we should not dissemble nor cloke them before the face of Almighty God" (Bk. of Com. Prayer).

Ana. Conceal, *hide: *misrepresent, belie: *assume, pretend, feign, counterfeit, sham, simulate, affect.

Con. Expose, exhibit, display, parade, flaunt (see SHOW, v.): *reveal, disclose, discover, betray, bewray.

dish, v. Ladle, spoon, *dip, lade, bail, scoop.

dishonest. Dishonest, deceitful, mendacious, lying, untruthful come into comparison especially when applied to persons, their utterances, and their acts, and mean lacking in honesty and unworthy of trust or belief. Dishonest may imply the act or the habit of willfully perverting the truth, but it also may suggest the act or habit of stealing, cheating, or defrauding; as, a dishonest statement; a dishonest merchant or employee or lawyer or historian. Deceitful usually implies the intent to mislead or to impose upon another in order to keep that one from knowing the truth, especially as to one's real nature or one's actual purpose or intention, or the true character of what is offered, given, sold, or the like; it therefore usually suggests a false or specious appearance, indulgence in falsehoods, or cheating, defrauding, or double-dealing; as, deceitful propaganda; deceitful children; a deceitful statement. Mendacious, a literary rather than colloquial term, differs little from lying, the ordinary, direct, unequivocal word, except in being used more often, when applied to persons, to suggest the habit of telling lies rather than, as the latter, the act of telling a lie; thus, one preferably describes a person as mendacious when his character is in mind and as lying when the untruth of something he has said or written is in mind; as, a child who relates fanciful experiences is not mendacious but unduly imaginative; a lying boy is easily detected, especially if he is by nature honest. "[The pagan ages] were not mendacious and distracted, but in their own poor way true and sane!" (Carlyle). "Silly newspapers and magazines for the circulation of lying advertisements" (Shaw). Untruthful is often used in place of mendacious or lying as a slightly less brutal word; however, the term distinctively implies lack of correspondence between what is said or what is represented, and the facts of the case or the reality, and is therefore more often applied to statements, accounts, reports, descriptions, and the like; as, an untruthful account of the incident; the artist's representation of the scene at Versailles was untruthful in many of its details.

Ana. *Crooked, devious, oblique: false, *faithless, perfidious: cheating, cozening, defrauding, swindling (see CHEAT, v.).

Ant. Honest. — Con. *Upright, honorable, scrupulous, conscientious, just: *straightforward, forthright, above-board: candid, open, *frank, plain.

dishonor or dishonour, n. *Disgrace, disrepute, shame, infamy, ignominy, opprobrium, obloquy, odium, scandal.

Ana. Humiliation, humbling, debasement, degradation, abasement (see corresponding verbs at ABASE): *stigma, brand, blot, stain.

Ant. Honor. — Con. Glory, renown, repute, *fame: reverence, veneration (see under REVERE): prestige, *influence, credit, authority, weight: esteem, respect, *regard, admiration.

disinclined, adj. Disinclined, indisposed, hesitant, reluctant, loath (or loth), averse agree in meaning manifesting neither the will nor the desire to do or to have anything to do with the thing that is indicated or understood. One is disinclined to (sometimes for or to) do something for which one has no natural bent or no present taste or inclination, or which meets one's disapproval. "I should not be disinclined to go to London, did I know anybody there" (Richardson). "Mr. Lorry and Defarge were rather disinclined to this course, and in favour of one of them remaining" (Dickens). "Now, when it has become a sort of fashion to exalt the spiritual qualities of the Chinese above those of other peoples, one may well feel disinclined to admit any interest in China" (H. Ellis). One is indisposed to or to do something when one's attitude is not favorable or is actually hostile or unsympathetic. "Unfit to rule and indisposed to please" (Crabbe). "Yeobright... was indisposed to take part in the feasting and dancing.... 'I wish I could be there without dashing your spirits,' he said. 'But I might be too much like the skull at the banquet'" (Hardy). One is hesitant to do (or in doing, or about doing) something who holds back through fear, distaste, disinclination, irresolution, or the like; as, she was hesitant to accept the invitation; hesitant in seeking advice; a hesitant suitor; to feel hesitancy about applying for a position. One is reluctant to do something who is not only hesitant but unwilling. "I was simply persuading a frightened and reluctant girl to do the straight and decent and difficult thing" (R. Macaulay). "People were reluctant to charge a dead man with an offense from which he could not clear himself" (E. Wharton). "We were reluctant to expose those silent and beautiful places to vulgar curiosity" (Cather). Reluctant is also applied directly to the thing which is done reluctantly or to a thing which by extension seems reluctant; as, "giving reluctant consent to publication" (R. A. Cram); "the constant strain of bringing back a reluctant and bored attention" (B. Russell); "they wring from the reluctant soil food enough to keep... alive" (A. Repplier). One is loath to do that which one is hesitant about doing because it is not in harmony with one's likes or dislikes, one's tastes or distastes, or one's sympathies or antipathies; thus, a tender person may be loath to punish a refractory child but a strict disciplinarian would be loath to allow that child to go unpunished; one may be loath to believe a well-founded report that discredits a friend yet loath to disbelieve a rumor that confirms one's bad opinion of a person. One is averse to something (or frequently, in British use, from something) when one turns away from it because one finds it distasteful or repugnant; as, to be averse to all advice from others; to be averse to dissension in one's family; to be averse to eating in public places. "His impulses were generous, trustful, averse from cruelty" (J. R. Green).

Ana. *Antipathetic, unsympathetic: opposing, resisting (see OPPOSE): balking, shying, boggling, sticking, stickling (see DEMUR): objecting, protesting (see OBJECT, v.).

Con. *Eager, avid, keen, anxious: inclined, disposed, predisposed (see INCLINE, v.).

disinfect. *Sterilize, sanitize, fumigate.

Ant. Infect.

disinfectant, adj. Antiseptic, germicidal, bactericidal. See under ANTISEPTIC, n.

disinfectant, n. *Antiseptic, germicide, bactericide.

disintegrate. Crumble, decompose, *decay, rot, putrefy, spoil.

Ana. Dissolve, deliquesce (see LIQUEFY): *scatter, disperse, dissipate: break down, resolve, *analyze, dissect.

Ant. Integrate. — Con. Articulate, concatenate (see INTEGRATE): fuse, blend, merge, coalesce (see MIX): unite, combine, link, associate, *join, connect.

disinter. Exhume, excavate, *dig, delve, spade, grub.

Ana. Unearth, *discover.

Ant. Inter. — Con. Bury, secrete, cache, conceal, *hide.

disinterested. 1 Detached, aloof, unconcerned, *indifferent, incurious.

Ana. Dispassionate, unbiased, impartial, *fair, just: *neutral, negative.

Ant. Interested: prejudiced, biased.

2 Disinterested, uninterested, though often used interchangeably in the past, are now, as a rule, sharply distinguished in meaning. Both words are compounds of negative prefixes and of interested, the adjective, and both carry the meanings of not having an interest in and of not interested (the past participle). The latter was the earlier sense of disinterested, and the former of uninterested. In present good use, these meanings are reversed. Disinterested now implies a lack of personal concern, not only of selfish motives or thought of advantage, but also of bias, predilection, or prejudice. Uninterested, which now means not having the mind or feelings engaged, suggests inattentiveness, apathy, or indifference. Thus, a disinterested witness is one that either has no personal interest in the outcome of a trial or is able to put aside such interest and give impartial testimony; an uninterested witness is bored and unresponsive to attempts to elicit testimony. When a problem is up for discussion, a disinterested person refuses to allow any ulterior considerations to affect his judgment; an uninterested person maintains an attitude of indifference or refuses to participate in the discussion.

disloyal. *Faithless, false, perfidious, traitorous, treacherous.

Ana. Disaffected, estranged, alienated (see ESTRANGE): recreant (see COWARDLY): *inconstant, fickle, unstable.

Ant. Loyal. — Con. *Faithful, constant, leal, true, staunch, steadfast, resolute.

dismantle. Divest, *strip, denude, bare.

Con. *Furnish, equip, outfit, appoint.

dismay, v. Dismay, appall (or appal), horrify, daunt agree in meaning to unnerve and arrest in action by arousing fear, apprehension, or strong aversion. The meanings of most of these words have undergone emasculation in the course of time, so that in current use they seldom imply as overpowering fear, apprehension, or aversion as in older usage. Dismay implies a loss of power to proceed either because the prospect is terrifying or disheartening, or, more often in modern use, because one is balked and perplexed or at a loss how to deal with the situation. "Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not yours, but God's. To-morrow go ye down against them" (2 Chronicles xx. 15-16). "Here was an opponent that more than once puzzled Roosevelt, and in the end flatly dismayed him" (Mencken). Appall, in its most forceful use, implies an overwhelming and paralyzing dread or terror; as, the sight appalled the stoutest hearts. "'Are you a man?' 'Ay, and a bold one, that dare look on that Which might appal the devil'" (Shak.). In weaker modern use, the word usually implies the sense of impotence aroused when one is confronted by something that perturbs, confounds, or shocks, yet is beyond one's power to alter; as, an appalling waste of human life; appalling statistics. "The unpunctuality of the Orient . . . is appalling to those who come freshly from a land of fixed meal-times and regular train services" (A. Huxley). Horrify still often emphasizes a reaction of horror or of shuddering revulsion from that which is ghastly or hideously offensive. "To developed sensibilities the facts of war are revolting and horrifying" (A. Huxley). "This theme—a man ready to prostitute his sister as payment for a debt of honour—is too grotesque even to horrify us" (T. S. Eliot). In its weakened sense, horrify comes close to shock in meaning and implies momentary agitation occasioned by a surprising breach of the proprieties or decencies; as, they were horrified by his playing golf on Sunday; horrifyingly bad manners. Daunt presupposes an attempt to do something that requires courage and implies therefore a stoppage by someone or something that cows or subdues. "He had come back [from Russia] because he had been completely daunted by what he had found Over There . . . he looked not only daunted but dunted; the Revolution . . . had been something against which self-assertion had been of no avail" (M. Austin). Daunt often occurs in negative constructions; as, nothing can daunt the man whose last concern is for his own safety.

Ana. Perplex, confound, bewilder, nonplus, dumfound, mystify, *puzzle: disconcert, rattle, faze, abash, discomfit, *embarrass: alarm, *frighten, terrify.

Ant. Cheer. — Con. Assure, secure, *ensure: pique, quicken, stimulate, galvanize, excite, *provoke.

dismay, n. Alarm, consternation, panic, *fear, dread, fright, terror, horror, trepidation.

Ana. Perturbing or perturbation, agitation, disquieting or disquietude, discomposing or discomposure, upsetting or upset (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE): *apprehension, foreboding.

Con. *Confidence, assurance, aplomb, self-possession: *courage, mettle, spirit, resolution.

dismiss. 1 Dismiss, discharge, cashier, sack, fire, bounce, drop come into comparison when they mean to let go from one's employ or service. Dismiss etymologically implies a giving permission to go; as, "he dismissed the assembly" (Acts xix. 41). When used in the sense here considered, it carries apart from the context no suggestion of the reason for the act and is, therefore, often preferred as the softer or as the more comprehensive term; as, with the let-up in business, thousands of employees were dismissed; the new governor dismissed the staff that served his predecessor and appointed members of his own party in their places; to dismiss a servant. Discharge is usually a harsher term, implying dismissal for cause and little, or commonly no, likelihood of being called back; as, to discharge an employee for insubordination; she has the habit of discharging her servants without notice: only in military and court use does it, when unqualified, carry no implication of dissatisfaction on the part of the employer; as, the enlisted man will be discharged after three years' service; the three convicted soldiers were dishonorably discharged; the judge discharged the jury with thanks. Cashier implies a summary or ignominious discharge from a position of trust or from a position that is high in the scale; as, to cashier a suspected official; "Many a duteous and knee-crooking knave, That . . . Wears out his time, much like his master's ass, For nought but provender, and when he's old, cashier'd" (Shak.); "the few sentimental fanatics who . . . proceeded upon the assumption that academic freedom was yet inviolable, and so got themselves cashiered" (Mencken). Sack, fire, and bounce are all colloquial synonyms of discharge: sack stresses a being discarded, or thrown out of employ (as, he was sacked after long years of service), fire stresses a dismissal as sudden and peremptory as the action of firing a gun (as, he fired his clerk one day in a fit of anger, but the next day he called him back), and bounce stresses a discharge that suggests, rather than implies, a kicking out (as, he bounced the boy after one day of unsatisfactory service). Drop is a common colloquial synonym of dismiss and equally colorless; as, in off seasons, all part-time employees are dropped.

Con. Hire, *employ.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

2 *Eject, oust, expel, evict.

Ana. *Discard, cast, shed, slough: spurn, repudiate, reject, refuse (see DECLINE, v.): scorn, scout (see DE-SPISE).

Con. Accept, *receive, admit: entertain, *harbor.

dismissal. Dismissal, dismissal agree in meaning the act of dismissing or the state of being dismissed. Dismissal in recent usage has almost displaced the older and regularly formed dismissal in all its senses; however, dismissal is still sometimes preferred when a formal discharge or expulsion is implied; as, the dismissal of a congregation; "A preoccupied nod and a perfunctory salutation which was in truth a dismissal" (Stevenson); "to be punished by dismissal from the public service" (Macaulay); "More than 200 of the 230 voting... members of the church voted for his [Jonathan Edwards's] dismissal" (Dict. Amer. Biog.).

Ana. Dispersion, scattering (see corresponding verbs at SCATTER): releasing, liberating, freeing (see FREE, v.).

Con. Convening, convoking, mustering (see SUMMON).

dismission. *Dismissal.

Ana. Discharging or discharge, sacking, firing, cashiering (see corresponding verbs at DISMISS): expelling or expulsion, ejection, ousting, eviction (see corresponding verbs at EJECT).

⚠ Do not confuse dismissal with demission or dimission.

dismount. Alight, *descend.

Ant. Mount.

disorder, n. *Confusion, disarray, clutter, jumble, chaos, pie, snarl, muddle.

Ana. Derangement, disarrangement, disorganization, disturbance, unsettlement (see corresponding verbs at DISORDER): *anarchy, chaos, lawlessness.

Ant. Order. — Con. Arrangement, organization, methodization, systematization (see corresponding verbs at ORDER): system, *method.

disorder, v. Disorder, derange, disarrange, disorganize, unsettle, disturb come into comparison when they mean to undo the fixed or proper order of something. Disorder, the least explicit of these terms in its further implications, is commonly used in reference to that which depends for its proper functioning or effectiveness upon being properly ordered (see ORDER, v., 1) or in good order or array; as, "tresses all disordered" (Milton); too rich a diet will disorder his digestive system. Derange implies a throwing out of proper arrangement the parts, or an important part, of something in which all the parts or elements are ordered with reference to each other or are so carefully adjusted or so closely related to each other that they work together as a unit. The term usually carries a strong implication of resulting confusion or a destruction of normal or healthy conditions; as, war deranges the life of a nation; fear has deranged his mind; by deranging that part of the plan, you have made the whole scheme useless. Disarrange, on the other hand, often implies little more than the changing of a fixed or a perfect order or arrangement, and may carry no suggestion of confusion; as, "She... would not let her chamber be disarranged just at present" (H. Martineau); one glance told him that someone had disarranged the papers on his desk; they must now arrange their books, so disarranged by the woman who had house cleaned their library. Disorganize implies usually the destruction of order and functioning in a body or whole all the parts of which have an organic connection with each other or have been so ordered with reference to each other that what affects one part affects every other part: the term therefore usually suggests a disordering that runs through an entire body, or system, or the like, and breaks it up, or seriously impedes or impairs its functioning; as, blitzkrieg methods disorganize the internal communications of the enemy's country; "The Whigs... though defeated, disheartened, and disorganized, did not yield without an effort" (Macaulay). "He meant to stay two nights, but was knocked down by rheumatic fever, and for six weeks disorganized Polder's establishment, stopped Polder's work, and nearly died in Polder's bedroom" (Kipling). Unsettle literally implies a loosening of that which is fixed in position, or a moving of it from its rightful place to another: when used in reference to a body, a system, an organism, or the like, it also implies a disordering or disarrangement that causes instability, unrest, inability to concentrate, or the like; as, to unsettle the government by frequent and violent disagreements among the legislators; these constant rumors keep one unsettled; to unsettle the beliefs of the people; his mind has become unsettled. Disturb (as here compared: see also DISCOMPOSE) usually implies a force or combination of forces that unsettles or disarranges; frequently it also suggests an interruption or interference that affects a settled or orderly course, plan, growth, or the like; as, the attraction of planets disturbs the course of comets; "regulation... produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched, as that on which it has operated" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "the warps and strains of civilised life... seem to disturb the wholesome balance of even the humblest elements of the possessive and aesthetic instincts" (H. Ellis).

Ant. Order. — Con. Arrange, marshal, organize, methodize, systematize (see ORDER, v.): array, align, range, *line: regulate, *adjust, fix.

disorganize. Disturb, unsettle, *disorder, derange, disarrange.

Ant. Organize. — Con. Systematize, methodize, arrange, marshal, *order.

disparage. *Decry, depreciate, derogate from, detract from, belittle, minimize.

Ana. Asperse, *malign, traduce, defame, slander, libel: deprecate, *disapprove.

Ant. Applaud. — Con. *Praise, laud, extol, eulogize, acclaim: *commend, compliment: *exalt, magnify, aggrandize.

disparate. Diverse, divergent, *different, various.

Ana. Inconsonant, incompatible, incongruous, discrepant, discordant, inconsistent: *distinct, separate.

Ant. Comparable, analogous. — Con. *Similar, like, homogeneous, parallel.

dispassionate. Unbiased, impartial, objective, uncolored, *fair, just, equitable.

Ana. Disinterested, detached, aloof, *indifferent: *cool, collected, composed: candid, open, *frank.

Ant. Passionate: intemperate.

dispatch or despatch, v. *Kill, slay, murder, assassinate, execute.

dispatch or despatch, n. 1 Speed, expedition, *haste, hurry.

Ana. Celerity, alacrity, legerity: quickness, fleetness, swiftness, rapidity (see corresponding adjectives at FAST): diligence (see corresponding adjective at BUSY).

Ant. Delay.

2 Message, note, *letter, epistle, report, memorandum, missive.

dispel. Dissipate, disperse, *scatter.

dispiteous. Variant of DESPITEOUS.

displace. Supplant, *replace, supersede.

Ana. Transpose, *reverse, invert: shift, remove, transfer, *move: derange, disarrange, *disorder: *eject, oust, expel, dismiss.

display, v. Exhibit, *show, expose, parade, flaunt.

Ana. Manifest, evidence, evince, demonstrate, *show: *reveal, disclose, discover.

Con. *Disguise, cloak, mask, dissemble: *hide, conceal, secrete.

display, n. Display, parade, array, pomp are here compared only as denoting a striking or spectacular show or exhibition for the sake of effect. Display commonly suggests a spreading out or an unfolding of that which is usually concealed, or visible only in the mass or in individual instances, so that the observer is impressed, as by the extent, the detail, the beauty, or the lavishness of what is revealed to him; as, a display of meteors; a parvenu's display of wealth; a nation's display of power. "The piece of Dryden's which is... the most sustained display of surprise after surprise of wit... is MacFlecknoe" (T. S. Eliot). Parade implies ostentatious or flaunting exhibition; display may or may not suggest a conscious endeavor to impress, but parade invariably, in correct use, implies such an intention. "To see Lydia, with anxious parade, walk up to her mother's right hand, and hear her say to her eldest sister, 'Ah, Jane, I take your place now... because I am a married woman'" (Austen). "Mr. Cruncher could not be restrained from making rather an ostentatious parade of his liberality" (Dickens). "He died, as erring man should die, Without display, without parade" (Byron). Array stresses order, numerousness, and brilliancy in display; it usually suggests an impression such as might be produced by marshaled ranks of armed soldiers and therefore may be used of displays that strike one as beautiful, or as terrible, or as merely astonishing; as, an array of tulips; an array of silver on a sideboard; "the terrible array of evils around us and dangers in front of us" (Shaw). "Clouds... Each lost in each, that marvellous array Of temple, palace, citadel" (Wordsworth). Pomp stresses ceremonial grandeur or splendor. It was once often, but is now rarely, used of a pageant or solemn procession, but it still suggests an outward spectacular show of magnificence or glory. "It [Independence Day] ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with... bonfires, and illuminations" (John Adams). "Pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious war!" (Shak.). "Lo, all our pomp of yesterday Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!" (Kipling). Ana. Ostentatiousness or ostentation, pretentiousness or pretension, showiness or show, pompousness (see corresponding adjectives at SHOWY).

disport, n. Sport, play, frolic, rollick, romp, gambol. See under PLAY, v.

Ana. Recreation, diversion, amusement, entertainment (see under AMUSE): merriment, jollity (see corresponding adjectives at MERRY).

disport, v. Sport, *play, frolic, rollick, romp, gambol.

Ana. Divert, *amuse, recreate, entertain.

disposal. Disposal, disposition are frequently used without clear distinction when they mean the act or the power of disposing of something. However, when the emphasis is upon what shall be done with money, property, possessions, or the like, disposal tends to imply a getting rid of, as by selling, giving away, assigning to others, destroying, or the like, and disposition, a proper or orderly distribution or utilization; as, the disposal (not disposition) of her jewels seemed necessary; the disposition (not disposal unless sale or the like is implied) of the intestate's property has been agreed upon by the heirs; incinerators used for the disposal of garbage. "I am happy that the speedy disposal of the pictures will enable you... to settle this unpleasant affair" (M. R. Milford). "The donors have stipulated for the future disposition... of those funds" (Ch. Just. Marshall). When the idea of arrangement or ordering or of making arrangements is stressed, disposition, rather than disposal, is employed by good writers. "While the disposition of the branches is unsymmetrical, balance is maintained" (Byron). "A deserter had informed Octavian of the general plan... and he made his dispositions accordingly" (Buchan). The idiomatic phrases at one's disposal and at (or in) one's disposition differ in that though both imply a placing under one's control, the former suggests use as one sees fit and the latter, subjection to one's direction, arrangement, or command; as, they put their summer home at the disposal of the bridal couple; "[He] had at his disposition no inconsiderable sums of money" (Trench). Ana. Selling or sale, auctioning or auction, trading or trade, vending, bartering (see corresponding verbs at SELL); destroying or destruction, demolishing or demolition (see corresponding verbs at DESTROY).

dispose. Predispose, bias, *incline.

Ana. Influence, *affect, sway.

disposition. 1 *Disposal.

Ana. Administering or administration, dispensing or dispensation (see corresponding verbs at ADMINISTER): management, direction, controlling or control, conducting or conduct (see corresponding verbs at CONDUCT): arrangement, ordering (see corresponding verbs at ORDER).

2 Disposition, temperament, temper, complexion, character, personality, individuality come into comparison when they mean the prevailing and dominant quality or qualities which distinguish or identify a person or group. Disposition applies to the predominating bent or constitutional habit of one's mind or spirit. "She... is always cheerful and sweet-tempered... This disposition in her is the more comfortable, because it is not the humor of the day, a sudden flash of benevolence and good spirits" (Cowper). "Ages of fierceness have overlaid what is naturally kindly in the dispositions of ordinary men and women" (B. Russell). Temperament applies to the sum total of characteristics that are innate or inherent and the result of one's physical, nervous, and mental organization; as, a nervous, bilious temperament; "I verily believe that nor you, nor any man of poetical temperament, can avoid a strong passion of some kind" (Byron). "Shall I ever be cheerful again, happy again? Yes. And soon. For I know my temperament" (Twain). Temper, as here compared, was once a close synonym of temperament; in current English, possibly through the influence of the verb temper (see TEMPER, v., 1), it implies a combination of all the qualities, especially those acquired through experience, which determine the way one (not only a person, but a people, an age, or the like) meets the situations, difficulties, or problems that confront one. "There was a general confidence in her [Elizabeth's] instinctive knowledge of the national temper" (J. R. Green). "The leaders of forlorn hopes are never found among men with dismal minds. There must be a natural resiliency of temper which makes them enjoy desperate ventures" (S. M. Crothers). Complexion, as here compared, originally referred to temperament regarded as the result of the physical, rather than the nervous or mental, constitution (the four "humors" and their proportions). "Or else his complexion is so courageous that he may not forbear" (Chaucer). The physiological implications of this earlier sense are no longer accepted, but the term still implies something fundamentally distinctive that determines the impression one produces on others. "The rationalist mind... is of a doctrinaire and authoritative complexion: the phrase 'must be' is ever on its lips" (W. James). Character applies to the aggregate of qualities, especially moral qualities, which distinguish an individual at any one time in his development, though constantly tending to become more or less fixed, and which must be taken as a whole into consideration in any ethical judgment of him; as, he is a man of good character; in his youth, his character was weak and unstable. "That inexorable law of human souls that we prepare ourselves for sudden deeds by the reiterated choice of good or evil that determines character" (G. Eliot). Oftentimes, character means such an aggregate of qualities brought to a high state of moral excellence by right principles and right choices and by the rejection of all that weakens or debases. "When we say of such and such a man that he has... character, we generally mean that he has disciplined his temperament, his disposition, into strict obedience to the behests of duty" (Brownell). Personality also applies to the aggregate of qualities which distinguish an individual, but the term differs from character in that it implies his being distinguished as a person rather than as a moral being. In general, personality may be said to be revealed in unconscious as well as in conscious acts or movements, in physical and emotional as well as in mental and moral behavior, and especially, in a person's relations to others; thus, one may know very little about the character of an acquaintance, yet have a very definite idea of his personality. Therefore, personality is qualified not as good, bad, or the like, but by an adjective implying the extent to which it pleases, displeases, or otherwise impresses the observer. "There was a pious and good man, but an utterly negligible personality" (C. Mackenzie). "The mere presence of personality in a work of art is not sufficient, because the personality revealed may be lacking in charm" (A. C. Benson). Hence, personality often distinctively means personal magnetism or charm. "Personality is not something that can be sought; it is a radiance that is diffused spontaneously" (H. Ellis). Individuality, as here compared, implies a personality that distinguishes one from all others; often, it connotes the power of impressing one's personality on others; as, he is a man of marked individuality; she has no individuality; "Sophia quietened her by sheer force of individuality" (Bennett).

disprove. Disprove, refute, confute, rebut, controvert come into comparison as meaning to show or attempt to show by argument that a statement, a claim, or the like, is not true. Disprove stresses the success of an argument in showing the falsity, erroneousness, invalidity, or the like, of that which is attacked; as, he could not disprove the major contention of his opponents, but he could show that they had not proved it; "I speak not to disprove what Brutus spoke, But here I am to speak what I do know" (Shak.). Refute stresses the method more than the effect of argument in disproof: it therefore is preferred to disprove when one wishes to convey implications of the adducing of evidence, of a bringing forward of witnesses, experts, or authorities, and of close reasoning: it connotes a gathering of forces and an elaboration of arguments not present in disprove; as, "With respect to that other, more weighty accusation, of having injured

Mr. Wickham, I can only refute it by laying before you the whole of his connection with my family" (Austen); "There is great force in this argument, and the Court is not satisfied that it has been refuted" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Confute emphasizes a destruction of arguments or a reducing to silence of opponents by clearly revealing the falsity or the untenability of the points which have been made: the term usually implies refutation, but it may also suggest methods such as railery, denunciation, sarcasm, or the like; as, "Satan stood... confuted and convinced Of his weak arguing and fallacious drift" (Milton); "Elijah... confuted the prophets of Baal in precisely that way, with... bitter mockery of their god when he failed to send down fire from heaven" (Shaw). Rebut differs from refute, its closest synonym, in suggesting greater formality of method, such as that used in organized debate or in courts of law. Although its aim is disproof of an opponent's contentions, the term does not necessarily imply the achievement of one's end, but it does suggest the offering of argument, evidence, or testimony that contradicts argument, evidence, or testimony given in support of the other side; as, at the end of the formal arguments, each member of the debating team was allowed three minutes for rebutting the arguments of his opponents; "The Tractarians were driven to formulate a theory of the Church... which should justify the exclusive claim of Anglicanism to be the Church of Christ in these islands, while rebutting the arguments of Rome" (Inge). Controvert usually carries a dual implication, that of denying or contradicting a statement, proposition, or doctrine, or a set of these, and of refuting or attempting to refute it. It does not necessarily suggest disproof but it does connote a valiant effort to achieve that end; as, "This doctrine has been controverted; it is, however, very ably defended by Mr. Hargrave" (W. Cruise); "I am glad that this year we are assembled not to controvert the opinions of others, nor even to defend ourselves" (Inge).

Ana. Altercation, wrangle, *quarrel, bickering: *argument, dispute, controversy.

Ant. Accord (sense 1): comity (sense 2). — Con. *Harmony, concord, consonance: *friendship, good will, amity.

dissenter. Nonconformist, sectarian, sectary, schismatic, *heretic.

dissimilarity. Dissimilarity, unlikeness, difference, divergence (or divergency), distinction come into comparison when they mean lack of agreement or correspondence (or an instance of such lack of agreement or correspondence) in appearance, in qualities, in nature, etc., brought out by a comparison of two or more things.

Dissimilarity and unlikeness, the most general terms in this group, are often used interchangeably without loss, but when there is little basis for comparison and the contrast is obvious, dissimilarity is usually preferred by discriminating writers and speakers (as, the effectiveness of a metaphor depends, in part, on the dissimilarity of the things which are compared): on the other hand, when the things contrasted are of the same species, genus, or other category, and there are fundamental likenesses between them, unlikeness is commonly the preferred term (as, the unlikeness between these violets is obvious only to an expert; "But he was rich where I was poor. And he supplied my want the more As his unlikeness fitted mine"—Tennyson). Difference suggests notice of a quality, feature, or the like, which marks one thing as apart from another. The term may imply want of resemblance in one or more particulars (as, to note the differences between the first poems of Keats and those written after he had achieved mastery of his art; there are both resemblances and differences in the designs of these two cathedrals), or want of identity (as, "Difference of opinion is the one crime which kings never forgive"—Emerson; "Difference of religion breeds more quarrels than difference of politics"—W. Phillips), or a disagreement or cause of disagreement which separates individuals or makes them hostile to each other (as, there have been differences between them for some time). Divergence, when used in the sense here considered, applies to a difference between things (sometimes persons) having the same origin, the same ends, the same background, or the like, or belonging to the same type or class: in this sense, there is usually an implication of a difference that makes for cleavage or increasing unlikeness; as, "An illustration of the divergences between countries both highly democratic" (Bryce); "the greatest divergence in the educational value of studies is due to the varying degree to which they require concentration, judgment, observation, and imagination" (Grandgent). Distinction usually implies want of resemblance in detail, especially in some minute or not obvious detail: it therefore commonly applies to a difference that is brought out by close observation, study, analysis, or the like, or that marks the line of division between two like things; as, to point out the distinction in meaning between two close synonyms; a hair-splitting distinction between "original" and "creative" writing. "Apprehend the vital distinction between religion and criticism" (Arnold). "So intoxicated with dreams of fortune that he had lost all sense of the distinction between reality and illusion" (Van W. Brooks). "This is not a distinction without a difference. It is not like the affair of 'an old hat cocked' and 'a cocked old hat' . . . but there is a difference here in the nature of things" (Sterne).

Ana. Difference, diversity, disparity (see corresponding adjectives at DIFFERENT): discrepancy, discordance, in consonance (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSONANT).

Ant. Similarity. — Con. *Likeness, resemblance, similitude: correspondence, agreement, conformity (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

dissimulation. 1 Duplicity, *deceit, cunning, guile.

Ana. Dissembling, cloaking, masking, disguising (see DISGUISE): hiding, concealing, secreting (see HIDE): pretending or pretense, feigning, shamming (see corresponding verbs at ASSUME): *hypocrisy, Pharisaism, sanctimony.

Con. Candidness or candor, openness (see corresponding adjectives at FRANK): sincerity (see corresponding adjective SINCERE).

2 *Simulation.

Ana. & Con. See those at DISSIMULATION, 1.

dissipate. Dispel, disperse, *scatter.

Ana. Disintegrate, crumble (see DECAY): *separate, part, divide: dissolve, deliquesce, melt (see LIQUEFY).

Ant. Accumulate (possessions, wealth, a mass of things): absorb (one's energies, one's attention, etc.): concentrate (one's thoughts, powers, efforts).

dissolute. Profligate, reprobate, *abandoned.

Ana. *Licentious, libertine, wanton, lewd: inebriate, inebriated, intoxicated, drunken, *drunk: debauched, depraved, corrupt, debased, perverted (see under DEBASE).

dissolve. 1 *Liquefy, deliquesce, melt, fuse, thaw.

Ana. Disintegrate, crumble (see DECAY).

2 *Adjourn, prorogue.

Ana. Terminate, end, *close.

Con. *Summon, convoke, convene, call.

dissolvent. *Solvent, resolvent, menstruum, alkahest.

dissonance. Discordance (see under DISSONANT).

dissonant. Dissonant, discordant and their corresponding nouns dissonance and discordance come into comparison when they mean (in the case of the adjectives) not in harmony with one another or with something else or (in the case of the nouns) the lack of such harmony. Dissonant and dissonance are used chiefly with regard to sounds, especially musical tones. Originally, both stressed the harshness or unmelodiousness of a single sound or tone or of a combination of sounds or tones; as, "Hanno would fain have assuaged their fury, but he knew not how; for he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his oration" (Raleigh [d. 1618]). Now, they imply a combination of inharmonious musical tones that causes a quick succession of beats and produces an unrestful but not necessarily displeasing effect that is usually resolved by an ensuing consonance. The terms therefore in such use commonly suggest artistic intention rather than artistic failure. "Hitherto the foundation of all music was consonance, with dissonance freely admitted; the new system is founded on dissonance, with consonance as a rare and not very welcome guest" (Baker's Biog. Dict. of Musicians). Discordant and discordance differ from dissonant and dissonance in suggesting combinations of inharmonious tones that produce a jarring and highly disagreeable effect. "Dissonant tones are related, organized, musical; discordant tones (discords) are unrelated, unorganized, unmusical" (K. W. Gehrkens). In their general application, dissonant and dissonance commonly imply the disagreement of one thing with another; discordant and discordance commonly imply mutual variance or incongruity; as, opinions dissonant from truth; discordant views; the meeting was in confusion because of discordant opinions. "The smooth manner of the spy, curiously in dissonance with his ostentatiously rough dress" (Dickens). "They were in discordance with each other, from the first" (Newman). Ana. *Inconsonant.

Ant. Consonant. — Con. Harmonizing or harmonious, agreeing, according or accordant (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

distant. Distant, far, faraway, far-off, remote, removed agree in meaning not near or close, but separated by an obvious interval, especially in space or in time. Distant carries a stronger reference to the length of the interval (whether long or short) than the other terms; only when it directly qualifies a noun does it necessarily imply that the interval is markedly long; as, a book held six inches distant from the eyes; the sun is about 93,000,000 miles distant from the earth; a distant city; a distant prospect; at a distant date. "I do not ask to see The distant scene,—one step enough for me" (Newman). Far, except for the possible reference to a short distance involved in the question "How far!", applies (as adverb as well as adjective) only to what is a long way off; as, "[He] took his journey into a far country" (Luke xv. 13); to take a far view; "As far as the east is from the west" (Psalms ciii. 12); "Across the hills, and far away Beyond their utmost purple rim" (Tennyson). Faraway and far-off not only mean extremely far, but they are preferred when distance in time is specifically implied; as, "far-away ancestors" (G. Eliot); "Old, unhappy, far-off things, And battles long ago" (Wordsworth); however, both may suggest distance in space; as, "a cheer that started the echo in a far-away hill" (Stevenson); "the far-off places in which he had been wandering" (Dickens). Remote suggests a far removal, especially from something regarded as a center or vantage ground, such as one's present location, one's point of view, one's time, or the like; as, "some forlorn and naked hermitage, Remote from all the pleasures of the world" (Shak.); "the sands Of a remote and lonely shore" (Shelley); "Dunstan, whose nature it was to care more for immediate annoyances than for remote consequences" (G. Eliot). Removed, which is commonly a predicative adjective, carries a stronger implication of separateness and distinction than remote; it therefore usually implies a contrast between two things apart not only in space or in time but in character or quality; as, an age far removed from the present age in its accomplishments and ideals; he sought a retreat removed from all centers of population.

Figuratively, distant implies slightness of connection or aloofness of manner; as, a distant resemblance; a distant nod, reception: remote imputes to the thing so described a foreign or alien character or an inaccessible nature; as, "I told Oliver about your modern monastery; but the thing is too remote from his experience to have any interest for him" (Santayana); "The captain of a ship at sea is a remote, inaccessible creature... alone of his kind, depending on nobody" (Conrad): removed stresses difference, often a diametrical or antithetical difference; as, "To Queen Scheherazade the dream might have seemed not far removed from commonplace" (Hardy); he accepted the nomination for considerations entirely removed from those influencing the average candidate.

Con. Near, *close, high, near-by.

distasteful. Obnoxious, *repugnant, repellent, abhorrent, invidious.

Ana. *Hateful, odious, detestable, abominable: *offensive, loathsome, repulsive, repugnant, revolting.

Ant. Agreeable: palatable. — Con. *Pleasant, pleasing, gratifying, grateful, welcome: delectable, *delightful, delicious.

distemper. Complaint, *disease, malady, ailment, affection.

distend. Swell, dilate, *expand, inflate, amplify.

Ana. Enlarge, *increase, augment: *extend, lengthen.

Ant. Constrict. — Con. *Contract, shrink, compress, condense, deflate.

distinct. 1 Distinct, separate, several, discrete come into comparison when used in reference to two or more things (sometimes persons) and in the sense of not individually the same. Distinct always implies a capacity for being distinguished by the eye or by the mind as apart from the other or others, sometimes in space or in time, but more often in character, nature, or identity; as, I see three distinct objects in the distance, but I cannot identify them; the novel has two related, but nevertheless distinct, plots; "There has been endless discussion whether we have a distinct faculty for the knowledge of God" (Inge); "for him the work of literature is not distinct or separable from its author" (L. P. Smith). Separate (as here considered: see also SINGLE) is often used interchangeably with distinct and often in combination with it, as if one strengthened the other; as, "the power... is given in two separate and distinct sections of the constitution" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "these two characteristics were not separate and distinct... they were held together in vital tension" (H. Ellis). But separate stresses, as distinct does not, the lack of a connection between the things considered, usually by reason of the distance in space or time or the difference in identity of the things in question; thus, a drama with two separate plots is not the same as one with two distinct plots, for the former expression implies no connection (or, often, merely a factitious connection) between the plots, and the latter suggests only that they can be distinguished. "I can agree with Eliot's statement that 'the more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates,' but it must be realized that 'separate' means 'distinct,' and not 'unconnected'" (Day Lewis); "the reestablishment of ethics and esthetics as separate and autonomous realms" (J. W. Krutch). Separate is also often used in preference to distinct when an opposition to common, shared, or the like, is implied; as, please give us separate (not distinct) rooms; the children had separate toys and separate books. Several (as here considered: see also MANY) is now archaic in this sense, but it occurs frequently in the work of the great English writers of the past. The term implies an existence, a character, a status, or a location separate or distinct from that of the others. Unlike respective (see SPECIAL), which it sometimes resembles, it may modify a singular noun, especially when "each" precedes, as well as a plural noun; as, "conduct These knights unto their several lodgings" (Shak.); "Each individual seeks a several goal" (Pope). Discrete, even more than separate, implies that the individuals are not the same and are not connected: it is, however, often more precise than separate because it stresses numerical distinctness (that is, distinctness as individuals) rather than difference in kind, nature, goal, or the like; thus, discrete things may be exactly the same in appearance, nature, or value, but they are not selfsame and are physically disconnected; so, "The books on a shelf are not merely discrete" (Bosanquet); "According to which [Einstein's theory of light quanta] all radiation consisted of discrete bullet-like units" (Jeans). "[The phage] has been identified as existing in discrete units, that is, it is a particle like granulated sugar and not a continuum like molasses" (C. C. Furnas).

Ana. Individual, distinctive, peculiar (see CHARACTERISTIC): *single, sole, separate, particular: particular, individual, *special, especial, concrete, respective: *different, diverse, disparate, divergent.

Con. *Same, selfsame, identical.

2 *Evident, manifest, patent, obvious, apparent, palpable, plain, clear.

Ana. Defined, prescribed (see PRESCRIBE): *explicit, definite, express, specific, categorical: perspicuous, *clear, lucid: clear-cut, *incisive, trenchant.

Ant. Indistinct: nebulous. — Con. Vague, *obscure, dark, enigmatic, cryptic.

distinction. Difference, divergence, *dissimilarity, unlikeness.

Ant. Resemblance. — Con. *Likeness, similarity, analogy, similitude, affinity.

distinctive. Peculiar, individual, *characteristic.

Ana. *Special, particular, specific, especial: unique, particular, separate, *single: *distinct, separate, several, discrete.

Ant. Typical. — Con. *Common, ordinary, familiar, popular, vulgar: *similar, like, alike, identical, comparable, parallel, analogous: *same, equivalent, equal: generic, general, *universal.

distinguished. Eminent, illustrious, renowned, noted, celebrated, *famous, famed, notorious.

Ana. Outstanding, prominent, remarkable, conspicuous (see NOTICEABLE).

Ant. Commonplace.

distort. Contort; warp, gnarl, *deform.

Ana. Twist, bend, turn, *curve: disfigure, disfigure, *deface: *injure, damage, mar, impair: misinterpret, misconstrue (see affirmative verbs at EXPLAIN).

distract. Bewilder, nonplus, confound, dumfound, mystify, perplex, *puzzle.

Ana. *Confuse, muddle, bemuddle, addle, fuddle, befuddle: baffle, balk (see FRUSTRATE): agitate, upset, fluster, flurry, perturb, *discompose.

Ant. Collect (one's thoughts, one's powers, etc.).

distrait. Distracted, absent-minded, absent, *abstracted, preoccupied.

Ana., Ant., & Con. See those at DISTRAUGHT.

distracted. Distracted, absent-minded, absent, *abstracted, preoccupied.

Ana. Distracted, bewildered, nonplused (see PUZZLE, v.): muddled, addled, confused (see CONFUSE): agitated, perturbed, discomposed, flustered (see DISCOMPOSE).

Ant. Collected. — Con. *Cool, composed, unruffled, imperturbable, nonchalant.

distress, n. Distress, suffering, misery, agony, dolor (or dolour), passion agree in denoting the state of one that is in sore trouble or in pain of mind or body. Distress, in precise use, commonly implies conditions or circumstances that cause physical or mental stress or strain; usually also it connotes the possibility of relief or the need of assistance. "To pity distress is human; to relieve it is Godlike" (Horace Mann). The word is applicable to things as well as to persons; thus, a ship in distress is helpless and in peril because of some untoward circumstances such as a breakdown in machinery or the loss of necessary equipment; a community's distress may be the result of a disaster or any event bringing devastation with it or imposing extreme hardships on the people. When used to designate a mental state, distress usually implies the stress or strain of fear, anxiety, shame, or the like. "The original shock and distress that were caused by the first serious work of scholars on the Bible" (C. E. Montague). "It had evidently been a great distress to him, to have the days of his imprisonment recalled" (Dickens). Suffering is used especially in reference to human beings; often it implies conscious awareness of pain or distress and conscious endurance. "Extreme sensibility to physical suffering...characterises modern civilisation" (Inge). Therefore, it often comes close to trial, tribulation, and cross in its suggestions of merit won through acceptance. "I know no one...better prepared by habitual suffering to receive and enjoy felicity" (Austen). "Our present joys are sweeter for past pain; To love and Heaven by suffering we attain" (G. Granville). Misery stresses the unhappy or wretched conditions attending distress or suffering; it often connotes sordidness, or dolefulness, or abjectness, or the like. "For bleak, unadulterated misery that dâk-bungalow was the worst...I had ever set foot in" (Kipling). "She had...cheated and shamed herself...exchanged content for misery and pride for humiliation" (Bennett). Agony suggests suffering so intense that both body and mind are involved in a struggle to endure the unbearable. "His mood was often like a fiend, and rose And drove him into wastes and solitudes For agony" (Tennyson). Dolor, which is now archaic or poetic, is applicable chiefly to mental suffering that involves sorrow or intense anxiety. "Spending his daies in dolour and despaire" (Spenser). Passion is now rarely used in this sense except in reference to the events beginning with the agony of Jesus in the garden at Gethsemane and culminating in his crucifixion. Sometimes it is restricted to the crucifixion and its attendant agony.

Ana. Affliction, *trial, tribulation: *sorrow, grief, anguish, woe: straits, pass, pinch, exigency (see JUNCTURE): hardship, *difficulty, rigor, vicissitude: *pain, pang, ache.

Con. Comforting or comfort, solacing or solace, consolation (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT): alleviation, assuagement, mitigation, allaying, relieving or relief (see corresponding verbs at RELIEVE).

distress, v. *Trouble, ail.

Ana. *Afflict, try, torment, torture, rack, grill: *worry, annoy, harass, harry, plague, pester: *depress, oppress, weigh (on or upon).

Con. *Comfort, console, solace: *help, aid, assist: *relieve, alleviate, lighten, mitigate, assuage, allay.

distribute. Distribute, dispense, divide, deal, dole come into comparison when they mean to give as his share to each of many or to all within expressed or implied limits, or, less often, to one of many. Distribute basically implies an apportioning among many by separation of something into parts, units, or amounts, and by assigning each part, unit, or amount to the proper person or place: beyond this, it may imply any of several immediate purposes; thus, to distribute one's possessions among one's heirs is to give (by will, usually) each of those heirs such a part or portion of one's estate as one deems proper; to distribute handbills is to pass them out one by one to individuals or to leave them one by one at the entrances to houses or to apartments; to distribute one's guests at a huge reception is to cause them to separate into smaller groups throughout one's home or grounds; to distribute fertilizer is to spread or scatter it over a garden or piece of cultivated land; to distribute profits among employees is to give each one some part or portion of them; to distribute type is to return each piece of used type to its proper compartment in a case; to distribute the burdens in an emergency is to give each person affected his due share of extra work or responsibility. "The old habit of centralizing a strain at one point, and then dividing and subdividing it, and distributing it on visible lines of support to a visible foundation" (H. Adams). "All modern societies aim...to distribute impartially to all the burdens and advantages of the state" (G. L. Dickinson). Dispense (as here compared: see also ADMINISTER, 1) differs from distribute in rarely implying a spreading out that affects a large number or a separation that reduces the size or amount of each part or portion: it does, however, usually suggest the giving of a carefully weighed or measured portion to each of a group as a right or as due, or as accordant to need; as, to dispense alms to the needy; "If every just man that now pines with want Had but a moderate and befitting share . . . Nature's full blessings would be well-dispensed" (Milton); "Let us . . . Receive whatever good 'tis given thee to dispense" (Wordsworth). Divide (as here compared: see also SEPARATE) stresses the separation of a whole into parts but it implies as the purpose of that separation a dispensing of those parts to, or a sharing of them by, each of a group, especially of persons, of communities, of institutions, or the like: the term usually implies, if the context gives no further information, that the parts are equal; as, he divided the residue among three charities; the three partners divide the profits of the business, the size of each share depending on the size of the partner's investment; he claimed that his confederates would not divide the booty fairly; "Of the rent, a large proportion was divided among the country gentlemen" (Macaulay). Deal (usually followed by out) in its earliest use stressed the division of something into shares or portions (as, "Ye shall deal among you their spoil and cattle"—Joshua viii. 2 [Coverdale edition]) but in its later and still current sense, it emphasizes the delivery of something piece by piece, or in suitable portions, to those who have a right to expect it; as, to deal the cards for a game of bridge; to deal out equipment and supplies to each soldier; "the king's pages . . . move through the crowd . . . dealing out water all round" (Arnold). Often, the term carries no suggestion of distribution, and means little more than to give or deliver; as, he dealt his opponent a blow; "Now give the ticket to Umballa." The babu scowled and dealt the proper ticket" (Kipling). Dole (also frequently followed by out) originally and still often implies a dispensing of alms to the needy (as, to dole out daily one thousand loaves of bread), but since in this sense it usually suggests a carefully measured portion, it now often suggests scantiness or niggardliness in the amount dispensed and does not necessarily suggest a charitable intent; as, "This comfort . . . she doled out to him in daily portions" (Fielding); "I can accept what is given in love and affection to me, but I could not accept what is doled out grudgingly or with conditions" (Wilde). Ana. Apportion, *allot, allocate, assign: ration, portion, parcel, prorate, *apportion: *administer, dispense. Ant. Collect (supplies, etc.): amass (wealth, a fortune, etc.). — Con. *Gather, assemble: *accumulate, hoard.

district. *Locality, vicinage, vicinity, neighborhood.

Ana. *Area, tract, region, zone, belt: section, sector, division, parcel (see PART, n.): *field, province, territory, sphere.

distrust, v. Distrust, mistrust come into comparison both as verbs meaning to lack trust or confidence in someone or something, and as nouns denoting such a lack of trust or confidence. Distrust, however, implies far more certitude that something is wrong than mistrust; often it suggests conviction of another's guilt, treachery, weakness, or the like. "Octavius had imbibed sufficient philosophy to distrust the sword as a cure for all ills" (Buchan). "The same distrust and horror of the unnatural forms into which life for the majority of people is being forced" (Day Lewis). Mistrust suggests domination by suspicion and, usually, fear. "He took me into a place so wild that a man less accustomed to these things might have mistrusted and feared for his life" (Cather). "Something . . . roused in him a suspicion that in the near future he was not going to have matters quite so much his own way. However, he concealed his mistrust as well as he could" (C. Mackenzie).

Con. *Rely, trust, depend, count, bank, reckon: confide, entrust, *commit, consign.

distrust, n. Mistrust (see under DISTRUST, v.).

Ana. Doubt, *uncertainty, dubiety, dubiousity, suspicion: *apprehension, foreboding, misgiving, presentiment.

Con. See those at DAILY.

diuturnal. *Secular, centuried, age-long, aeonian.

Ana. Eternal, *infinite: *everlasting, endless.

divagation. *Digression, episode, excursus.

diverge. *Swerve, veer, deviate, depart, digress.

Ana. Differ from (see DIFFER): divide, part, *separate.

Ant. Converge (as paths, roads, times, etc.): conform (as customs, habits, practices, etc.).

divergence or divergency. 1 *Deviation, deflection, aberration.

Ana. Division, separation, parting (see corresponding verbs at SEPARATE): differing from, differing with (see DIFFER).

Ant. Convergence. — Con. Agreement, concurrence, coincidence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

2 Difference, *dissimilarity, unlikeness, distinction.

Ana. Diversity, *variety.

Ant. Conformity, correspondence. — Con. Consonance, accord, *harmony, concord.

divergent. *Different, diverse, disparate, various.

Ana. *Opposite, contradictory, contrary, antithetical.

Ant. Convergent. — Con. *Similar, like, parallel, identical, uniform.

divers. *Many, several, sundry, various, numerous, manifold, multifold, multifarious.

diverse. *Different, divergent, disparate, various.

Ana. Contrasted or contrasting (see corresponding verb at COMPARE): contrary, *opposite, contradictory: *distinct, separate.

Ant. Identical, selfsame. — Con. *Same, equivalent, equal.

diversion. Amusement, recreation, entertainment. See under AMUSE, v.

Ana. *Play, sport, disport (see under PLAY, v.): levity, frivolity (see LIGHTNESS).

diversity. *Variety.

Ana. Intuition, understanding (see REASON).

divine, adj. *Holy, sacred, spiritual, religious, blessed.

divine, v. *Foresee, foreknow, apprehend, anticipate.

Ana. Discern, perceive, descry (see SEE): predict, prophesy, prognosticate, presage (see FORETELL) division. Section, segment, sector, *part, portion, piece, detail, member, fraction, fragment, parcel.

divorce, v. *Separate, sever, sunder, part, divide.

Ana. Dissolve (see LIQUEFY): alienate, *estrangle, wean, disaffect.

divulge. Tell, disclose, *reveal, betray, bewray, discover.

Ana. Impart, *communicate: announce, *declare, publish, advertise, proclaim: blab, tattle, *gossip.

doat. Variant of DOTE.

docile. *Obedient, biddable, tractable, amenable.

Ana. *Compliant, acquiescent: pliant, pliable, adaptable (see PLASTIC): yielding, submitting or submissive (see corresponding verbs at YIELD).

Ant. Indocile: unruly, ungovernable. — Con. Intractable, refractory, recalcitrant, willful, headstrong (see UNRULY): stubborn, *obstinate.

doctrinaire. Dogmatic, magisterial, magistral, oracular, *dictatorial, authoritative, authoritarian.

doctrine. Doctrine, dogma, tenet are synonymous only when they agree in meaning a principle (usually one of a series or of a body of principles) accepted as authoritative by members of a church, a school of philosophers, a branch of science, or the like. Doctrine is often used in a much less restricted sense to denote a formulated theory that is supported by evidence, backed by authority, and proposed for acceptance; as, the doctrine of evolution; Einstein's doctrine of relativity. In the narrower sense in which the word is here considered, doctrine retains its etymological implication of authoritative teaching, but it presupposes acceptance by a body of believers or adherents; as, a catechism of Christian doctrines (or doctrine). "A...mathematical doctrine of waves which nowadays has almost come to dominate...physics" (Karl K. Darrow). Dogma also stresses authoritative teaching but unlike doctrine it seldom, if ever, implies proposal for acceptance. A dogma is not advanced as reasonable and worthy of acceptance, but laid down as true and beyond dispute; as, the dogmas of a church are usually stated in a creed or confession; in 1870, Pope Pius IX defined the dogma of papal infallibility. In extended use, dogma (or especially its derivative dogmatic) often connotes insistence, sometimes arrogant insistence, on authority or imposition by authority; as, the dogma that the king can do no wrong. Tenet emphasizes acceptance and belief rather than teaching. It is therefore thought of as a principle held or adhered to, and implies a body of adherents; as, the tenets of modern Socialism are not in every instance identical with the doctrines of Karl Marx.

Ana. Teaching, instruction (see corresponding verbs at TEACH): *creed, confession, symbol, catechism: *principle, fundamental.

document. 1 Document, monument, muniment, record, archive are here compared as denoting something preserved and serving as evidence, as of an event or a situation, or of the thought of its time. Document, except in extended use, commonly designates anything written or printed, such as a letter, a charter, a deed, a will, or a book, or anything carrying an inscription, such as a coin, a tombstone, or a medal, that has value as evidence because of its contemporaneity. "While the poor little affairs of obscure, industrious men of letters are made the subject of intensive research, the far more romantic, thrilling and illuminating documents about the seekers and makers of great fortunes, are neither gathered nor cherished" (H. G. Wells). "The Waste Land" seems to me chiefly important as a social document. It gives an authentic impression of the mentality of educated people in the psychological slump that took place immediately after the war" (Day Lewis). Monument is applicable to anything that serves as a memorial of the past; it may be applied to a written document. "All our monuments [surviving legal documents] bear a strong evidence to this change [in the laws]" (Burke). However, it is more often applied to any building, work of art, or other relic of the past, especially one that serves as a reminder of a country's greatness, a nation's triumphs in war, a period's accomplishments in art, or the like; as, the French government has taken over many of the ancient cathedrals in order to preserve them as public monuments. "The English Church has no literary monument equal to that of Dante, no intellectual monument equal to that of St. Thomas, no devotional monument equal to that of St. John of the Cross" (T. S. Eliot). Muniment, which is sometimes confused with monument, is the most restricted in meaning of these words, for it is correctly applied only to certain written documents, chiefly title deeds, charters, etc., which are preserved as evidence of ownership, and can be used in the defense of one's claims. The word is now found chiefly in historical writing, especially in combinations such as muniment chest. "The muniment-room of a Catholic family in Lancashire" (Buchan). Record implies the intent to preserve as evidence of something; it therefore names something (either an item, or in a collective sense, all the items) written down so that exact knowledge of what has occurred will be perpetuated; as, to keep a record of a conversation; the records of the trial were destroyed in a fire; "there was no record...of any prisoner with those initials" (Dickens). "It is not only the right, but it is the judicial duty of the court, to examine the whole case as presented by the record" (Ch. Just. Taney). Archive (see also MUSEUM) implies preservation, sometimes, but far from invariably, with the intent to provide material for future use by historians or scholars; it is applicable to any document, record, or muniment that is so kept, especially throughout a long period. Its more common plural form archives suggests a miscellaneous accumulation, rather than a carefully selected collection, of papers; as, the archives of the Vatican are now accessible to scholars. "The archives of every city" (Dryden). "Some rotten archive, rummaged out of some seldom-explored press" (Lamb). Ana. *Evidence, testimony.

domicile. Residence, abode, home, house, *habitation, dwelling.

dominant. Dominant, predominant, paramount, preponderant, preponderating, sovereign agree in meaning superior to all others in power, influence, position, or the like. That is dominant which is thought of as (especially figuratively) ruling or commanding, or as uppermost; as, the dominant race; "The idea of beauty and of a human nature perfect on all its sides, which is the dominant idea of poetry" (Arnold). That is predominant which is for the time being in the ascendant or exerts the most marked influence; as, "The power of . . . modifying a series of thoughts by some one predominant thought or feeling" (Coleridge); "A variety of subjects . . . in which no particular one is predominant" (Cowper); "The painter whose predominant aim is moral instruction" (Binyon).

That is paramount which has pre-eminence or supremacy in importance, order, rank, or jurisdiction; as, "Hengist, wishing to become paramount in southern Britain" (Borrow); "Men to whom forms are of paramount importance" (N. Hawthorne). "According as one or other of these [modes of entertaining propositions] is paramount within him, a man is a skeptic . . . a philosopher . . . or . . . a believer . . . Many minds of course there are, which are not under the predominant influence of any one of the three" (Newman). That is preponderant or preponderating which outweighs or overbalances every other thing of its kind as in power, influence, or force: these terms are commonly used without clear distinction in meaning, but preponderating sometimes suggests active operation (as, the preponderating tendency), and preponderant the actual effect (as, for several years, this political party has been the preponderant party in the affairs of the nation; the preponderant influence of a group of banks). That is sovereign (as here considered: see also FREE) to which every other comparable thing is subordinate, inferior, or of lower value: the term therefore imputes unquestioned supremacy to the thing so described; as, the Sovereign Ruler of the universe; the sovereign power in the United States of America is vested in the people; to seek the sovereign good; a sovereign remedy; "Wearing . . . an amulet Sovereign against all passion" (Browning).

dominion. 1 Control, command, sway, authority, jurisdiction, *power.

Ana. Ascendancy, *supremacy: sovereignty (see under FREE, adj.).

2 *Possession, dependency, territory, colony, protectorate, mandate.

donate. Present, bestow, *give, confer, afford.

Ana. *Grant, accord, award.

donation. Donation, benefaction, contribution, aims are comparable when they denote a gift of money or its equivalent for a charitable, philanthropic, or similar object. Donation, though often used loosely for any such gift, is in discriminating usage applied only to a gift of substantial value, presented more or less publicly, and usually without reference to other givers or gifts. Originally, the word denoted the act or right of presenting something at the disposal of a powerful person, such as a king, a lord, or a patron; in modern times the word more often designates the thing presented, but careful writers and speakers still remember that it implies wealth and power in the giver; as, the endowment funds of the great universities are increased mainly by donations and bequests; a list of the Rockefeller donations. Benefaction is often used in place of donation, especially when there is the intent to compliment the donor and to imply his benevolence or the beneficence of his gift. The latter, however, is the basic implication and the word may be correctly used of any benefit conferred or received whether it has money value or not; as, her benefactions are remembered by many philanthropic agencies; her example was a benefaction. "Sometimes give your services [as a physician] for nothing, calling to mind a previous benefaction or present satisfaction" (Precepts of Hippocrates). Contribution implies participation in giving; when used in the sense here considered, it is applicable to small as well as large amounts of money; it is the modest term which one may apply to his own gift, though others may rightly call it a donation or benefaction; as, please accept my contribution to the endowment fund of your institution; a community chest contribution. Alms, the oldest of these words in English, is somewhat archaic. It now always implies the aim of relieving poverty; in the older use it also implied the fulfillment of a religious obligation or a practical manifestation of the virtue of charity. "The gift without the giver is bare; Who gives himself with his alms feeds three,—Himself, his hungering neighbor, and me [Christ]" (J. R. Lowell). In more modern use, it often is applied to the petty sums given beggars or paupers. "Though poor And forced to live on alms" (Wordsworth). "Scorning an alms" (Tennyson).

Ana. Destiny, appoint, prescribe (see corresponding adjectives at PRESCRIBED).

door. Door, gate, portal, postern, doorway, gateway are here compared chiefly as meaning an entrance to a place. Door, in literal use, applies chiefly to the movable and usually swinging barrier which is set in the opening which serves as an entrance to a building or to any room or apartment in a building; as, an oak door; the front door of a house; sometimes, door is used also of the opening; as, the children came running through the door. Gate, in literal use, applies often to an opening in a wall, fence, or other enclosure, especially one surrounding a tract of land in which a building or group of buildings is located, but it more commonly implies reference not only to the opening but to the movable and often swinging barrier (especially one made of a grating or open frame, or a heavy or rough structure) set in it and closed or opened at will; as, the north gate to the campus; he is now opening the garden gate. Portal applies usually to an elaborate and stately door or gate, with its surrounding framework, if any; as, the portal to the temple; the knights were admitted through the portal to the palace. Postern applies to a private or retired door or gate, such as one at the back of a castle or fortress. Doorway and gateway apply not so much to the structure as to the passage when a door (in the case of doorway) or a gate (in the case of gateway) is opened for ingress or egress; as, to stand in the doorway awaiting the postman; the automobiles passed through the gateway in constant succession.

In their literary, and usually figurative, use, these words are still more sharply distinguished. Door usually applies to that which provides opportunity to enter or withdraw or makes possible an entrance or exit; as, "The love of books, the golden key That opens the enchanted door" (A. Lang); "I know death hath ten thousand several doors For men to take their exit" (J. Webster). Gate differs from door chiefly in its connotations of facility in admission or of entrance into that which constitutes a wide, or even infinite, expanse; as, "What sweet contentments doth the soul enjoy by the senses! They are the gates and windows of its knowledge" (W. Drummond); "Their lot Forbad [the dead in the country churchyard] to wade through slaughter to a throne, And shut the gates of mercy on mankind" (Gray). Portal often carries similar connotations, but it usually applies to a definite place or thing which is itself splendid or magnificent and through which something, such as the sun at rising and at setting, is admitted or allowed exit; as, "Heaven, That opened wide her blazing portals" (Milton); "Since your name will grow with time . . . have I made the name A golden portal to my rhyme" (Tennyson). Postern, on the other hand, implies inconspicuousness or, in some contexts, a hidden means of entrance or escape. "It finds a readier way to our sympathy through a postern which we cannot help leaving sometimes on the latch, than through the ceremonious portal of classical prescription" (J. R. Lowell). Gateway is usually preferred to doorway in figurative use because it more strongly suggests a passage through which entrance is gained to that which is desirable or difficult; as, "Yea, the gateway [the Panama Canal] shall be free Unto all, from sea to sea" (J. J. Roche).

Ana. *Entrance, entry, entree, ingress, access.

double-entendre, double entente. Equivocation, *ambiguity, tergiversation, amphibology, amphibologism.

doubt, n. *Uncertainty, skepticism, suspicion, mistrust, dubiety, dubiosity.

Ana. Dubiousness, doubtfulness, questionableness (see corresponding adjectives at DOUBTFUL): incredulity, *unbelief, disbelief.

Ant. Certitude: confidence. — Con. *Certainty, conviction, assurance: *trust, reliance, dependence, faith.

doubtful. Doubtful, dubious, problematical (or problematic), questionable are here compared in the sense, in which they are applied to things (sometimes persons), of not affording one certainty of its (or his) worth, soundness, or the like. Doubtful and dubious are sometimes used with little distinction not only in this sense, but as applied to the person who is uncertain. Doubtful, however, is commonly so positive in its implication of uncertainty as almost to impute worthlessness, dishonesty, invalidity, or the like, to the thing in question; dubious stresses suspicion, mistrust, or hesitation in accepting, believing, following, choosing, or the like; thus, a man of doubtful repute is by implication more distrusted than one of dubious repute; to be doubtful of the outcome of a project is by implication to have better grounds for fearing its failure than to be dubious about it, for the latter may imply mere vague suspicions and fears and little evidence; so, a doubtful or a dubious prospect; a dubious transaction; a doubtful title to an estate; dubious friends. "Whispers and glances were interchanged, accompanied by shrugs and dubious shakes of the head" (Irving). Problematical is the only one of the terms here considered that is free from a suggestion of a moral judgment or suspicion: it is especially applicable to things whose existence, meaning, fulfillment, realization, is very uncertain, sometimes so uncertain that the probabilities of truth and of falsehood, or of success and of failure, or the like, are nearly equal. "Problematical points, of which, either side may be true... should not extinguish particular charity towards one another" (Donne). "The very existence of any such individual [Homer]... is more than problematical" (Coleridge). "Excellent acoustics, always so problematical a quality in halls built for the hearing of music" (E. Wharton). Questionable may imply little more than the existence of doubt respecting the thing so qualified; as, the legality of this action is questionable; a questionable theory. In its commonest use, however, questionable is euphemistic, or was originally euphemistic, for immoral, low, improper, rude, unsound, untrue, or the like: the term implies suspicions so well grounded as to be accepted as facts but, nevertheless, not to be asserted except in a guarded statement; thus, to say that a man is a questionable character is to cast a reflection on his honesty or morality; questionable dealings suggest underhandedness and dishonesty; so, women of questionable virtue. "The propriety of Lydia's manners was at least questionable" (Shaw). "The illustration is questionable, but the notion implied may be sound" (S. Alexander).

Ana. Distrusting or distrustful, mistrusting or mistrustful (see corresponding verbs at DISTRUST): *fearful, apprehensive, afraid.

Ana. Slovenly, *slipshod, unkempt, sloppy.

Ant. Smart (in dress, appearance). — Con. Fashionable, *stylish, modish, chic: flashy, *gaudy, garish.

dower, v. Dower, endow, endue come into comparison as meaning to furnish or provide with a gift. Dower literally implies the provision of the dowry which a woman brings to a husband in marriage; as, a well-dowered bride. In its extended sense, dower implies the bestowal of any gift, talent, or the like; as, poets dowered with genius; Nature had dowered her with beauty. Endow, in the earliest of its English senses, implied the bestowing of money or property on a person or institution for its support or maintenance. This sense still prevails; as, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow" (Anglican Marriage Service); to erect and endow a hospital; a large bequest sufficient to endow the new college. Endue (etymologically a different word from endow) in the earliest of its current senses means to clothe or invest with something, such as a garment, a dignity, a right, a possession, or the like; as, "a loose gown... such as elderly gentlemen loved to endue themselves with" (N. Hawthorne); "to make him a citizen of the United States, and endue him with the full rights of citizenship" (Ch. Just. Taney); "A new and penetrating light descends on the spectacle, enduing men and things with a seeming transparency" (Hardy). But endue early in its history became confused with endow and dower; as, "And Leah said, God hath endued me with a good dowry" (Genesis xxx. 20). This confusion with the literal senses is now rare, but the confusion of endue with endow in its extended sense of to bestow upon one a faculty, power, or other spiritual or mental gift, has continued so that it is difficult to trace any differences in meaning between the two words. But endow in very precise use usually implies a permanent enriching, and endue an investing or clothing (either temporarily or permanently) with a specific quality or character; as, "those who are the most richly endowed by nature, and accomplished by their own industry" (Spectator); "For learning endueth men's minds with a true sense of the frailty of their persons... and the dignity of their soul and vocation" (Bacon); "finer faculties with which the continued process of evolution may yet endow the race" (C. E. Montague); "The [French] Revolution awakened it [French democracy] into consciousness... and endued it with efficient force" (Brownell).

dramatic. Dramatic, theatrical, dramaturgic (or dramaturgical), melodramatic, histrionic are not close synonyms although all imply special reference to plays as produced by actors and actresses or to the effects which are produced by acted plays. Dramatic, when it denotes something more than relationship to the drama as written or as produced (as, a dramatic critic; a dramatic performance) implies an effect or a combination of effects appropriate to the drama or a representation of a drama, such as a stirring of the imagination and emotions by vivid and expressive action, speech, and gesture, or by the exciting complications of a plot; as, the dramatic appeal of a great orator; "the dramatic story-telling... of incidents which have a sympathetic hero" (B. Russell). "An idyll of Theocritus... is today as much alive as the most dramatic passages of the 'Iliad'—stirs the reader's feeling quite as much" (Cather). Theatrical, when it denotes something more than relationship to the theater (as, a theatrical office; a theatrical agent), implies effects appropriate to the theater as the place where plays are produced, and to the demands which its limitations, its conventions, and, often, its need of financial success, make both upon a play and its performance; the term therefore usually implies a marked degree of artificiality or conventionality, a direct and sometimes a blatant appeal to the senses and emotions, and often an overdoing or exaggeration in gesture, in speech, in action, and the like; as, "The situations [in Wilkie Collins's The New Magdalen] are in the most effective sense dramatic, without being in the profounder sense dramatic" (T. S. Eliot); "He had already learned that with this people religion was necessarily theatrical" (Cather). Dramaturgic is now often used in place of theatrical when the more or less derogatory connotations of that word are to be avoided and the emphasis is upon those elements in a play which fit it for representation in a theater; as, poetic plays are often lacking in dramaturgic quality; a play that is said to be "good theater" is both dramatic and dramaturgic in its character. Melodramatic implies a manner characteristic of the sensational and usually sentimental melodrama; the term commonly connotes exaggerated emotionalism or inappropriate theatricalism; as, to make a melodramatic speech; to employ melodramatic gestures. Histrionic, etymologically of or characteristic of actors, is more limited than theatrical for it implies reference to the tones of voice, gestures, movements, and appearance characteristic of actors, especially in older times before realism was attempted in dramatic performances; as, "Good looks are more desired than histrionic skill" (Shaw); "A tall, histrionic, dark man with a tossing mane" (S. E. White).

drug, n. Drug, medicinal, pharmaceutical, biological, simple come into comparison when they denote a substance used by itself or in a mixture with other substances as a medicine or medicament or in the diagnosis, prevention, or mitigation of disease. Drug is the ordinary comprehensive term in both general and professional use for any such substance, whether of vegetable, animal, or mineral origin, or produced synthetically. The term is referable to a wide variety of substances, as, for example, spermaceti (a waxy solid obtained from the oil of the sperm whale and used in making ointments), pepsin (a preparation derived from the stomachs of certain animals and used as a digestive), belladonna (the dried roots and leaves of the plant of that name used in relieving pain or in dilating the pupils of the eye), cascara sagrada (the dried bark of the California buckthorn used as a laxative), sulphur (a mineral used in medicine to induce perspiration, to promote the healing of lesions, etc.), and aspirin (a compound produced synthetically used in relieving pain and in reducing fever). Since drug is also specifically used to designate any habit-forming narcotic, and since some substances such as spermaceti and sulphur have other uses than in the preparation of medicines and medicaments, medicinal is often preferred to drug, especially in commerce, in manufacture, and in law, where indication of the ultimate use of the substance is for one reason or another desirable; as, exports of medicinals to China; medicinals are not contraband. Pharmaceutical is also often preferred to drug by pharmacists and manufacturers, especially as a designation of drugs which are commercially refined or prepared or synthetically manufactured, such as quinine, cod liver oil, and aspirin. The term is also used to distinguish medicinals, or strictly therapeutic substances, from other substances of similar origin or composition; as, pharmaceuticals, dyes, and cosmetics. Biological is the increasingly frequent designation for any of certain therapeutic products such as insulin, adrenalin, or thyroxine, derived from substances produced by living organisms. Simple is the archaic designation for any vegetable drug, such as dried roots, leaves, bark, or the like, used in compounding medicines or medicaments. It is also applied to a medicinal product made from one ingredient.

Ana. Medicine, medicament, *remedy, physis, specific, cure.

druggist, n. Druggist, pharmacist, pharmaceutical, apothecary, chemist agree in denoting one who deals in medicinal drugs. Druggist, the broadest of these terms, commonly designates the owner or operator of a store or wholesale house selling drugs or medicinal preparations. It is also loosely applied, instead of the precise terms pharmacist or pharmaceutist, to denote one who is skilled in compounding drugs and dispensing medicines prescribed by a physician. Pharmacist and pharmaceutist specifically imply, as druggist does not, special training in pharmacy, licensing following a test of one's qualifications, and professional standing. Apothecary, in early English use, was distinguished from druggist, the latter term then designating one who sold what are now called "crude drugs," herbs, roots, and other ingredients of medicines, and the former, one who compounded these ingredients or made them up into medicines. In somewhat later English use, an apothecary was a subordinate medical practitioner who prescribed as well as dispensed medicines. The term was employed until recently in the United States as a designation of a practitioner of pharmacy. In England, chemist is the popular or commercial equivalent of druggist.

drunk, adj. Drunk, drunken, intoxicated, inebriate, inebriated, tipsy, tight come into comparison when they mean conspicuously under the influence of liquor. Drunk and drunken are the plain-spoken, direct, and inclusive terms; as, drunk as a fiddler; drunk as a lord; dead drunk; "I have seen Sheridan drunk, too, with all the world; but his intoxication was that of Bacchus, and Porson's that of Silenus" (Byron). Drunk and drunken differ in that drunk is commonly used predicatively, while drunken is chiefly attributive; as, "They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man" (Psalms cvii. 27). Drunken frequently suggests habitual drinking to excess; it also applies to whatever pertains to or proceeds from intoxication; as, "Stephano, my drunken butler" (Shak.); "a drunken sleep" (Shak.); a drunken brawl. Intoxicated may be exactly synonymous with drunk, though it is generally felt to be a less offensive term and has thus come to be applied to a person but slightly under the influence of liquor. "My friend requested me to add, that he was firmly persuaded you were intoxicated during a portion of the evening, and possibly unconscious of the extent of the insult you were guilty of" (Dickens). Inebriate (now rare except in figurative use) and inebriated imply such a state of intoxication that exhilaration or undue excitement (sometimes, however, stupefaction) results; as, inebriated revelers. All these words are used in a figurative sense as implying excess of emotion; as, drunk with joy; "Drunk with divine enthusiasm" (Shelley); "Even a man like Novalis... could find no better name for him [Spinoza] than a Gott trunken Mann—a God intoxicated man" (Froude); "the rush of men Inebriate with rage" (Shelley); "a sweet inebriated ecstasy" (Crashaw). Tipsy implies a degree of intoxication that deprives one of muscular control, or, sometimes, of mental control; tight, a slang term, usually implies obvious intoxication, but does not suggest loss of power over one's muscles. There are many slang terms that imply intoxication: most of them, such as spifficated (or spifficated), soused, lit, and blotto are strong in their implications, suggesting loss of powers of locomotion, recognition, speech, and the like.

Ana. Fuddled, befuddled, bemuddled, confused (see CONFUSE): maudlin, soppy (see SENTIMENTAL).

Ant. Sober.

drunkard. Drunkard, inebriate, alcoholic, dipsomaniac, sot, soak, toper, tosspot, tippler designate one who drinks to excess. Drunkard, the common word, implies frequency of intoxication; inebriate, a habitually intoxicated condition; alcoholic, a more or less impaired body or mind; dipsomaniac, a morbid, uncontrollable, sometimes periodical, sometimes constant, craving for strong drink. Sot suggests dissoluteness and utter degradation; soak, a slang term, extreme dissipation. Toper, tosspot, tippler all imply habits of drinking; toper suggests the habitué of taverns or saloons and drinking with treating crowds; tossot evokes the image of heavy drinking, and often also connotes conviviality; tippler carries the idea of light but constant and, often, secret drinking.

Ant. Teetotaler.

drunken. Drunk, intoxicated, inebriate, inebriated, tipsy, tight.*

Ana. & Ant. See those at DRUNK.

dry, adj. 1 Dry, arid agree in meaning devoid of moisture. Dry may suggest freedom from moisture, often noticeable moisture, as merely a characteristic or as a desirable state (as, a dry climate; dry clothing; dry land; dry provisions; dry floors); it may suggest deficiency of moisture, or the lack of normal or necessary moisture (as, dry soil; a dry summer; dry berries); it may suggest exhaustion or dissipation of water or other liquid (as, a dry fountain pen; a dry pond; a dry well; dry bones). Arid always implies destitution or deprivation of moisture and therefore extreme, not relative, dryness. In its chief applications to regions or territory, it suggests waste or desert land; as, the arid sections of the southwestern United States; arid plains; an arid condition of soil. In humorous use, both dry and arid sometimes imply a ban upon intoxicating liquors, but dry connotes the difficulty; arid, the impossibility, of procuring them; as, the dry era between 1920 and 1933; an arid town. In extended use, as applied to subjects, books, sermons, etc., dry suggests the lack of qualities which compel one's interest or one's attention; as, the course is dry but useful; "his [the businessman's] work is not necessarily dry; modern businesses tend to become...interesting and important" (Shaw). Arid, on the other hand, connotes absence of all qualities which mark the thing so qualified as worthwhile, fruitful, or significant; as, an arid treatise on poetry; a particularly arid discussion of poverty and its causes. As applied to persons, their manner, their words, and the like, dry implies a loss of normal (often youthful) human warmth, freshness, responsiveness, or enthusiasm; arid, an absence of these qualities or an incapacity for them. "His [Herbert Spencer's] dry schoolmaster temperament, the hurdy-gurdy monotony of him" (W. James). "Some arid matron made her rounds at dawn sniffing, peering, causing blue-nosed maids to scour" (V. Woolf). Specifically, dry often suggests the repression of feeling for the sake of outwardly appearing aloof or imperturbed; as, a dry joker; comments which did not seem to be censures because uttered in a dry tone of voice. Arid, on the other hand, often connotes a deadening of feeling, especially as shown by a loss of fervor or hope. "The flower of virtue and love blooming in an arid and desolate heart" (A. C. Benson). "If Shakespeare himself ever had that 'dark period'... it was at least no darkness like that bleak and arid despair which sometimes settles over modern spirits" (J. W. Krutch).

Ana. Barren, *bare, bald: dehydrated, desiccated, dried, parched, baked (see DRY, v.): drained, depleted, exhausted, impoverished (see DEplete): sapped (see WEAKEN).

Ant. Wet. — Con. Damp, moist, humid, dank (see WET): *tender, sympathetic, warm, responsive: exuberant, lush, luxuriant, prodigal, *profuse.

2 *Sour, acid, acidulous, tart.

Ant. Sweet (wine).

dry, v. Dry, desiccate, dehydrate, bake, parch come into comparison as meaning to treat or to affect so as to deprive of moisture. Dry is the comprehensive word which may be used without regard to the process naturally taking place or artificially brought about, such as evaporation (to dry apples; clothes dried in the wind), draining (to dry up a ditch; to dry up a suppurating wound), absorption (the ink has not dried; to dry dishes with a towel), solidification (linseed oil added to paint makes it dry more quickly), or firing (to dry bricks in a kiln). Desiccate is narrower in its range of reference for it implies a complete deprivation of moisture, especially of vital juices, and often therefore, in its common extended use, a withering or shriveling. Literally, it is chiefly applicable to animal and vegetable products preserved by thoroughly drying and sometimes shredding, mincing, or pulverizing; as, desiccated fish, coconut (meat), eggs. Figuratively, it is applied chiefly to persons, to their attitudes, activities, expression, and the like, which have lost all their spiritual or emotional freshness or vitality. "Analysis is desiccating and takes the bloom off things" (Babbitt). "They were all... living on the edge of their nerves, a harsh, angular, desiccated existence" (Van W. Brooks). Dehydrate suggests extraction or elimination of water, or, in chemistry, of hydrogen and oxygen in the proportion to form water; it is now often preferred to desiccate, of which it is a close synonym, when the reference is to foods, because it conveys no unpleasant connotations; as, to dehydrate phosphoric acid, salt, natural gas, vegetables. Bake, as here compared (see BAKE, 1), implies not only dehydrating by means of heat or firing, but a hardening or caking of that which is dried; as, sun-baked earth; to bake bricks. Parch stresses the destroying effect of drying by intense heat or drought; it is preferred to bake, therefore, when the restoration of the proper amount of water is necessary or highly desirable; as, parched fields; a parched throat. Ana. Drain, *deplete, exhaust: *wither, shrivel, rivel, wizen.

Ant. Moisten, wet.

dubiety. *Uncertainty, dubiousity, doubt, skepticism, suspicion, mistrust.

Ana. Hesitation, hesitancy: wavering, vacillation, faltering (see corresponding verbs at HESITATE).

Ant. Decision. — Con. *Certainty, certitude, assurance, conviction: decisiveness, decidedness (see corresponding adjectives at DECIDED).

dubiousity. Dubiety, *uncertainty, doubt, skepticism, suspicion, mistrust.

Ana. Confusion, muddlement, addlement (see corresponding verbs at CONFUSE): wavering, vacillation, faltering, hesitation (see corresponding verbs at HESITATE).

Ant. Decidedness. — Con. *Decision, determination: assurance, certitude, *certainty: cocksureness, positiveness (see corresponding adjectives at SURE).

dubious. *Doubtful, questionable, problematical.

Ana. Suspicious, skeptical, mistrustful, uncertain (see corresponding nouns at UNCERTAINTY): hesitant, reluctant, *disinclined.

Ant. Cocksure (state of mind, opinion, etc.): reliable (of things in general): trustworthy (of persons). — Con. Dependable, trusty, tried (see RELIABLE): *sure, certain, positive.

duck, v. *Dip, immerse, submerge, souse, dunk.

ductile. *Plastic, pliable, pliant, malleable, adaptable.

Ana. Tractable, amenable (see OBEDIENT): responsive (see TENDER): yielding, submitting (see YIELD): fluid, *liquid: flexible, *elastic, resilient.

Con. Refractory, intractable (see UNRULY): rigid, *stiff, inflexible: obdurate, *inflexible, adamant.

dude. *Pop, dandy, beau, coxcomb, exquisite, élégant, macaroni, buck, spark, swell, nob, toff.

dudgeon. Umbrage, huff, pique, resentment, *offense.

Ana. *Anger, indignation, wrath, rage, fury, ire: temper, humor, *mood.

due, adj. Due, rightful, condign come into comparison when they mean being in accordance with what is just and appropriate. Due, which literally means owed or owing as a debt (not, however, as in current finance, a debt payable because of terms agreed upon in advance), carries in the senses here considered a strong implication that the thing so described is grounded upon an obligation, duty, or debt which should not or cannot be ignored; thus, one who takes due precautions uses the care that is required by his obligation to look out for his own or for others' safety or well-being; one who has a due sense of another person's rights accords to that person all that belongs to him by natural or moral right; one who has due respect for the law observes the individual laws as the duty of a responsible citizen. Oftentimes, the term implies little more than an accordance with that which is right, or reasonable, or necessary; as, "the due relation of one thing with another" (Galsworthy); "Your due and proper portion" (Meredith); "many non-commissioned officers have a firm belief that without a due admixture of curses, an order is inaudible to a private" (C. E. Montague). Rightful carries a much stronger and more consistently involved implication than due of a ground in right and justice, and usually suggests a moral or legal claim; as, the rightful heir to the estate; the rightful claimant to the crown could not be determined; to possess the rightful authority. Condign applies to that which is distinctly deserved or merited and, usually, which neither exceeds nor falls below one's deserts or merits: the term since the end of the seventeenth century has been applied chiefly to punishment, often with the implication of severity (as, "He had been brought to condign punishment as a traitor"—Macaulay), but there is no other reason etymologically or historically why it should not be applied in its general sense. "Speak you this in my praise, master?" "In thy condign praise" (Shak.). "Capriciously... the word condign is used only in connection with the word punishment.... These and other words, if unlocked from their absurd imprisonment, would become extensively useful. We should say, for instance, 'condign honours,' 'condign reward,' 'condign treatment'" (De Quincey).

Ana. Appropriate, meet, suitable, *fit, fitting, proper: right, *good: just, *fair, equitable.

Con. *Excessive, inordinate, immoderate, extravagant, exorbitant: *deficient.

due, n. Due, desert, merit come into comparison when they mean that which is justly owed to a person (sometimes a thing), especially as a recompense or compensation. Due usually implies a legal or moral right on the part of the person or thing that makes the claim or is in a position to make the claim; it usually suggests, however, a determination of what is owed by strict justice; as, "More is thy due than more than all can pay" (Shak.). "Carve to all but just enough, Let them neither starve nor stuff, And that you may have your due, Let your neighbor carve for you" (Swift). Desert (often in plural deserts) suggests not a legal right but a moral right based upon what one actually deserves, whether it be a reward or a penalty. "My lord, I will use them according to their desert." "God's bodykins, man, much better: use every man after his desert, and who should 'scape whipping?" (Shak.). "You have deprived the best years of his life of that independence which was no less his due than his desert" (Austen). "Any Federal officer, regardless of his deserts, has much prestige" (V. Heiser). Merit is a somewhat complex term, often shifting in its major implication, but as here compared (see also EXCELLENCE) commonly implying a deserving either of reward or punishment on the ground of what has been accomplished, or of commendation, esteem, acceptance, or the like, on the ground of intrinsic, and usually excellent, qualities; as, "No tribute can be paid to them which exceeds their merit" (Ch. Just. Marshall); to treat every case on its merits; "As a pilgrim to the Holy Places I acquire merit" (Kipling).

Ana. Compensation, recompensing or recompense, requital, repayment, satisfaction, payment (see corresponding verbs at PAY): retribution, *retaliation, reprisal, vengeance, revenge: reward, meed, guerdon (see PREMIUM).

dull, adj. 1 *Stupid, dumb, dense, crass.

Ana. *Lethargic, sluggish, stuporous, comatose: phlegmatic, stolid, *impassive, apathetic: *backward: retarded (see DELAY, v.).

Ant. Clever, bright. — Con. *Intelligent, alert, quick-witted, smart, brilliant, knowing.

2 Dull, blunt, obtuse come into comparison in many senses where they mean the reverse of sharp, keen, and acute. The words of the group under consideration do not necessarily find their antonyms among the group of words which are in general their opposites, because of a lack of parallelism in distinctive implications and connotations. As used of things, especially of tools, instruments, and the like, dull refers to either an edge or a point that has lost its sharpness by use (as, a dull knife; a dull razor; a dull pencil); blunt refers to an edge or point that is through use, nature, or intention, not sharp or keen (as, use the blunt side of the knife in prying; an ax is a blunt instrument as compared with a razor, but its edge should not be allowed to become blunt [or dull] through use); obtuse applies only to a point or to the shape of something whose sides converge at an angle that is broader than a right angle (as, the obtuse apex of some wings; an obtuse leaf). In their extended senses, dull (see also STUPID) is the most widely applicable and the richest as well as the most variable in its connotations. It implies, in general, the lack or the loss of that which gives keenness, zest, pungency, poignancy, intensity, interest, or the like; as, a dull pain; a dull red; a dull mood; dull conversation; a dull market; dull anger; a dull book. Blunt (see BLUFF for application to manners and utterances) usually implies a lack of edge or point (in the figurative senses of these words). Often, it refers to a person's powers of perception or to his sensibilities, which normally should be sharp or keen. "She [Shakespeare's Emilia] . . . is blunt in perception and feeling, and quite destitute of imagination" (Bradley). "To the age of twelve . . . all my emotions were wholesomely undeveloped and blunt, never at any point exasperated into acute sensibility" (H. Ellis). Less often, it applies to contrasts, critical judgments, and the like, requiring sharp distinction or differentiation. "Matthew Arnold distinguishes far too bluntly, it seems to me, between the two activities [creation and criticism]" (T. S. Eliot). Obtuse suggests such bluntness of perception or sensibilities as makes one insensitive to emotions or ideas; as, an obtuse audience; obtuse understanding; "obtuseness of moral sense" (J. R. Lowell); "obstinate obtuseness in regard to one . . . of the fine arts" (De Quincey).

Ant. Sharp (edge, point, etc.): poignant (sensation, feeling, reaction, etc.): lively (action or activity).

dumb, adj. 1 Dumb, mute, speechless, inarticulate agree in meaning lacking the power to speak. Dumb and mute are often used interchangeably, but when used in distinction from each other, dumb implies an incapacity for speech, as in the case of brute animals and inanimate objects or of human beings whose organs of speech are defective; mute implies an inability to speak, owing to one's never having heard speech sounds, especially as in the case of one who is deaf congenitally or has lost his hearing before being old enough to reproduce heard sounds; thus, persons once called deaf and dumb are usually deaf-mutes who have healthy speech organs and can be trained to speak through the senses of sight and touch; so, "dumb idols" (Habakkuk ii. 18); "dumb stones whereon to vent their rage" (Arnold); a mute child. When used of persons who are normally able to speak, dumb (see also STUPID) usually suggests deprivation of the power to speak; mute stresses a compelling cause for keeping or maintaining silence; as, "Deep shame had struck me dumb" (Shak.); "how terrible is that dumb grief which has never learned to moan" (Galsworthy); "All sat mute, Pondering the danger with deep thoughts" (Milton); "some mute inglorious Milton" (Gray). Speechless commonly implies momentary deprivation of the power of speech; as, struck speechless with terror. Inarticulate implies either lack of the power to speak at all (as, "the inarticulate people of the dead"—Shelley; "the inarticulate hungers of the heart"—S. P. Sherman), or, especially, inability to speak intelligibly or clearly, usually on account of some powerful emotion, but sometimes because of lack of power to express one's thoughts or feelings; as, inarticulate with rage; "[He] stood looking down on her in inarticulate despair" (E. Wharton).

2 Dull, *stupid, dense, crass.

Ana. & Con. See those at DULL, 1.

Ant. Articulate (sense 3).

dumfound or dumbfound. Confound, nonplus, bewilder, distract, mystify, perplex, *puzzle.

Ana. Astound, flabbergast, amaze, astonish, *surprise: *confuse, muddle, addle, fuddle: disconcert, rattle, faze, discomfit (see EMBARRASS).

dumps. Dejection, gloom, blues, depression, melancholy, melancholia, vapors, *sadness.

Ana. Despondency, forlornness, hopelessness, despair (see under DESPONDENT): doldrums, ennui, boredom, *tedium.

dummy. Chunky, stubby, stocky, thickset, squat, *thick.

dune. *Mound, bank, embankment, terrace, tumulus, barrow.

dunk, v. *Dip, immerse, souse, submerge, duck.

Ana. *Soak, saturate, sop.

dupe, v. Dupe, gull, befool, trick, hoax, hoodwink, bamboozle agree in meaning to delude a person by underhand means or for one's own ends. Dupe suggests unweariness or unsuspiciousness on the part of the person or persons deluded and the acceptance of what is false as true, what is counterfeit as genuine, what is worthless as valuable, or the like; as, the public is easily duped by extravagant claims in advertising; he was so soft-hearted that he was constantly being duped into helping impostors. "William had too much sense to be duped" (Macaulay). Gull implies great credulousness or a disposition that lends itself to one's being easily imposed upon or made a laughing stock of. "For Monsieur Malvolio, let me alone with him: if I do not gull him into a nayword, and make him a common recreation, do not think I have wit enough to lie straight in my bed" (Shak.). "If the world will be gulled, let it be gulled" (Burton). "Gull who may, they will be gulled! They will not look nor think" (Browning). Befool stresses the effect on the victim, that of being made a fool of in his own eyes or in those of others; it does not so strongly suggest a temperamental weakness in the victim as the preceding words, nor so clearly imply an intent to delude on the part of the agent, as most of the words that follow; as, to confess themselves befooled by the candidate, his personable appearance, and his promises. "This term [moral sense] was long a stumbling-block in the eyes of innocent philosophic critics, too easily befooled by words" (H. Ellis). Trick implies the intent to delude on the part of the agent by means of a stratagem, a ruse, or wiles, or by fraud; it always suggests the intent to deceive, but it does not necessarily imply a base end. It may, for example, imply illusion as the end; as, a skillful dramatist tricks the spectators into accepting the impossible as probable; a magician's success depends upon his ability to trick his audience. It more often suggests deliberate misleading and the use of cunning or craft; as, pills are coated with sugar or chocolate in order to trick children into taking them; he was tricked out of his savings by the promises of large returns on an investment; the people felt that they had been tricked into approval of the project. Hoax, in strict use, implies indulgence in tricking as a sport or for the purpose of proving how gullible a person or persons can be when a skillful imposture or fabrication is presented to them; in looser use, it more often suggests a fraud intended to deceive even the most skeptical and oftentimes, also, to work for one's own profit or personal advantage; as, the American public was successfully hoaxed by the Cardiff giant; did Mark Twain intend to hoax people by his "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc," published without his name and as the work of one of her contemporaries? Hoodwink connotes either a deliberate confusing intended to blind the mind of another to the truth, or, less often, self-delusion arising from one's inability to distinguish the false from the true; as, he will not be hoodwinked by sentimental platitudes into doing things that are against right reason; "to hoodwink everybody by pretending to conform" (Cabell); "Some to the fascination of a name Surrender judgment hoodwinked" (Cowper). Bamboozle usually implies the use of cajolery, or humbug, or illusion, or the like; the word is often used interchangeably with trick, hoax, or hoodwink, but it is less definite or fixed in its implications; as, to be bamboozled into a belief that he was a great man. "What Oriental tomfoolery is bamboozling you?" (Newman).

Ana. *Deceive, beguile, delude, mislead, double-cross, betray: *cheat, cozen, defraud, overreach: outwit, baffle, circumvent (see FRUSTRATE).

duplicate, n. *Reproduction, facsimile, copy, carbon copy, transcript, replica.

Ana. Counterpart, *parallel, analogue.

duplicit, n. *Deceit, dissimulation, cunning, guile.

Ana. Double-dealing, chicanery, chicanerie, trickery, *deception, fraud, subterfuge: treacherousness or treachery, perfidiousness or perfidy, faithlessness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHLESS).

Con. Straightforwardness, forthrightness (see corresponding adjectives at STRAIGHTFORWARD).

durable, n. *Lasting, perdurable, permanent, stable, perpetual.

Ana. Enduring, abiding, persisting (see CONTINUE): *strong, stout, tenacious.

Con. Fragile, frail, feeble, *weak: *transient, transitory, fleeting, ephemeral, fugitive.

duress, n. Constraint, coercion, compulsion, violence, *force, restraint.

dusk, adj. Dusky, dim, darkling, *dark, obscure, murky, gloomy, opaque.

dusky, 1 Dusk, dim, *dark, darkling, obscure, murky, gloomy, opaque.

2 Dusky, swarthy, tawny or tawney come into comparison as meaning dark and dull. Dusky is the most general term; it applies to that which is somewhat dark yet not black, and void of light or color; as, "dusky vapours of the night" (Shak.); "twilight groves and dusky caves" (Pope); a dusky complexion. Swarthy and tawny stress darkness and dullness of hue or color only; swarthy implies a shade verging on brownness or blackness, tawny suggests a shade characteristically brown, but sometimes a yellowish-brown or tan; as, "a swarthy Ethiop" (Shak.); "the swarthy Moors" (Pope); "tawny Tartar" (Shak.); "your orange-tawny beard" (Shak.). When applied to the human complexion directly, swarthy is now usually preferred to tawny, even though dark brownness is not suggested; as, "The face was saturnine and swarthy" (Wilde).

duty, 1 *Obligation.

Ana. Responsibility, accountability, amenability, answerability, liability (see corresponding adjectives at RESPONSIBLE).

2 Office, *function, province.

Ana. Concern, business, *affair.

3 *Task; job, chore, chore, assignment, stint.

Ana. *Work, métier, business, employment, occupation, calling: *trade, craft, art, profession.

4 Customs, impost, tariff, *tax, levy, excise, assessment, rate, toll, tribute, tithe, teind, cess.

dwarf, n. 1 Dwarf, pygmy, midget, manikin (or mannikin), homunculus (or homuncle, homuncule), runt come into comparison when they mean a person of diminutive size. Dwarf is the general term not only for a human being but for any animal or plant that is far below the normal size of the species: often, but not necessarily, the term suggests stunted development. "His [the fool's] value was trebled in the eyes of the king by the fact of his being also a dwarf and a cripple" (Poe). Pygmy, in earliest use, was applied to one of a race (or races) of fabled dwarfs mentioned by Homer and others, and now is applied especially to one of a dwarf people found in central Africa. The term carries a stronger connotation of diminutiveness and a weaker suggestion of arrested development than dwarf; when used generally in reference to a person, it often implies tininess (often relative tininess), sometimes in body but more often in intellect. "To him all the men I ever knew were pygmies. He was an intellectual giant" (Byron). Midget stresses abnormal diminutiveness but, unlike dwarf, carries little suggestion of malformation or deformity; the term is applied usually to a tiny but otherwise shapely person exhibited in a circus or employed in place of a child in theatrical performances; as, P. T. Barnum's famous midget, Tom Thumb. Manikin is often applied contemptuously not only to a dwarf but to any human being who for one reason or another seems despicably small or weak. "Can it be fancied that Deity ever vindictively Made in his image a mannikin merely to madden it?" (Poe). Homunculus usually suggests even greater diminutiveness and often greater perfection in form than midget: it is the specific term for an exceedingly small artificial human being such as was supposedly developed by Paracelsus, a famous Renaissance alchemist; it is also applied, as a technical term, to the human fetus. Runt, usually a contemptuous designation, applies to a dwarf or undersized person, especially to one who is conspicuously puny or undeveloped or, occasionally, to one who is thick as well as short. "I always did admire a good, sizable, stout man. I hate a runt" (McClure's Mag.). The term is also applied to an animal, especially a domestic animal, small of its kind; and, dialectally in the United States, it is applied specifically to the undersized one of a litter, as of pigs.

each, adj. Every, *all.

each, adv. Each, apiece, severally, individually, respectively come into comparison when they mean for (or to, or by) every one of the many, or several, persons or things comprising a group. All imply distribution. Each and apiece (the more colloquial term) usually connote equality in the amount or value of that distributed, unless the context indicates otherwise; as, he gave the five children a dollar each (or apiece); the students have a bedroom and study apiece (or each). Severally stresses the apartness of each of the persons and things involved, but at the same time often, especially in legal use, implies that each of them is favored, bound, guilty, responsible, or the like, in the same degree as the group as a whole; thus, to try a group of conspirators severally is to try them not jointly, or together, but one at a time, and usually on the identical charge; to be bound jointly and severally is to be under obligation as a group and singly as individuals, damages being recoverable from all or from any member of the group. Individually, like severally, implies a distinction between each member of the group but it goes further in not suggesting equality in responsibility, favor, disfavor, or the like; thus, to try a group of conspirators individually is to try each one on a specific charge, usually on the assumption that they are not equally guilty; to greet each member of a visiting delegation individually is to greet him separately and personally. Respectively is used only when the persons or things involved in the distribution follow a given order and that which is distributed goes to each in the same order; as, he gave John, James, and Edward ten dollars, five dollars, and three dollars, respectively; the suites of offices 101, 102, 103 are assigned respectively to the president, the treasurer, and the secretary of the company.

eager. Eager, avid, keen, anxious, agog, a-tiptoe, athirst agree in meaning actuated by a strong and urgent desire or interest. Eager implies ardor and, often, enthusiasm; it frequently also connotes impatience. "It is not a life for fiery and dominant natures, eager to conquer" (A. C. Benson). "His [Southey's] eagerness admits of no doubt or delay" (Hazlitt). Avid adds to eager the implication of greed or of unbounded desire. "A too avid thirst for pleasure" (G. W. Russell). "Cultivated, excitable, avid of new things" (Buchan). Keen suggests intensity of interest and quick responsiveness in action. "Boys in white flannels—all keen as mustard, and each occupied with his own game, and playing it to the best of his powers" (Quiller-Couch). "Tories who are as keen on State interference with everything and everybody as the Socialists" (Shaw). Anxious emphasizes fear lest one's desires be frustrated or one's hopes not realized; it often additionally connotes insistence or perseverance in making one's desires known. "Visibly anxious that his wife should be on easy terms with us all" (A. Repplier). "Schoolmasters may be pathetically anxious to guide boys right, and to guard them from evil" (A. C. Benson). Agog and a-tiptoe are picturesque words, the first of which suggests the excitement and bustle attending something interesting about to be begun or an event eagerly awaited; the second, the alertness and readiness to spring into action of one poised on tiptoe, eager to dart forth at a signal. "Six precious souls, and all agog To dash through thick and thin" (Cowper). "It was disquieting news, and the ordnance branch of our navy, we may be sure, is a-tiptoe" (The Nation). Athirst implies yearning or longing more vividly than the others; it seldom connotes readiness for action. "I that for ever feel athirst for glory" (Keats). "Athirst for the beauty of the beyond" (Binyon).

Ana. Desiring, coveting, craving (see corresponding verbs at DESIRE): longing, yearning, hungering, thirsting (see corresponding verbs at LONG): *impatient, restless, restive.

Ant. Listless. — Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, incurious, aloof: uninterested (see DISINTERESTED): apathetic, *impassive, stolid.

early, adv. Early, soon, beforehand, betimes carry in common the meaning of at, or nearly at, a given point of time or around the beginning of a specified or implied period of time. Early is used chiefly, but not exclusively, in reference to a period of time (such as a day, a lifetime, an age, a term) and in dating a happening with reference to the beginning of that period. In such use, it implies occurrence shortly after the time at which the period is set to begin or is regarded as beginning; as, crocuses blossomed early this spring; migrations took place early in the Middle Ages. "Early to bed and early to rise, Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise" (Franklin). "Voltaire perceived very early in life that to be needy was to be dependent" (J. Marley). Sometimes, especially when the reference is to a point of time, early may mean in advance of the time set or expected, or of the usual time; thus, a person who arrives early at a meeting and leaves early, comes slightly before (sometimes just at) the time set, or noticeably ahead of the others, and leaves before the gathering breaks up; winter came early (that is, ahead of scheduled or normal time) this year. Soon usually refers to a definite point of time, such as the present or the beginning of a period, a process, a course, or the like, but it commonly implies occurrence after the moment in mind; thus, when a physician tells a patient to come early, he by implication asks that patient to come in advance of the time set for the beginning of his office hours so that the patient may be attended to soon, or shortly after the office hours begin; on the other hand, when he asks a patient to come soon, he by implication requests another visit shortly after the present one. But soon carries not only the implication of subsequence to a specified or implied point of time, but also, even more strongly, that of quickness or promptness or lack of delay; as, I called, and he soon appeared; the absconder was apprehended soon after his disappearance; I hope you will find your ring very soon. Soon, however, is sometimes used in place of early, though commonly with greater emphasis on promptness, in poetry, in some idiomatic expressions, and in the comparative and superlative degrees; as, "Late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers" (Wordsworth); must you go so soon?; excuse my not writing sooner; "The spirit... may know How soonest to accomplish the great end" (Shelley). Beforehand sometimes implies a time in advance of that set or expected or customary; as, he promised to be here beforehand. More often, however, it refers to a time in advance of a possible, probable, or certain occurrence, and it then usually implies anticipation or anticipatory measures; as, if one knows a thing beforehand one can be prepared; to be beforehand in dealing with an enemy; to pay a debt beforehand (that is, in advance of when it is due or, sometimes, incurred). Betimes (now somewhat bookish) has been used in the past in place of both early and soon. "Not to be a-bed after midnight is to be up betimes" (Shak.). "He tires belimes that spurs too fast" (Shak.). In current usage, it implies occurrence at the proper or due time, and therefore stresses seasonableness. That which happens belimes is neither too early nor too late; as, to know the art of giving advice belimes; because he had learned his lesson belimes, he was able to give perfect satisfaction afterwards.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ant. Late.

earn. Win, gain, acquire, secure, *get, obtain, procure.

Ana. Work, toil, labor, travail (see corresponding nouns at WORK): achieve, attain, gain, *reach.

earnest, adj. *Serious, solemn, grave, sober, sedate, staid.

Ana. Zealous, enthusiastic, passionate (see corresponding nouns at PASSION): diligent, *busy, industrious, assiduous, sedulous: *sincere, wholehearted, whole-souled.

Ant. Frivolous. — Con. Volatile, effervescent, buoyant, *elastic: flippant, flighty, light (see corresponding nouns at LIGHTNESS).

earnest, n. Token, *pledge, pawn, hostage, gage.

earth, n. Earth, world, universe, cosmos, macrocosm come into comparison when they mean the entire area or extent of space in which man thinks of himself and of his fellow men as living and acting. Earth applies, however, only to part of that which he knows by sight or by faith to exist; the term usually suggests a distinction between the sphere or globe called astronomically the earth, which he knows to be composed of land and water, and the bodies which he sees in the heavens (as, "this goodly frame, the earth"—Shak.; "Land is part of Earth's surface which stands at a given time above sea level"—R. Lord). It may, however, imply a distinction from heaven and hell (as, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven"—Matthew vi. 10; "The infinite loftiness of Mary's nature, among the things of earth, and above the clamour of kings"—H. Adams). World is a far less definite term than earth. When applied to a physical entity, it usually denotes all that illimitable area which to man's senses, at least, includes not only the earth and other planets, but all the space surrounding the earth and all the bodies contained within it (as, "It is not accident that wherever we point the telescope... wherever we look with the microscope there we find beauty. It beats in through every nook and cranny of the mighty world"—R. Jones): to persons who accept the account of creation in Genesis the term denotes the entire system that was brought into being by the word of God; as, God made the world; to expect the destruction of the world. The term, nevertheless, is often used as equivalent to earth, the globe; as, a trip around the world; he wanted to visit every corner of the world. As applied to an immaterial entity, world may imply the sum total of all the inhabitants of earth and of their interests and concerns (as, all the world loves a lover; the world was one in desiring peace), or that section or part of this larger world which comes within the knowledge of the individual (as, man's relation to the world about him; his family and his business comprised his world), or the section or part of the larger world which is devoted to secular, as distinct from religious or spiritual, concerns (as, to retire from the world; the world, the flesh, and the devil; "The world is too much with us"—Wordsworth). Universe, in its most precise sense, denotes the entire system of created things (or of physical phenomena), regarded as a unit both in its organization and in its operation; as, ancient and medieval astronomers regarded the earth as the fixed center of the universe; the astronomers of today teach that the universe is finite, but that it is constantly expanding. Universe, however, often is more loosely used in reference to an entire system of phenomenal things as that system appears to the limited vision of the typical man or of the individual; as, "From the universe as we see it both the Glory of God and the Glory of Man have departed" (J. W. Krutch); "He inhabited a different universe from that of common men" (A. Huxley). Cosmos, because of its opposition to chaos, carries a stronger implication of order and harmony in operation than universe, which it otherwise closely resembles in meaning. "Were it not for the indwelling reason the world would be a chaos and not a cosmos" (Blackie). Macrocosm applies to the universe thought of as a great whole characterized by perfect organic unity exhibited elsewhere only in the small whole, the individual man or microcosm; as, "The microcosm repeats the macrocosm" (T. H. Huxley).

earthly. Earthly, terrestrial, terrene, earthy, mundane, worldly, mortal, sublunary come into comparison when they mean of, belonging to, or characteristic of, the earth. Earthly is used chiefly in opposition to heavenly; as, earthly love; an (or the) earthly paradise. "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" (John iii. 12). "A peace above all earthly dignities. A still and quiet conscience" (Shak.). Terrestrial is sometimes used in place of earthly as a more sonorous term; frequently, however, it implies an opposition to celestial rather than to heavenly (see CELESTIAL); as, a terrestrial globe; a terrestrial telescope; less often, it implies a distinction of earth from the other planets (as, terrestrial magnetism; "Whose vision is cosmic, not terrestrial"—Lowes), or more specifically in astronomy, a distinction of certain planets assumed to be like the earth from others assumed to be unlike the earth (thus, the terrestrial planets are Earth, Mars, Venus, and Mercury). "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another" (1 Corinthians xv. 40). "When from under this terrestrial ball He fires the proud tops of the eastern pines" (Shak.). Terrestrial in some use suggests land as a habitat, rather than water (or, sometimes, trees); as, terrestrial serpents; terrestrial plants. Terrene is now rare except in poetry; it may be used in place of earthly especially when it suggests an opposition to that which is spiritual (as, "Its [the principle of beauty's] body of poetry, as the body of man, is but a terrene form"—G. Bottomley), but it may also be used in place of terrestrial in any of the given senses (as, "all such terrene dross"—T. Heywood; "Substances entirely terrene"—Goldsmith). Earthy, in the historical development of its senses, has stressed a connection with the earth as soil rather than the earth as the abode of men (as, an earthy smell); therefore, even when it comes close to earthly in its meaning, it carries a stronger implication of grossness of substance or of material interests than the latter word, and is opposed more to spiritual than to heavenly; as, "The first man [Adam] is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven" (1 Corinthians xv. 47). "My anger and disgust at his gross earthy egoism had vanished" (Hudson). "With much earthy dross in her, she [Cleopatra] was yet pre-eminently a creature of 'fire and air'" (Buchan). Mundane and worldly both imply a relationship to the world thought of as the affairs, concerns, and activities of human beings, especially as they are concentrated on practical ends, on immediate pleasures, and the like. Mundane specifically suggests an opposition to that which is eternal and stresses transitoriness or impermanence; as, mundane glory; "There I quaff the elixir and sweet essence of mundane triumph" (L. P. Smith). "Tony knew that she did not allow them to talk of mundane affairs on these expeditions to and from church" (Arch. Marshall).

Worldly, which is applied chiefly to persons and their interests, specifically implies indifference to things of the spirit and concentration on that which satisfies one's love of success, one's desire for pleasure, one's self-esteem, and the like. "The obvious thing to say of her was that she was worldly; cared too much for rank and society and getting on in the world" (V. Woolf). Mortal (see also DEADLY, 1) comes into comparison with these other terms when it suggests a relationship to the earth or world as the dwelling place of human beings; it therefore sometimes takes the place of earthy, without necessarily suggesting a lack of connection with heaven, or of terrestrial, without necessarily suggesting a lack of connection with the celestial regions; as, "a moment of brilliance making mortal fields elysian" (Day Lewis). Sublunary (etymologically, under the moon) is a distinctly literary or poetic term variously interchangeable with earthy, mundane, and terrestrial. "All things sublunary are subject to change" (Dryden). "What then would matter the quakes and sublunary conflicts of this negligible earth?" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Temporal, *profane, secular: temporal (see TEMPORARY): *material, physical, corporeal.

Con. *Celestial, heavenly, empyrean: spiritual, divine (see HOLY).

earthy. Mundane, worldly, *earthly, terrestrial, terrene, mortal, sublunary.

Ana. *Material, physical, corporeal: fleshy, *carnal, sensual: gross, *coarse.

ease, n. 1 Comfort, relaxation, *rest, repose, leisure.

Ana. Inactivity, idleness, inertness, passiveness, supineness (see corresponding adjectives at INACTIVE): tranquillity, serenity, placidity, calmness, peacefulness (see corresponding adjectives at CALM).

Con. Toil, travail, *work, labor: *distress, suffering, misery.

2 Facility, dexterity, *readiness.

Ana. Effortlessness, smoothness, easiness (see corresponding adjectives at EASY): grace (see ELEGANCE): expertness, adeptness, skillfulness, proficiency (see corresponding adjectives at PROFICIENT): deftness, featness, adroitness (see corresponding adjectives at DEXTEROUS).

Ant. Effort. — Con. Exertion, pains, trouble (see EFFORT): awkwardness, clumsiness, ineptness, maladroitness (see corresponding adjectives at AWKWARD).

easy, adj. 1 *Comfortable, reposeful, restful, cozy, snug.

Ana. *Soft, lenient, gentle: commodious, *spacious: *calm, tranquil, serene, placid: unconstrained, spontaneous (see corresponding nouns at UNCONSTRAINT).

Ant. Disquieting or disquieted. — Con. Disturbed, perturbed, agitated, upset, discomposed (see DISCOMPOSE): anxious, worried, concerned (see corresponding nouns at CARE).

2 Easy, facile, simple, light, effortless, smooth come into comparison as meaning not involving undue effort or difficulty in doing, making, giving, understanding, or the like. Easy is applicable both to persons and things that make demands, especially for physical or mental effort, or that impose a task upon a person, and to the acts or activities involved in satisfying such demands or in accomplishing such a task; as, the book was easy to read; I would like some more easy reading; our teacher was easy today; her assignment for tomorrow is short and easy; an easy riddle; an easy solution of the riddle; the place is easy to reach; the place is within easy reach of the city; it will not be easy for him to understand your breaking of your promise. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me.... For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light" (Matthew xi. 29-30). "I have been a dreamer and an artist, a great dreamer, for that is easy, not a great artist, for that is hard" (H. Ellis). Facile was once and to some extent is still used as a very close synonym of easy; as, "having won...his facile victory" (Froude); "The facile modes of measurement which we now employ" (Tyndall). But it now chiefly applies to that which comes, or moves, or works, or gains its ends seemingly without effort or at call: it therefore is often used in derogation implying lack of constraint or restraint, undue haste, dexterity rather than meticulousness, fluency with shallowness, or the like; as, a writer's facile pen; a woman's facile tears; "I am not concerned with... offering any facile solution for so complex a problem" (T. S. Eliot); "she was a prey to shoddy, facile emotions and moods, none of which had power to impel her to any action" (R. Macaulay). Simple, as here compared, stresses ease in apprehending or understanding: it implies freedom from complication, intricacy, elaboration, or other involvements which render a thing difficult to see through; as, problems in arithmetic too simple to hold the interest of pupils of that age; "true poetry, however simple it may appear on the surface, accumulates meaning every time it is read" (Day Lewis); "Don't do religious people the injustice of believing that anything is simpler or easier for them [than for others]; it's more difficult, since life is more exacting" (R. Macaulay). Light implies an opposition to heavy in nearly all of its senses, but in the one here considered it suggests freedom from burdensomeness, or from exactions that make undue or difficult demands on one; as, a light task; his work is very light; light reading; a light lunch (i.e., a lunch that is easily digested); light punishment; light taxes (i.e., taxes easy to pay). Effortless, though it carries many of the connotations characteristic of facile, suggests the appearance of ease rather than actual absence of effort: oftentimes, therefore, it implies mastery, skill, artistry, or the like, and the attainment of such perfection that the movements or technique seem to involve no strain, as, the effortless dancing of a Pavlova; "even the swallows...glided in an effortless way through the busy air" (Jefferies); a natural, effortless style. Smooth suggests an absence of, or the removal of, all difficulties or obstacles that makes a course, a career, or the like, easy to follow or to pursue; as, the car speeded along over the smooth road; to make a son's way smooth for him by providing him with a good post in one's own business.

Ant. Hard. — Con. Difficult, arduous (see HARD): exacting, *onerous, burdensome, oppressive.

eats. *Food, victuals, grub, chow, viands, provisions, provender, fodder, forage.

ebb, v. Subside, *abate, wane.

Ana. Dwindle, diminish, *decrease, lessen: *recede, retrograde, retreat.

Ant. Flow (as the tide). — Con. *Advance, progress: *rise, mount, ascend.

ebullition. Ebullition, effervescence, fermentation, ferment are here compared in their extended senses as meaning a state of agitation or excitement or the exhibition in words or acts of such a state. Ebullition, literally the act, process, or state of boiling or bubbling up or over, suggests a comparably sudden and forcible rising to the surface of a feeling or emotion, so that it overflows and pours itself forth lavishly or unrestrainedly; as, "Sensitive to tone and manner as he was, his ebullition of paternal feeling was frozen" (Meredith); "impetuous love-letters, fervid with the ebullitions of unmoderated feeling, are apt to pall upon the unenamoured reader" (L. P. Smith). Effervescence, literally the noisy bubbling and hissing as of carbonated waters when gas is released, or the foaming and frothing as of seething liquors, suggests a comparable excitement or exaltation of spirits manifesting itself while the mood lasts in irrepressible lightness, gaiety, exhilaration, or volubility; as, "The wild effervescence of his mood—which had... impelled him to talk from the mere necessity of giving vent to this bubbling-up gush of ideas—had entirely subsided" (N. Hawthorne); "Things didn't settle down; as embodied in Bill Gracy they continued in a state of effervescence" (E. Wharton). Fermentation and ferment literally denote an activity within a liquid such as cider or new wine, or within a substance such as dough mixed with yeast, that often manifests itself in effervescence or ebullition and that results in a chemical transformation of substance, as of cider into vinegar or into an alcoholic drink, or of dough into a light porous mass inflated with carbon dioxide. In figurative use, these words suggest a comparable activity or condition marked by internal commotion or great unrest; as, a ferment of ideas; "The cynical view is congenial to certain moods, and is so little inconsistent with original nobleness of mind, that it is not seldom the acetous fermentation of it" (J. R. Lowell). Ferment is now more often used than fermentation in a sense which usually applies to a condition that involves a painful or disturbing transition from old to new, or from a condition lower in the scale to one that is higher. "The imagination of a boy is healthy, and the mature imagination of a man is healthy; but there is a space of life between, in which the soul is in a ferment, the character undecided" (Keads). "The nation at this time was seething with new life; it was a time of spiritual as well as of political ferment!" (Inge).

Ana. Agitation, convulsion, shaking, rocking (see corresponding verbs at SHAKE): excitement, stimulation (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE): exuberance, lavishness, profuseness or profusion, luxuriantness or luxuriance (see corresponding adjectives at PROFUSE).

eccentric. Erratic, odd, queer, peculiar, *strange, singular, unique, quaint, outlandish, curious.

Ana. *Abnormal, atypic, aberrant: *irregular, anomalous, unnatural: *exceptional, exceptionable: *fantastic, bizarre, grotesque.

Con. *Common, ordinary, familiar: *usual, customary, habitual: normal, natural, typical, *regular.

eccentricity. Eccentricity, idiosyncrasy are not always clearly distinguished when they denote an act, a practice, a characteristic, or the like, that impresses the observer as strange or singular. Eccentricity (cf. STRANGE) emphasizes the idea of divergence from the usual or customary; idiosyncrasy implies a following of one's peculiar temperament or bent, especially in trait, trick, or habit; the former, therefore, often suggests mental aberration; the latter, strong individuality and independence of action. "Jennie's eccentricity, her possibly uncanny deviation from the ordinary ways of life" (M. Wilkins). "Letters to Native Princes, telling them...to refrain from kidnapping women, or filling offenders with pounded red pepper, and eccentricities of that kind" (Kipling). "This decided love of the slope, or bank above the wall, rather than below it, is one of Turner's most marked idiosyncrasies" (Ruskin). "What I learned of mathematics and science has been...of great intrinsic value, as affording subjects of contemplation and reflection, and touchstones of truth in a deceitful world. This is, of course, in part a personal idiosyncrasy" (B. Russell).

Ana. *Deviation, aberration, divergence: peculiarity, oddity, querness, singularity (see corresponding adjectives at STRANGE): freak, vagary, crotchet, *caprice, whim, whimsey.

ecclesiastic, n. Clergyman, *cleric, priest, abbé.

éclat. Renown, glory, celebrity, notoriety, repute, reputation, *fame, honor.

Ana. Prominence, conspicuousness, remarkableness, noticeableness (see corresponding adjectives at NOTICEABLE): notedness or note, illustriousness or luster, eminence (see corresponding adjectives at FAMOUS).

economical. Frugal, thrifty, *sparing.

Ana. Prudent, provident (see under PRUDENCE): close, cheeseparing, parsimonious, penurious (see STINGY).

Ant. Extravagant. — Con. Lavish, prodigal, exuberant, *profuse.

economy. *System, scheme, organism, network, complex.

Ana. Organization, institution, establishment, foundation (see corresponding verbs at FOUND).

ecstasy, n. Ecstasy, rapture, transport agree in denoting a feeling or a state of intense, sometimes excessive or extreme, mental exaltation. Ecstasy in its earlier sense, and in the meaning now found chiefly in religious and poetical writings, implies a trancelike state in which consciousness of one's surroundings is lost and the mind is intent either on that which it contemplates, as in the case of the mystic, or on that which it conceives and creates, as in the case of the inspired poet or artist; as, "Like a mad prophet in an ecstasy" (Dryden). "Anthems clear, As may with sweetness, through mine ear, Dissolve me into ecstasies, And bring all Heaven before mine eyes" (Milton). In later and now general use, the term implies overmastering, entrancing joy or other emotion that exalts the mind and overcomes the senses. "Men in whom the manual exercise of combat seems to light a wonderful fire in the blood. To them battle brings ecstasy. They are ravished above pain and fear" (C. E. Montague). "She loved him with an acute, painful ecstasy that made her dizzy and blinded her to all the world besides" (R. Macaulay). Rapture etymologically implies a state of being seized; in its early religious use, rapture differed from ecstasy in implying a lifting of the mind or soul out of itself by divine power, so that it might see things beyond the reach of human vision; thus, the experiences narrated by the Apostle Paul (2 Corinthians xii. 2-4) of being caught up to the third heaven are in this sense (still occasionally found in theology, mystical writings, and poetry) raptures. In its chief current sense, rapture merely implies intense bliss or beatitude with or without the connotation of accompanying ecstasy, or loss of perception of everything else; as, "I drank it in, in a speechless rapture" (Twain). "As a child I first read Pope's Homer with a rapture which no subsequent work could ever afford" (Byron). "She burned again with the same ecstasy, the same exaltation. How fine it had been, to live in that state of rapture!" (V. Sackville-West). Transport (etymologically, a carrying across) applies to any violent or powerful emotion that lifts one out of oneself and, usually, provokes enthusiastic or vehement expression; as, "I mean to... support with an even temper, and without any violent transports...a sudden gust of prosperity" (Fielding); "transports of rage" (Austen); "What a transport of enthusiasm!" (Landor). "In art, as in poetry, there are the transports which lift the artist out of...himself" (Pater).

Ana. Bliss, beatitude, blessedness, felicity, *happiness, joy, delectation, delight, *pleasure: *inspiration, enthusiasm, fury, frenzy, afflatus.

ectype. Antitype, archetype, *prototype.

ecumenical or oecumenical. *Universal, catholic, cosmopolitan, cosmic.

Ant. Provincial: diocesan.

eddy, v. Rotate, gyrate, circle, spin, whirl, revolve.
*turn, twirl, wheel, swirl, pirouette.

edge, n. 1 Verge, rim, brink, margin. *border, brim.

Ana. *Limit, end, bound, confine: *circumference, periphery, compass.

2 Odds, *advantage, handicap, allowance.

edifice, n. Structure, fabric, pile, *building.

educate. Train, discipline, school, *teach, instruct.

educe. Educe, evoke, elicit, extract, extort agree in meaning to bring or draw out that which is hidden, latent, reserved, or the like. Educe commonly implies the development and outward manifestation of something potential or latent. "Gray, with the qualities of mind and soul of a genuine poet . . . could not fully educe and enjoy them" (Arnold). Evoke (etymologically, to call out) originally suggested the voice or the words of a magician compelling spirits to leave the other world or the dead to arise from their graves; as, to evoke a demon; to evoke the ghost of one's father. In current use, the term implies the operation of a powerful agency that produces an effect instantly or that serves as a stimulus in arousing an emotion, a passion, or an interest; as, "the delight which growing flowers and blossoming trees evoke" (Binyon); "it is useless to obtrude moral ideas [upon children] at an age at which they can evoke no response" (B. Russell). "All harmonies . . . are latent in the complex mechanism of an organ, but a master's hand is necessary to evoke them" (Lowes). Elicit usually implies pains, trouble, or skill, in drawing something forth or out; it often implies resistance either in the person or thing that is the object of effort; as, to elicit important information from a witness by cross-examination. "It is the trouble we take over our children that elicits the stronger forms of parental affection" (B. Russell). Extract implies (literally or figuratively) pressure, suction, or similar agency; as, to extract the juice of an orange; to extract a tooth; "to extract all the dramatic value possible from the situation" (T. S. Eliot). "He had not that faculty of extracting the essence from a heap of statements" (Dickens). "To make the comparison at all was . . . to return to it often, to brood upon it, to extract from it the last dregs of its interest" (H. James). Extort implies (literally or figuratively) a wringing or wresting, especially from one who is reluctant or resisting; as, to extort money from one's relatives; to extort a promise. "She did at last extort from her father an acknowledgment that the horses were engaged" (Austen). "The Christians extorted the admiration of their fellow countrymen by the courage with which they . . . consoled the last hours of the sufferers" (Lecky).

Ana. Draw, drag (see PULL): produce, *bear, yield, turn out: *summon, call.

eerie or eery. *Weird, uncanny.

Ana. *Fantastic, bizarre, grotesque: *mysterious, inscrutable, arcane: *fearful, awful, dreadful, horrific: *strange, odd, queer, curious, peculiar.

efface. Obliterate, *erase, expunge, blot out, delete, dele, cancel.

Ana. Remove, *move, shift: eradicate, extirpate, wipe out (see EXTERMINATE): eliminate, *exclude, rule out.

effect, n. 1 Effect, consequence, result, aftereffect, event, aftermath, issue, outcome, upshot, sequel agree in denoting any condition, situation, occurrence, or the like, traceable to a cause or combination of causes. Effect is the direct correlative of cause; it names only those factors in a complex situation or those occurrences that of necessity follow a cause and that may be definitely attributed to its operation. "[These] qualities . . . of the Athenians, were partly the cause and partly the effect of their political constitution" (G. L. Dickinson). Conse- quence implies a more remote and looser connection with a cause than effect does; it names any condition, situation, or event that may be traced back to an original cause through a more or less complicated chain of causes and effects; as, never during his life was he to escape the consequences of his youthful mistake; the consequences of a war are felt by succeeding generations. Result, though often employed as the equivalent of effect, is in very precise use applied chiefly to the effect that terminates the operation of a cause; as, the result of an election; his death was the result of accident. The result is not always immediate; it may be the last in a series of effects directly traceable to a given cause. Thus, the effect of a blow on the head may be concussion of the brain; the consequence, shattered health; the result, the retirement of the injured man from active business. When an effect in turn serves as a cause and produces a secondary effect, that is often called an aftereffect; as, some drugs are avoided because of their harmful aftereffects. When the effect of a deliberate action, speech, choice, or the like, could not be *foreseen or was affected by conditions beyond human control, that which actually resulted is called event. "In that case [where a ship's captain's decision was followed by disaster] great weight is given to his determination and the matter is to be judged on the facts as they appeared then and not merely in the light of the event" (Justice Holmes). Aftermath (literally, a second crop of grass following a mowing of the first) is in current English often applied to belated consequences which appear after the effects (esp. the disastrous effects) seem to have passed; as, every great war has its aftermath. All the other words in the group here discriminated are more or less figurative substitutes for result. Issue adds to result the implication of exit, as from difficulties; it therefore usually designates a result that is a solution or a resolution. "What is the final ending? The issue, can we know?" (V. Lindsay). " 'God has been very good to let me live to see a happy issue to those old wrongs' " (Cather). Outcome implies less finality than issue but often stresses the visibility or tangibility of the result. "Naturalism is . . . a jejune and self-contradictory philosophy. Its outcome is not to leave religion alone, but to destroy it" (Inge). Upshot adds to result the suggestion of a climax or of an inescapable conclusion; as, the upshot of the situation was that he assumed entire control. "The upshot of the effort [to achieve originality in writing] . . . is a more or less violent straining after the unusual" (Lowes). Sequel is applied to a result that follows as a logical consequence but usually occurs after an interval; as, the sequel of a marriage of persons so mismated is easily foreseen.

Ant. Cause. — Con. Determinant, antecedent, reason, occasion (see CAUSE): basis, ground, *base, foundation, groundwork.

2 In plural form effects. *Possessions, belongings, means, resources, assets.

effect, v. 1 Accomplish, achieve, *perform, execute, discharge, fulfill.

Ana. *Reach, attain, achieve, compass, gain: finish, complete, conclude, end, terminate, *close: implement, *enforce: *realize, actualize.

2 *Affect.

effective. Effective, effectual, efficient, efficacious are frequently confused because all mean producing or capable of producing a result or results. Effective emphasizes the actual production of an effect or the power to produce a given effect whenever in active use, exercise, force, or the like; as, effective thinking; an effective speaker; an effective rebuke; the law becomes effective on a given date; effective capital. "Set him to write poetry, he is limited, artificial, and impotent...to write prose, he is free, natural, and effective" (Arnold). "Research chemists... are actively investigating to learn why particular materials are effective and to make them more so" (A. C. Morrison). Effectual suggests the accomplishment of the result that is desired or the fulfillment of a purpose or intention, so that the term frequently becomes synonymous with "decisive, final," and looks backward rather than forward; as, an effectual measure; an effectual refutation, retort; "His recommendation was effectual, and I was...chosen" (Gibbon); "A certain shyness... prevented Michael Henchard from following up the investigation with the loud hue-and-cry such a pursuit demanded to render it effectual" (Hardy). Efficient applies to that which is actively operative and produces its result through the exercise of energy (as, an efficient cause), or more often in current use, through the exercise of skill, pains, vigilance, and the like (so that it often becomes synonymous with capable, competent and is applied especially, but not invariably, to persons who have given proof of their power or skill; as, an efficient officer, workman. "He [Augustus] gave her [Rome] an efficient police and a vigilant fire brigade" (Buchan). "The further back we can project our vision, the more comprehensive, the more thorough, the more efficient is that knowledge" (Grandgent). Efficacious implies the possession of the quality or virtue that gives a thing (more often than a person) the potency or power that makes it effective; as, quinine is efficacious in cases of malaria; "[The influence of Dr. Arnold] to this day is efficacious in moulding upper-class Englishmen" (B. Russell).

Ana. Forceful, forcible, potent, *powerful: producing or productive, bearing, turning out (see corresponding verbs at BEAR): telling, cogent, convincing (see VALID): operative, *active, dynamic.

Ant. Ineffective: futile (thinking, treatment, action, etc.). — Con. Vain, fruitless, bootless, abortive (see FUTILE): nugatory, idle, otiose, *vain, empty, hollow.

effectual. *Effective, efficacious, efficient.

Ana. Effecting, accomplishing, achieving, fulfilling (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM): operative, dynamic, *active: decisive, determinative, *conclusive.

Ant. Ineffectual: fruitless. — Con. *Futile, vain, bootless, abortive.

effeminate, adj. Womanish, womanlike, womanly, feminine, *female, ladylike.

Ana. Emasculated, enervated, unmanned (see UNNERVE): epicene (see BISEXUAL): *soft, mild, gentle, lenient, bland: pampered, indulged, humored, mollycoddled (see INDULGE).

Ant. Virile.

effervescence. *Ebullition, fermentation, ferment.

Ana. Volatility, buoyancy, expansiveness, resiliency, elasticity (see corresponding adjectives at ELASTIC): frivolity, levity, *lightness, flippancy, flightiness: froth, *foam, yeast.

Con. Staidness, sedateness, soberness, gravity, seriousness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

effervescent. Volatile, buoyant, expansive, resilient, *elastic.

Ana. *Lively, vivacious, sprightly, gay, animated: hilarious, jolly, gleeful, mirthful (see corresponding nouns at MIRTH).

Ant. Subdued.

efficacious. Effectual, *effective, efficient.

Ana. Potent, *powerful, puissant: cogent, telling, sound, convincing (see VALID).

Ant. Inefficacious: powerless.

effectual. *Effective, effectual, efficacious.

Ana. Competent, qualified, *able, capable: expert, skillful, skilled, *proficient, adept.

Ant. Inefficient.

effigy. Simulacrum, *image, statue, icon, portrait, photograph, mask.

effort. Effort, exertion, pains, trouble agree in meaning the active use or expenditure of physical or mental power in producing a desired result. Effort may suggest a single action or continued activity but it usually implies consciousness that one is making an attempt, or sometimes, even, is toiling or straining to achieve one's end; as, to make a final supreme effort; "the constant effort of the dreamer to attain his ideal" (H. Adams); "Utterly absorbed in the writing of a private letter—how you lose count of time and have no sense of disagreeable effort" (C. E. Montague). Exertion in general stresses the active, often vigorous, exercise of any power or faculty; as, the continued exertion of memory; wearied by overexertion; "A...man, capable of close application of mind, and great exertion of body" (Dickens). Often, however, especially when not followed by of, exertion means a laborious effort. "His [an acrobat's] work was done with remarkable grace, but with exertions which it was painful to witness; for he had but one leg, and had to use a crutch" (Deland). Pains implies toilsome or solicitous effort; trouble implies exertion that inconveniences or incommodes. "Those luckless brains That... Indite much metre with much pains" (Couper). "The Indians had exhaustless patience; upon their blankets and belts and ceremonial robes they lavished their skill and pains" (Cather). "Is twenty hundred kisses such a trouble?" (Shak.). "I feel that I am beginning to get a grip of the people.... 'I should hope so, after the amount of time and trouble you've taken'" (C. MacKenzie).

Ana. *Work, labor, toil, travail: energy, force, *power, might, puissance: endeavor, essay, assay (see under ATTEMPT, v.).

Ant. Ease.

effortless. *Easy, smooth, facile, simple, light.

Ana. *Proficient, skilled, skillful, expert, adept.

Ant. Painsstaking.

effrontery. *Temerity, audacity, hardihood, nerve, cheek, gall.

Ana. Impudence, brazenness, brashness (see corresponding adjectives at SHAMELESS): impertinence, intrusiveness, officiousness (see corresponding adjectives at IMPERTINENT).

effulgent. Radiant, luminous, brilliant, *bright, lustrous, refulgent, beaming, beamy, lambent, lucent. Ana. Flaming, blazing, glowing, flaring (see BLAZE, v.): flashing, gleaming (see FLASH, v.): resplendent, *splendid, glorious.

Con. Murky, gloomy, *dark, dim, obscure, dusk, dusky.

egotism. Egotism, *conceit, amour-propre, self-love, self-esteem.

Ana. Self-confidence, self-assurance, self-possession (see CONFIDENCE): self-reliance (see corresponding adjective at RELIANT): self-satisfaction, self-complacency, complacency, smugness, priggishness (see corresponding adjectives at COMPLACENT).

Ant. Altruism. — Con. Humility, meekness, modesty, lowliness (see corresponding adjectives at HUMBLE).

egotism. Egoism, *conceit, self-love, amour-propre, self-esteem.

Ana. Vanity, vainglory, *pride: boasting or boastfulness, vaunting or vauntfulness, gasconading (see corresponding verbs at BOAST): pluming, piquing, priding, preening (see PRIDE, v.).

Ant. Modesty. — Con. Humility, meekness, lowliness egret. Egret, egret designate one of certain herons bearing silky plumes on the lower back during the breeding season. These plumes have been much used as a headdress or hat trimming, and are obtained only by killing the bird. Egret is now the more common term in use for the bird, egrette for the plume as an article of millinery. The latter word is also applied to any similar, and usually artificial, plume or tuft worn as a headdress or hat trimming.

eikon. Variant of ICON.

elrenic, eirenical. Variants of IRENIC, IRENICAL.

eject, v. Eject, expel, oust, evict, dismiss agree in meaning to force or thrust something or someone out. Eject, although it is the comprehensive term of this group and is often interchangeable with any of the others, carries the strongest implication of throwing out from within. So emphatic is this suggestion that the term covers actions so far apart as those implied by dislodge, disgorge, vomit, emit, discharge, and many other terms; as, the volcano ejected lava for three days in succession; to eject an intruder from one's house; the chimney ejected flames rather than smoke. Expel stresses a thrusting out or a driving away: it therefore more regularly implies the use of voluntary force or compulsion than does eject (as, the stomach ejects [not expels] substances it cannot digest; the cigarette smoker expels [often clearer than ejects] smoke through the nose), and indicates more clearly than eject an intent to get rid of for all time (as, to expel a student from college; "a curse . . . in his blood . . . which no life of purity could expel"—Meredith; "Octavian . . . forbade the practice of certain eastern cults, and expelled from Rome Greek and Asiatic magicians"—Buchan). Oust implies a removal, dispossession, or the like, by the power of the law or, in more general use, by the exercise of force or by the compulsion of necessity; as, "Farmers were ousted of their leases made by tenants in tail [i.e., owners by right of entail]" (Blackstone); "in America . . . a new set of officials oust the old ones whenever the Opposition ousts the Government" (Shaw); "insidious attempts to disparage the findings of Reason, or to oust it from its proper province" (Inge). Evict (etymologically, to overcome completely) derives the sense here considered from its legal sense, which is to recover by legal process or by virtue of a superior title some property to which one has a clear or a proved right or claim; as, "If A. gives in exchange three acres to B. for other three acres, and afterwards one acre is evicted from B. . . the whole exchange is defeated" (W. Cruise). Since such recovery implies an ousting of one who has not a clear right or a proved claim, evict has come to mean to turn out of house or home (especially a tenant who has fallen behind in payment of rent) by legal or equally effective process; as, after not paying their rent for six months, they were evicted by the sheriff; all the residents of the valley were evicted by the flood. Dismiss (for the sense of to let go from employ, see DISMISS) stresses a getting rid of something such as a legal case by rejecting a claim or prayer and refusing it further consideration (as, "this court reversed the judgment given in favor of the defendant, and remanded the case with directions to dismiss it"—Ch. Just. Taney), or a fear, a grudge, a hatred, etc., by ejecting it from the mind or thoughts (as, "I declare to you . . . that I have long dismissed it from my mind"—Dickens), or an unwelcome subject, duty, prospect, etc., by taking adequate measures to ensure its no longer annoying or confronting one (as, "exercising the privilege of old age to dismiss peremptorily any subject [of conversation]"—L. P. Smith; "the Judge was sharply angry . . . because he found himself unable to dismiss the whole thing by packing the child off"—Deland).

Ana. *Exclude, eliminate, shut out, rule out, debar, disbar: *dismiss, discharge, cashier, fire, sack: *discard, cast, shed: reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE).

Ant. Admit (sense 1).

elastic, adj. 1 Elastic, resilient, springy, flexible, supple come into comparison when they mean able to endure strain (such as extension, compression, twisting, bending, or other distortion) without being permanently affected or injured. Elastic and resilient are both general and scientific terms; the scientific senses are later and are in part derived from the earlier meanings. Elastic, in popular use, is applied chiefly to substances or materials that are easy to stretch or expand and that quickly recover their shape or size when the pressure is removed; as, a rubber band is elastic; elastic cord for hats; a toy balloon is an elastic bag which can be blown up greatly beyond its original size. In scientific use, elastic is applicable to any solid that may be changed in volume or shape, or to any fluid (gas or liquid) that may be changed in volume, when in the course of the deformation of such a solid or fluid internal forces arise which tend to make it recover its original volume or shape once the deforming force or forces are removed. The term in such use describes a property which a substance possesses up to the point (the elastic limit) beyond which it cannot be deformed without permanent injury; thus, a steel ball possesses elasticity; one may test the comparative elastic properties of natural and of synthetic rubber. Resilient, in popular use, is applicable to anything which springs back into place or into shape, especially after compression; thus, rising bread dough is said to be resilient because it quickly recovers from a deforming pressure by the hand; a tree's branch may be described as resilient when it snaps back into its former position once a pull is released. Scientifically, resilient is not the equivalent of elastic, but it may be used as its counterpart; elastic stresses the capacity for deformation without permanent injury, resilient the capacity for recovering shape or position after strain or pressure has been removed; so, when an elastic substance is stretched or compressed, it shows itself resilient; as arteries gradually lose their elasticity with age, to the same extent their resiliency is impaired. Springy is a popular term often used in place of elastic or resilient but actually a compound of the two because it implies both the ease with which a thing yields to pressure or strain and the quickness of its return; as, to walk on springy turf; firm, springy muscles; "A laughing school-boy . . . Riding the springy branches of an elm" (Keats). Flexible is applicable to anything that can be bent or turned without breaking: the term may or may not imply resiliency, or quick recovery of shape; as, lead pipe is flexible and may be bent into shape; a flexible young tree often endures a heavy windstorm better than a rigid, fully developed one; "flexible and gracious as the willow" (Binyon). Supple applies to things which are, in general, not as solid or firm in structure as some which may be described as flexible; it also implies ease in bending, twisting, folding, or the like, but it suggests resistance to breaks, cracks, or other signs of injury; as, supple silks; supple muscles; a supple leather. "Mere manual labour stiffens the limbs, gymnastic exercises render them supple" (Jeffries).

In extended use, these words often carry the implications of their literal senses. Elastic stresses ease in stretching or expanding beyond the normal or appointed limits; as, an elastic conscience; "some principles there must be, however elastic" (Buchan); an elastic term. Resilient implies a tendency to rebound or recover quickly health, spirits, etc., especially after subjection to stress or strain (see ELASTIC, 2); as, a resilient constitution. Springy, which is less common in extended use, may suggest youth, freshness, or buoyancy; as, a springy step. Flexible implies an adaptable or accommodating quality or, when applied to persons, pliancy or tractability; as, a flexible scheme; a flexible term; a flexible arrangement. "His [John Wesley's] mind became more flexible with age" (S. M. Crothers). Supple, in its extended use, is applied chiefly to persons or their utterances. Sometimes it suggests little more than flexibility: at other times, it implies obsequiousness or complaisance, or a show of these with what is actually astute mastery of a situation. "In... Bismarck, the supple spirit is hidden under an external directness and rough assertion" (Belloc).

Ana. Pliable, pliant, ductile, *plastic, malleable: limber, lithe, *supple.

Ant. Rigid (of bodies). — Con. *Stiff, inflexible, tense. 2 Elastic, expansive, resilient, buoyant, volatile, effervescent come into comparison only in their secondary senses when referred to persons, their temperaments, moods, acts, words, and the like, and mean showing ease or readiness in the stimulation of spirit, especially of high spirits. Elastic implies an incapacity for being kept down in spirits; specifically, it may suggest an ability to recover quickly from a state of depression (as, "those elastic spirits... had borne up against defeat"—Macaulay), or a tendency to moods of exaltation, elation, optimism, or the like (as, "There are times when one's vitality is too high to be clouded, too elastic to stay down"—Cather). "Not an elastic or optimistic nature—on the contrary, rigid and circumscribed, depressed by a melancholy temperament" (Symonds). Expansive, in current use, implies exaltation of spirit that tends to make a person unusually genial, communicative, sociable, or the like. In psychiatry, it often suggests additionally a delusion of greatness or a morbid sense of well-being, but these connotations are rare in general use. "She had an expansive temperament, a brilliant personality, a widely sympathetic disposition, troops of friends" (H. Ellis). Resilient implies a quick rebounding, or springing back to an original state after having been subjected to strain or stress; the word usually implies a return to normal good spirits, which may or may not be what are called high spirits; as, he was as resilient as ever, one day utterly exhausted, and the next day ready for fresh labors. "Evidently her resilient strength was going; she could no longer react normally to the refreshment of food" (H. Ellis). Buoyant (etymologically, having the power to rise or float) implies such lightness or vivacity of heart or spirits as is either incapable of depression or that readily shakes it off. "No such immaterial burden could depress that buoyant-hearted young gentleman for many hours together" (G. Eliot). "His buoyant spirits were continually breaking out in troublesome frolics" (Prescott). Volatile (etymologically, having the power to fly) implies diametrical opposition to all that is serious, sedate, or settled; it therefore suggests lightness, levity, or excessive buoyancy of spirits, and often flightiness or instability; as, "as giddy and volatile as ever" (Swift). "He [Leonardo] seemed to them [his contemporaries] so volatile and unstable. He was an enigma to which they never secured the key" (H. Ellis). Effervescent (etymologically, having the power to bubble and hiss like fermenting liquors) in its extended use implies liveliness, often boisterousness of spirits: it often suggests the effect of release after restraint and even more than buoyant implies the impossibility of suppression so long as the mood or temper lasts.

Ana. *Elated, elate, exultant: *spirited, high-spirited, mettlesome: *lively, vivacious, sprightly, animated, gay.

Ant. Depressed. — Con. Dejected, gloomy, melancholy, sad, blue (see corresponding nouns at SADNESS): flaccid, *limp.

elated or elate. Elated, elate, exultant agree in meaning feeling or manifesting great joy. Elated commonly suggests a certain excitement or exaltation of spirit, following upon success, good fortune, high praise, or the like; it frequently connotes undue self-satisfaction; as, "Keen anglers with unusual spoil elated" (Wordsworth). "I have found American writers, of world-wide reputation, strangely solicitous about the opinions of quite obscure British critics, and elated or depressed by their judgments" (Thackeray). Compare: "I felt no little elation at having now so happily established an acquaintance of which I had been so long ambitious" (Boswell). Elate is poetical or elevated for elated; as, "He walks As if he trod upon the heads of men: He looks elate" (Shelley). Exultant emphasizes rather the outward expression of triumph or joy; as, "Shouts exultant echo to the skies" (P. Whitehead); "he was exultant and could not conceal his delight" (S. Anderson); "that fierce exultation in carnage with which the war poetry of so many nations... is crimsoned" (Froude).

Ana. Rapturous, transported, ecstatic (see corresponding nouns at ECSTASY): joyous, joyful (see GLAD): high-spirited, *spirited.

Ant. Dejected. — Con. Depressed, melancholy, blue, gloomy, sad (see corresponding nouns at SADNESS): humiliated, humbled, abased (see ABASE): chagrined, mortified, *ashamed.

elderly. Old, *aged, superannuated.

Ant. Youthful.

elect, adj. Picked, *select, exclusive.

Ana. *Choice, exquisite, rare: selected, preferred, chosen, singled out (see CHOOSE): redeemed, saved, delivered (see RESCUE, v.).

Ant. Reprobate (in theology). — Con. Rejected, repudiated, spurned, refused (see DECLINE, v.): scorned, disdained (see DESPISE): doomed, damned (see SENTENCE, v.).

elect, v. 1 Select, pick, prefer, single out, opt, *choose, cull, hand-pick.

Ana. *Decide, determine, settle, resolve: conclude, judge (see INFER): *receive, accept, admit, take.

Ant. Abjure. — Con. Reject, spurn, repudiate, refuse, *decline: dismiss, *eject, oust, expel.

2 *Designate, name, nominate, appoint.

election. Selection, option, *choice, preference, alternative.

Ana. Deciding or decision, determining or determination, settling or settlement (see corresponding verbs at DECIDE).

electrify. *Thrill, enthuse.

Ana. Galvanize, excite, stimulate, quicken, *provoke: *stir, rouse, arouse, rally.

elegance. Elegance, grace, dignity come into comparison only when they denote an impressive beauty or comeliness. Elegance is used in reference to persons chiefly when their grooming, their clothes, and the way they wear them are specifically considered; it then often implies fashionableness and good taste, but it stresses perfection of detail and exquisiteness (sometimes, over-exquisiteness) as in materials, lines, ornamentation, and the like; as, the elegance in dress of a Beau Brummell.

When used in reference to things, such as the furnishings of a home, the details of a dinner, a literary style, the term also implies the perfection and propriety in detail that indicate excellence of taste, a nice selective instinct, and often, but far from always, a restrained luxuriousness. "A very pretty sitting-room, lately fitted up with greater elegance and lightness than the apartments below" (Austen). "A cultivated man should express himself by tongue or pen with some accuracy and elegance" (C. W. Eliot). Grace, as here compared, is more commonly applied to that which is inward and native than to that which is outward and acquired, especially when used in reference to persons; it always suggests a quality, or a harmonious combination of qualities, that gives aesthetic pleasure through a natural or simple beauty such as is shown in suppleness or rhythm of movement, in clean-flowing lines or contours, or in spontaneity and felicitousness of manner, mood, expression, style, or the like; as, "a behavior so full of grace and sweetness, such easy motions, with an air so majestic, yet free from stiffness or affectation" (Lady M. W. Montagu). "The effect upon the observer of this exquisite little edifice. . . was of an unparagoned lightness and grace" (C. Mackenzie). "She took the congratulations of her rivals and of the rest of the company with the simplicity that was her crowning grace" (E. Wharton). Dignity applies to that which compels respect and honor. The term often suggests stateliness, majesty, elevation of character or style, or the like, as the compelling cause; as, "the qualifications which frequently invest the façade of a prison with far more dignity than is found in the façade of a palace double its size" (Hardy); "There was a dignity in his Client, an impressiveness in his speech, that silenced remonstrating Reason" (Meredith); "Those who are just beginning to appreciate the idea of lending greater dignity to the worship of Almighty God" (C. Mackenzie). Very frequently, however, in current use, the term suggests the compulsion of intrinsic worth or merit, apart from any superficial characteristics that give it external beauty or comeliness; as, the dignity of work; the dignity of motherhood. "It matters not how trivial the occupation, if the man or woman [in a painting] be wholly given to it, there will be a natural compelling dignity in the figure" (Binyon).

Ana. Beautifulness or beauty, handsomeness, comeliness (see corresponding adjectives at BEAUTIFUL): fastidiousness, niceness or nicety, daintiness (see corresponding adjectives at NICE): perfection, *excellence: *taste (sense 2).

elegant, adj. Exquisite, *choice, recherché, rare, dainty, delicate.

Ana. Majestic, stately, noble, august, *grand: *beautiful, handsome: fastidious, *nice: *consummate, finished: sumptuous, *luxurious, opulent.

Con. Crude, *rude, rough: ostentatious, *showy, pretentious: bizarre, grotesque, *fantastic.

élégant, fem. élégante, n. Exquisite, *fop, dandy, beau, coxcomb, dude, macaroni, buck, spark, swell, nob, toff.

element. Element, component, constituent, ingredient, ingredient, factor come into comparison when they mean one of the parts, substances, principles, or the like, which comprise a compound or complex thing. Element is, except in its specific sense in science, the most widely applicable of these terms, being referable both to material and immaterial and to tangible and intangible things; as, the native and foreign elements in English; words are the elements of a sentence; the basic element of his character. "His life was gentle, and the elements So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up And say to all the world 'This was a man!'" (Shak.). Always in its scientific sense, often in its general sense, the term implies irreducible simplicity, or, if applied to a substance, incapacity for separation into simpler substances; thus, gold, silver, carbon, lead are among the chemical elements, or ultimate building units of matter; so, to analyze the elements of a situation; various substances are made of the same elements in different proportions. Component and constituent are often used interchangeably for any of the substances (whether elements or compounds) which enter into the makeup of a mixed thing, or for any of the principles or qualities which comprise an intangible composite. Component, however, stresses the separate identity or distinguishable character of the substance; constituent stresses its essential and formative character; as, copper and zinc are the components of brass; hydrogen and oxygen are the constituents of water; the components of the typical novel are its plot, its characters, and its setting; to break a ray of light into the colors which are its constituents; the hazardous components of burning oil; the constituents of a perfume. Ingredient applies literally to any of the substances or materials which when combined form a particular mixture such as a drink, a medicine, a food, an alloy, an amalgam; as, the ingredients of a cocktail (or of a cough medicine or of a cake); iron and carbon are the ingredients of steel. The term, however, is widely used figuratively of any component or constituent that can be thought of as added or as left out. "In this transaction every ingredient of a complete and legitimate contract is to be found" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Integrant (which is somewhat rare) applies only to a component, constituent, or ingredient which is essential to the whole; thus, not all the ingredients of a cake are integrants, for some are added merely to improve the taste; the integrants of blood. Factor is only loosely synonymous with the words of this group, constituent being its nearest synonym. Moreover the term is applicable only to a constituent, element, component, part, or member that has effective force enabling the whole substance, movement, organization, system, or the like, to perform a certain kind of work, or helping it in the production of a definite result. "God. . . is not one of the factors for which science has to account" (Inge). "Various factors entered the inception of the American enterprise" (H. Ellis). "The word 'vitamins' was coined to designate these essential food factors" (A. C. Morrison).

Ana. *Principle, fundamental: *part, portion, member: *item, detail, particular.

Ant. Compound (in science): composite. — Con. Mass, *bulk, volume: aggregate, whole, total, *sum.

elemental. *Elementary.

Ana. *Ultimate, categorical, absolute: *primary, prime, primordial.

elementary. Elementary, elemental are often confused. That is elementary which pertains to rudiments or beginnings; that is elemental which pertains to the elements, especially to the ultimate constituents or forces; as, an elementary treatise; an elementary knowledge of physics; an elementary virtue; an elementary school; the elemental sounds of language; an elemental substance; "they. . . busied themselves with the elemental, enduring things: sex, fatherhood, work" (R. Macaulay).

Ana. Basic, *fundamental, substratal: primal, *primary.

Ant. Advanced.

elephantine. *Enormous, huge, gigantic, giant, gigan-tean, colossal, mammoth, immense, vast, titanic, elocution. Elocution, oratory, eloquence are comparable only when they mean the art or the power of speaking impressively, especially in public, or the manifestation of such art or power. In current use, elocution applies, more frequently than either of the other terms, to the art of public speaking, whether it concerns the delivery of one's own or another's words. The term is now used chiefly in reference to a subject of study or of a course in a curriculum which stresses good speech, intonation, gesture, and other graces of delivery, rather than the content of what is uttered; as, a teacher of elocution; a prolonged study of elocution. "As she had never learnt elocution, practised speakers were puzzled at her method of voice production and its success" (H. Ellis). In older use, elocution implied a graceful, correct, or sometimes mellifluous, manner of speaking; as, "You have a natural, fluent, and unforced elocution" (Burke); "When he speaks, what elocution flows!" (Pope). In current use, the term is frequently used derogatorily with implications of artifice or of emphasis on sound rather than on sense. "Wherefore waste our elocution On impossible solution?" (W. S. Gilbert). Oratory, in early use, as still often in current use, applies to the art of delivering public addresses. In this sense, it implies emphasis upon the composition of effective speeches as well as upon their effective delivery, and therefore suggests attention to persuasive argument, telling exposition, and to all the means whereby auditors may be moved or swayed; as, "that part of oratory, which relates to the moving of passions" (Swift). The term is more often used, however, of the art as manifested or as practiced by public speakers, sometimes with approval, but frequently with the intent to depreciate its effectiveness, sincerity, or the like; as, the usual fourth of July political oratory. "Oratory is the power of beating down your adversary's arguments, and putting better in their place" (Johnson). "The Chadband style of oratory is widely received and much admired" (Dickens). Eloquence (etymologically, a speaking out) stresses the power of expressing one's thoughts and feelings with fluency and force. In older use, it emphasized rhetorical skill as well as actual or seeming loftiness of thought and expression; as, "With great wisdom and grave eloquence" (Spenser); "Talking and eloquence are not the same: to speak and to speak well, are two things" (B. Jonson); "The poetry of western nations is chiefly rhetoric—eloquence in metre" (Santayana). In current use, it implies impassioned, moving utterance and is applicable to that which is written as well as to that which is spoken; as, "The deep soul-moving sense Of religious eloquence" (Wordsworth); "His eloquence was irresistibly impressive" (Grote); "She had no flights of eloquence" (H. Ellis).

elongate. Lengthen, *extend, prolong, protract.

Ant. Abbreviate, shorten. — Con. Abridge, curtail, retrench (see SHORTEN): shrink, compress, *contract.

eloquence. *Elocution, oratory.

eloquent. 1 Articulate, voluble, *vocal, fluent, glib.

Ana. *Impassioned, passionate, fervid, perfervid, ardent, fervent: expressing, voicing, venting, uttering (see EXPRESS, v.): forceful, forcible, potent, *powerful.

2 *Expressive, significant, meaningful, pregnant, sententious.

Ana. Revealing, disclosing, telling, betraying (see REVEAL): impressive, *moving, poignant, touching, affecting.

elucidate. Interpret, construe, expound, *explain, explicate.

Ana. Illustrate, *exemplify: demonstrate, *prove.

elude. *Escape, evade, avoid, shun, eschew.

Ana. Thwart, foil, outwit, circumvent, baffle (see FRUSTRATE): flee, fly, *escape.

Con. *Follow, pursue, chase, trail, tag, tail.

2 Enervate, unman, *unnerve.

Ana. *Weaken, enfeeble, debilitate, sap, undermine.

Con. Energize, *vitalize.

embankment. Bank, dune, *mound, terrace, tumulus, barrow.

embarrass. Embarrass, discomfit, abash, disconcert, rattle, faze (or phase, fease, feeze) are commonly employed as though they were exact synonyms meaning merely to balk by confusing or confounding. Actually, in discriminating use, each one of these words is capable of expressing nice and distinctive shades of meaning. Embarrass characteristically implies some influence which impedes freedom of thought, speech, or action and may be used with reference not only to persons but also to the things they plan or desire to do. "A course of legislation ... which ... embarrassed all transactions between individuals, by dispensing with a faithful performance of engagements" (Ch. Just. Marshall). When said of persons it commonly implies, and often stresses, resulting uneasiness or constraint. "He had, he knew, a sort of charm—it embarrassed him even to admit it" (M. Austin). Discomfit still retains in good writers its etymological implication of being put to rout. It has, however, lost all military connotations, though a contest such as a battle of wits is often implied. "The idea of Mr. Slope's discomfiture [at failure to receive expected promotion] formed no small part of the Archdeacon's pleasure" (Trollope). It is often loosely and not warrantably used as though it meant to make uncomfortable. Abash presupposes self-confidence or self-possession and implies a check (usually a sudden check) to that mood by some influence that awakens shyness, a conviction of error or inferiority, or now, by confusion with abase, of shame. "A man whom no denial, no scorn could abash" (Fielding). "Delia [was] ... abashed by the base motives she found herself attributing to Charlotte" (E. Wharton). Disconcert, like embarrass, may be used in reference to actions and plans, but it is more frequently referred to persons. In either case, it implies an upsetting or derangement; in the latter, it suggests temporary loss of equanimity or of assurance. "When she saw him there came that flicker of fun into her eyes that was so disconcerting to Mr. Ezra" (Deland). Rattle (a colloquial word) more than disconcert stresses the emotional agitation accompanying the upset and implies, therefore, a complete disorganization of one's mental processes; as, the jeering rattled the team and caused them to play badly. Faze is an Americanism that has many variant forms which are mostly British and originally different in meaning. It is commonly found in negative expressions, where it comes close to disconcert, but sometimes carries the implications of abash and rattle; as, neither rebuffs nor threats faze him in the least.

Ana. *Discompose, disturb, perturb, fluster, flurry; bewilder, nonplus, perplex (see PUZZLE): *trouble, distress; vex, *annoy, bother, irk: impede, obstruct, block, *hinder: *hamper, fetter, shackle, hog-tie.

Ant. Relieve (persons): facilitate (plans, projects, etc.).

embassador. Variant of AMBASSADOR.

embellish. Beautify, deck, bedeck, garnish, *adorn, decorate, ornament.

Ana. Enhance, heighten, *intensify: apparel, array (see CLOTHE).

Con. Denude, *strip, bare, divest.

embers. *Ashes, ash, cinders, clinkers.

embezzle. Peculate, *defalcate.

Ana. *Steal, purloin, filch, pilfer, lift: *rob, loot, plunder, rifle: appropriate, *arrogate, confiscate.

embezzlement. Peculation, defalcation. See under DEFALCATE.

Ana. *Theft, larceny, robbery.

emblem. Attribute, *symbol, type.

Ana. Device, motif, design, *figure, pattern: *sign, mark, token, badge.

embody. 1 Incarnate, materialize, externalize, objectify, *realize, actualize, substantiate, substantialize, hypostatize, reify.

Ana. Invest, *clothe: illustrate, *exemplify: manifest, demonstrate, evidence, evince, *show.

Ant. Disembody.

2 Incorporate, assimilate, *identify.

Ana. *Add, annex, superadd, append: *introduce, insert, interpolate, interject: comprehend, *include, embrace, involve, imply.

embrace, v. 1 *Adopt, espouse.

Ana. Assume, *take: accept, *receive: seize, grasp, *take.

Ant. Spurn. — Con. Reject, refuse, repudiate, *decline: scorn, disdain (see DESPISE).

2 Comprehend, *include, involve, imply, implicate, subsume.

Ana. *Contain, hold, accommodate: comprise, *compose: embody, incorporate (see IDENTIFY).

Con. *Exclude, rule out, shut out, debar, eliminate.

embrasure. Bay, nook, alcove, *recess, niche, cubicle, carrel, carol.

emend. *Correct, rectify, revise, amend, remedy, redress, reform.

Ana. Mend, repair, remodel: *improve, better, ameliorate.

Ant. Corrupt (a text, passage, etc.).

Ana. Issue, emanate, *spring, flow, arise, rise, proceed, stem, derive, originate.

emergency. Exigency, contingency, crisis, pass, *junction, pinch, strait.

Ana. Situation, condition, posture, *state: *difficulty, vicissitude.

emigrant. Emigrant, immigrant are here compared only as denoting a person who leaves one country in order to settle in another. Emigrant (so also emigrate and emigration) is used with reference to the country from which, immigrant (so also immigrate and immigration) is used with reference to the country into which, migration is made. The former marks the going out from a country; the latter, the entrance into a country; as, a large crowd of Italian emigrants boarded the ship at Naples; Ireland lost heavily through emigration in the middle of the nineteenth century; "Our surplus cottage children emigrate to Australia and Canada or migrate into the towns" (H. G. Wells); Scandinavian immigrants settled large parts of the Middle Western United States; immigration from Europe has greatly decreased in the United States since a quota has been established for each country.

emigrate. Immigrate (see under EMIGRANT).

emigration. Immigration (see under EMIGRANT).

émigré. Immigrant, alien, foreigner, outlander, outsider, *stranger.

eminent. Illustrious, distinguished, noted, renowned, celebrated, *famous, famed, notorious.

Ana. Signal, outstanding, prominent, remarkable, conspicuous, *noticeable.

emissary, n. Emissary, spy, secret-service agent, secret agent, scout, intelligencer are here compared as denoting a person who secretly gathers information concerning the movements or plans of opponents, enemies, or the like. An emissary is an agent (in past usage, one who works in secret) appointed to detect the schemes of an opposing party or to influence their councils, or both; as, "By buzzing emissaries fills the ears Of listening crowds with jealousies and fears" (Dryden); "I am endeavouring to get this information by emissaries" (Wellington). The word is now less frequently used in a bad sense and often is applied to a diplomatic agent sent on a special mission; as, an emissary came from that government to negotiate the purchase of certain islands. A spy is properly one who enters an enemy's camp or territories in disguise, to obtain information; the term is usually one of opprobrium; as, "Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come" (Genesis xlii. 9); "His spies were everywhere, mingling with the suspected and insinuating themselves into their confidence" (Prescott). In current use, the terms secret-service agent or secret agent are often preferred to spy, but they (especially the first term) are also applicable to any agent who does detective work for the government, as in relation to counterfeiters, treasonable activities, and the like. A scout, as here compared, is a soldier sent out without disguise, usually at some hazard, to gain information; the word is not used in a derogatory sense; as, "As when a scout, Through dark and desert ways with peril gone All night... Obtains the brow of some high-climbing hill" (Milton). "The captain... continued to maintain the most vigilant precautions; throwing out scouts in the advance, and on every rising ground" (Irving). An intelligencer may be an emissary or spy, or he may be a secret agent whose chief aim is to gather and supply information that may be useful to his government in any way. "He has no diplomatic character whatever, but is to receive eight thousand livres a year, as an intelligencer" (Jefferson).

Ana. Envoy, *ambassador, legate, nuncio, minister: *agent, deputy, attorney.

emollient, n. Demulcent, *balm, salve.

Ant. Irritant.

emolument. Stipend, salary, fee, *wage, pay, hire, screw.

Ana. Compensation, remuneration, recompensing or recompense (see corresponding verbs at PAY): reward, meed, guerdon (see PREMIUM).

emotion. *Feeling, affection, passion, sentiment.

empathy. Sympathy, *pity, compassion, commiseration, ruth, condolence, bowels.

Ana. *Imagination, fancy, fantasy: appreciation, understanding, comprehension (see UNDERSTAND).

emphasis. Emphasis, stress, accent, accentuation agree in denoting exerted force by which one thing stands out conspicuously among other things; they also often designate the effect produced or the means used in gaining this effect. Emphasis implies effort to bring out that which is significant or important; as, he puts the emphasis on discipline in his teaching; an effective orator knows how to be sparing in his use of emphasis. Sometimes, it also suggests vigor or intensity of feeling. "Any one, however ignorant, can feel the sustained dignity of the sculptor's work, which is asserted with all the emphasis he could put into it" (H. Adams). Stress, though often used interchangeably with emphasis, is distinguishable from it both in some of its implications and in its association with particular arts, where it has acquired specific meanings. In most skillful use, it rarely loses its original implication of weight that causes pressure or strain, though this is often merely suggested. "'I wouldn't lay too much stress on what you have been telling me,' I observed quietly" (Conrad). "The rule of 'plainness' on which the Society [of Friends] still lays stress" (Inge). At times, stress strongly implies urgency or insistency. "Jane secretly approved his discernment. But all she said was, with her cool lack of stress, 'It's not so bad'" (R. Macaulay). In phonetics and prosody, stress is the general term referring to the prominence given to certain syllables or words by force of utterance. It may be used whether this prominence is attained, as in English, by tone emphasis or relative loudness, or, as in Greek and Latin, by the relatively longer time taken in utterance. It may also be used of the natural emphasis on certain words in a sentence. It may even suggest degree of emphasis. "Each syllable [was] given its due stress" (E. Wharton). Accent always implies contrast for the sake of effect, very frequently, an aesthetic effect. Accent carries no connotation of weight, but it strongly suggests relief, in both senses, that of relieving monotony, and that of bringing out sharply, or into relief; as, the room was quiet and neutral in coloring, but it was given accent by bowls of bright flowers. "It [the nurse's story] meandered... Tony had sometimes become... impatient over it, and insisted upon a sharper accent, in one or other of the little happenings" (Arch. Marshall). In prosody, accent is the form of stress characteristic of English verse, akin to the beat in music and involving force in utterance. In English phonetics, accent and stress are commonly used interchangeably. Since force of utterance (stress) is the principal means by which a syllable, a word, or a group of words is accented, or brought into sharp contrast with the others, one may speak of the syllabic accent or stress, word accent or stress, or the like. Accentuation, though close to accent (except in technical senses) often goes beyond it in its emphasis on increased conspicuousness; it also often suggests disagreeableness in the contrast. "The great length of his figure and his arms was accentuated by the wavering uncertain light" (S. Anderson).

empiric, n. Quack, charlatan, mountebank, faker, *impostor.

Ana. Tyro, dabbler, *amateur, dilettante.

Ant. Specialist.

employ, v. 1 *Use, utilize, apply, avail oneself of.

Ana. *Practice, exercise, drill: engross, absorb, *monopolize: *choose, select, pick.

2 Employ, hire are here compared not as synonyms, but as terms commonly confused in the sense of to engage a person's services. Employ (see also USE) implies use of a person's services, as in an industrial, clerical, or professional capacity; as, the company employs (that is, has in its employ) ten stenographers; the factory employs 1000 men. Thus, it is perfectly good English to say that a charitable organization employs only volunteer workers. Hire (see also HIRE) stresses the act of engaging the services of a person for compensation; as, ten additional men were hired this morning; it is the employment manager's business to hire and fire; he was hired to do repairing only.

Ana. Engage (see PROMISE).

employment. *Work, occupation, business, métier, calling, pursuit.

Ana. *Trade, craft, handicraft, art, profession.

empower. *Enable.

Ana. *Authorize, commission, accredit, license: train, instruct, discipline, *teach: endow, endue (see DOWER).

Con. Debar, disbar, shut out, rule out, *exclude.

emprise or emprise. Enterprise, *adventure, quest.

Ana. *Feat, exploit, achievement.

empty, adj. 1 Empty, vacant, blank, void, vacuous agree in meaning lacking the person(s) or thing(s) it (the noun qualified) may or should contain or hold. That is empty which has nothing in it; that is vacant which is without an occupant, incumbent, tenant, inmate, or the person or thing it appropriately contains; as, an empty (never vacant) bucket, bottle, purse, stomach; empty-handed; a vacant (not empty) see, pastorate, professorship, apartment, office, post. When qualifying the same nouns, the words usually suggest distinctly different ideas; thus, an empty house has neither furniture nor occupants; a vacant house is without inmates and presumably for rent or for sale; an empty chair has no one sitting in it at the time; a vacant chair is one that has lost its usual occupant by death or other cause; an empty space has nothing in it; a vacant space is one left to be filled with that which is appropriate. "[It] enabled him to fill a place which would else have been vacant" (N. Hawthorne). That (especially a surface) is blank which is free from writing or marks of any kind, or which has vacant spaces that are left to be filled in; as, a blank page, a blank application. The last two words are now comparatively rare in their literal senses. However, they (especially void, followed by of) are still occasionally found. That is void which is absolutely empty so far as the senses can discover; as, a conscience void of offense; "Sandy wilderness, all black and void" (Wordsworth); "The void, hollow, universal air" (Shelley). That is vacuous which is void or which encloses a vacuum; as, the vacuous glove of an incandescent lamp.

Figuratively, the same distinctions hold; thus, an empty mind is destitute of worthwhile ideas or knowledge; a vacant mind lacks its usual occupant, the soul or intellect; a blank look is without expression; a person is said to be void of learning or of common sense when not the slightest evidence of either one can be detected; a vacuous mind, look, or expression reveals inanity rather than emptiness. "Empty heads console with empty sound" (Pope). "The loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind" (Goldsmith). "His eyes had that blank fixed gaze... that babies' eyes have" (Wilkins). "It is dull and void as a work of art" (C. E. Montague). "In later years, some of Everett's pupils, seeing how vacuous his career had been, wondered that he had so beguiled their minds" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. *Devoid, destitute, void; *bare, barren: exhausted, drained, depleted (see DEplete).

Ant. Full. — Con. Replete, complete (see FULL).

2 Idle, hollow, *vain, nugatory, otiose.

Ana. Inane, *insipid, vapid, flat, jejune, banal: trifling, trivial, paltry, *petty: fruitless, *futile, vain, bootless.

Con. *Real, true, actual: significant, meaningful, pregnant (see EXPRESSIVE): *genuine, authentic, veritable, bona fide.

empyrean or empyreal. *Celestial, heavenly.

emulate. *Rival, compete with, vie with.

Ana. Imitate, *copy, ape: *match, equal, approach, touch.

emulous. *Ambitious.

Ana. Aspiring, aiming, panting (see AIM, v.): *eager, avid, keen, anxious, athirst, agog.

enable. Enable, empower come into comparison as meaning to make one able to do something. In ordinary usage, enable implies provision of the means or opportunity; empower, the granting of the power or the delegation of the authority, to do something; as, an income enabling one to live with dignity; a letter empowering one to act in another's behalf; "To give to the Cathedral fund a sum sufficient to enable Father Latour to carry out his purpose" (Cather); the president was empowered by Congress to conscript men for military service.

Ana. Permit, allow, *let.

Con. *Forbid, prohibit, inhibit: *prevent, preclude.

enamored or enamoured. Enamored (or enamoured), infatuated are very frequently used interchangeably, though with a loss in precision, in the sense of being passionately in love. Enamored usually, but not necessarily, connotes complete absorption in the passion. "Elizabeth-Jane... did not fail to perceive that her father... and Donald Farfrae became more desperately enamoured of her friend every day" (Hardy). Infatuated, when applied to lovers and their acts, carries all the implications of enamored but does not, in careful usage, surrender the implications of its primary sense (see FOND, 1), blind folly and unreasoning ardor. "You Scythrop Glowry, of Nightmare Abbey... infatuated with such a dancing... thoughtless, careless... thing as Marionetta" (Peacock).

Ana. Bewitched, captivated, fascinated (see ATTRACT): fond, devoted, doting, *loving.

enation. Consanguinity, *kinship, affinity, cognation, agnation.

enchant. Charm, captivate, allure, take, fascinate, bewitch, *attract.

Ana. Delight, rejoice, gladden, gratify, *please.

Ant. Disenchant.

enchanting. Charming, captivating, alluring, taking, fascinating, bewitching, attractive. See under ATTRACT.

Ana. *Delightful, delectable: *pleasant, pleasing, grateful, gratifying.

Con. Repulsive, repugnant, revolting, loathsome, *offensive: distasteful, obnoxious, repellent, abhorrent, *repugnant.

encomium. Encomium, eulogy, panegyric, tribute, citation agree in denoting a more or less formal and public expression of praise. Encomium implies enthusiasm or warmth in praising a thing or, now more often, a person; as, "Encomium in old time was poet's work" (Cowper); "the encomiums by my friend pronounced On humble life" (Wordsworth); "Lady Blandish's encomiums of her behaviour and her beauty annoyed him" (Mere- dith). Eulogy implies a more studied form than encomium; as a rule it applies to a speech (or writing) extolling the virtues and the services of a person; the term is especially and specifically applied to a funeral oration or sermon of this character. "Great minds should only criticize the great who have passed beyond the reach of eulogy or fault-finding" (A. Lang). "I would rather have a plain coffin without a flower, a funeral without a eulogy, than a life without... love and sympathy" (G. W. Childs).

Panegyric carries a far stronger implication of elaborate, high-flown, often poetical or rhetorical, compliment than any of the preceding terms but it does not now emphasize publicity as much as it once did. "But verse, alas! your Majesty disdains; And I'm not us'd to panegyric strains" (Pope). "All panegyrics are mingled with an infusion of poppy" (Swift). Tribute applies not only to spoken or written praise but to any act or situation which can be construed as taking its place; thus, Mrs. M. R. S. Andrews calls her story of the silence which followed Lincoln's delivery of the Gettysburg Oration, "The Perfect Tribute." "No tribute can be paid to them which exceeds their merit" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "I am appointed sole executor, a confidence I appreciate as a tribute to my lifelong friendship" (H. G. Wells). Citation is used, chiefly in the United States, in designating either the formal eulogy accompanying the awarding of an honorary degree or the specific mention of a person in military service in an order or dispatch; as, the citations at the 1940 commencement were written by the president of the university; the lieutenant holds ten citations for bravery in action.

Ana. Lauding or laudation, extolling or extollation, praising or praise (see corresponding verbs at PRAISE): plaudits, *applause, acclaim, acclamation: commending or commendation, complimenting or compliment (see corresponding verbs at COMMEND).

Con. Invective, *abuse, vituperation, obloquy.

encore. *Again, anew, afresh, anon.

encounter, n. Encounter, skirmish, brush. In their military senses, an encounter is a hostile meeting, often unexpected; a skirmish, a slight and desultory, often preliminary, encounter, commonly between light detachments of troops; a brush, a short but brisk skirmish. All three words are used of other than military contests; as, a sharp encounter of wits; a skirmish preliminary to a political campaign; a brush between opposing legal counsel.

Ana. *Battle, engagement: *contest, combat, conflict, fight, fray: clash, collision, *impact, impingement.

encroach. *Trespass, trench, entrench, infringe, invade.

Ana. *Enter, penetrate, pierce, probe: *intrude, butt in, obtrude, interlope: interfere, intervene, *interpose.

end, n. 1 *Limit, bound, term, bourn, confine.

Ana. *Extreme, extremity.

2 End, termination, ending, terminus come into comparison as opposed to beginning or starting point and as meaning the point or line beyond which a thing does not or cannot go, as in time or space or magnitude. End is not only the ordinary but also the most inclusive of these terms and it may be used of the final limit in nearly every possible application, such as in time (as, the end of the world; the end of a period; at the end of his life), or in space (as, the end of the road; the boy at the end of the line; the end of the peninsula), or in various other ways, such as in movement or action, in magnitude, in range of possibility, in extent of influence, etc. (as, the end of his journey; we have reached the end of the book; there is no end to his energy; the work approaches its end; to put an end to his capers. Termination and ending apply especially to the end in time or, less often, in space, of something that is brought to a close for any one of several reasons, such as having a set term or bounds or predetermined limits, or by being complete, finished, futile, or the like; as, the termination of a lease; the termination of the period agreed upon; the termination of a search; a fair beginning but a bad ending; "The maiden sang As if her song could have no ending" (Wordsworth). Terminus applies to the end (often in clear opposition to starting point) to which a person or a thing moves or progresses. The term usually suggests spatial relations and often indicates a definite point or place; as, the terminus of his tour; New York is the terminus of several important railroads; an airway terminus; "the object is the starting-point, not the terminus, of an act of perception" (Jeans).

Ana. Closing or close, concluding or conclusion, finishing or finish, completion (see corresponding verbs at CLOSE): culmination, climax (see SUMMIT): term, bound, bourn, *limit.

Ant. Beginning. — Con. Inception, *origin, source, root.

3 Objective, goal, aim, object, *intention, intent, purpose, design.

Ana. Destiny, *fate, lot, doom, portion: *function, office, duty.

end, v. *Close, conclude, terminate, finish, complete.

Ant. Begin. — Con. Commence, start, initiate, inaugurate (see BEGIN): originate, derive, arise, rise, *spring.

endeavor or endeavour, n. Essay, assay, striving, struggle, attempt, try. See under ATTEMPT, v.

Ana. Toil, labor, travail, *work: *effort, exertion, pains, trouble.

endeavor or endeavour, v. *Attempt, try, essay, assay, strive, struggle.

Ana. Apply, devote, *direct, address: determine, resolve, *decide.

endemic, adj. Indigenous, *native, autochthonous, aboriginal.

Ant. Exotic: pandemic (in medicine). — Con. Foreign, alien, extraneous, *extrinsic.

endemic, n. Indigene, native, autochthon, aborigine. See under NATIVE, adj.

ending, n. *End, termination, terminus.

Ana., Ant., & Con. See those at END, n., 2.

endless. Interminable, *everlasting, unceasing, never-ending.

Ana. *Lasting, perdurable, perpetual, permanent: eternal, illimitable, boundless, *infinite: *immortal, deathless, undying.

Con. Transitory, *transient, fugitive, passing, short-lived, ephemeral, evanescent.

endogenous. Autogenous, spontaneous, *automatic.

Ant. Exogenous.

endorse or indorse. *Approve, sanction, accredit, certify.

Ana. Vouch for, attest, *certify, witness: *commend, recommend: *support, uphold, champion, back, advocate.

Con. *Disapprove, deprecate: condemn, denounce, reprobate, reprehend, censure, *criticize: reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE).

endow. *Dower, endue.

Ana. Bestow, confer (see GIVE): *grant, award, accord: empower, *enable: *furnish, equip.

Con. Denude, *strip, divest, bare: despoil, spoliage, *ravage: exhaust, drain, *deplete, impoverish.

endue. Endow, *dower.

Ana. *Clothe, invest, vest: *furnish, equip, outfit, accouter: bestow, confer (see GIVE).

Con. See those at ENDOW.

endure. 1 *Continue, last, abide, persist.

Ana. Survive, outlast, *outlive: *stay, remain, wait, linger, tarry, abide.

Ant. Perish. — Con. Disintegrate, crumble, *decay.

2 Abide, tolerate, suffer, *bear, stand, brook.

Ana. Accept, *receive, take: submit, *yield.

Con. Reject, refuse, *decline, spurn, repudiate.

enemy. Enemy, foe agree in denoting a person or body of persons that is hostile or that manifests hostility to another. Enemy (etymologically, one who is unfriendly, or not a friend) usually stresses antagonism that arises from a cherished hatred or a desire to harm or destroy, but it may suggest nothing much more than active or evident dislike, or a habit of preying upon; as, a man with many friends and no enemies; the anarchist is the enemy of government; the woodpecker is the natural enemy of insects that infest the bark of trees; "Let the teacher appear always the ally of the pupil, not his natural enemy" (B. Russell). Foe, on the other hand, implies active warfare, either literally or figuratively; as, he is the foe of all reform measures; "[Samuel] Daniel, in his dedication of Cleopatra to the Countess of Pembroke, declared himself the foe of 'Gross Barbarism'" (T. S. Eliot); "Give me the avowed, the erect, the manly foe. Bold I can meet,—perhaps may turn his blow!" (G. Canning). When, however, the reference is to the nation or group of nations with whom a country (or the like) is at war, enemy is now preferred, foe being used in this sense chiefly in poetry or rhetorical prose; as, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours" (O. H. Perry); "Whispering with white lips—'The foe! They come! they come!'" (Byron).

Ana. *Opponent, adversary, antagonist: rival, competitor (see corresponding verbs at RIVAL).

Con. *Friend: ally, *partner, confederate, colleague: adherent, *follower, partisan.

energetic. *Vigorous, strenuous, lusty, nervous.

Ana. Forceful, forcible, *powerful, potent: *active, dynamic, live: *busy, industrious, diligent: *strong, stout, sturdy, stalwart, tough, tenacious.

Ant. Lethargic. — Con. *Languid, enervated, spiritless, listless: phlegmatic, apathetic, stolid, *impassive: sluggish, stuporous (see LETHARGIC): indolent, slothful, *lazy.

energize. *Vitalize, activate.

Ana. Stimulate, quicken, galvanize, excite (see PROVOKE): *stir, arouse, rouse, rally.

Con. Enervate, emasculate (see UNNERVE): *weaken, enfeeble, debilitate.

energy. Force, *power, strength, might, puissance, arm.

Ana. Dynamism, activity, operativeness or operation (see corresponding adjectives at ACTIVE): momentum, impetus, *speed, velocity, headway.

Ant. Inertia (in nonscientific use). — Con. Weakness, feebleness, decrepitude (see corresponding adjectives at WEAK): powerlessness, impotence, impuissance (see corresponding adjectives at POWERLESS).

enervate. *Unnerve, emasculate, unman.

Ana. *Weaken, enfeeble, debilitate, undermine, sap, disable: *abase, demean, debase, degrade: exhaust, jade, fatigue, *tire, weary.

Ant. Harden, inure. — Con. Energize, *vitalize, activate: galvanize, stimulate, quicken (see PROVOKE).

enervated. Languishing, *languid, languorous, lackadaisical, spiritless, listless.

Ana. Decadent, degenerated, deteriorated (see corresponding nouns at DETERIORATION): enfeebled, debilitated, weakened (see WEAKEN).

Con. Hardened, inured, seasoned (see HARDEN): stout, sturdy, tough, tenacious, *strong, stalwart: *vigorous, lusty, energetic, strenuous.

enfeeble. *Weaken, debilitate, sap, undermine, cripple, disable.

Ana. Impair, mar, harm, *injure: enervate, emasculate, *unnerv, unman.

Ant. Fortify.

enforce. Enforce, implement come into comparison when they mean to put something into effect or operation. Enforce, in the sense here considered, is used chiefly in reference to laws or statutes. The term suggests the exercise of executive rather than legislative power, or the use of the authority and the means given the magistrates, police, etc., to maintain order and security in the community; as, the governor decided to enforce certain blue laws which had long been ignored, as a means of calling attention to them and of arousing a demand for their repeal; to enforce traffic laws and regulations strictly. But enforce is also used in reference to agreements, rights, ends, and the like, which have legal sanction or a legal character and require the compulsory powers of the government or of the courts to ensure their fulfillment or their protection in case of violation; as, "Congress, as incident to its power to authorize and enforce contracts for public works" (Justice Holmes); "There was no legal process by which a citizen could enforce his rights against the state" (Buchan); "A government cannot inquire into religious conviction, but it can enforce conformity and outward respect for the forms of worship as 'by law established'" (Inge). Implement, which came into English use around 1800 in the sense of to fulfill or carry into effect a contract, an agreement, a promise, or the like, has seen rapid development in its implications since that time and especially since early in the third decade of the twentieth century, and its leading connotations are now fairly clear. Implement usually suggests reference to bills or acts which have been passed, proposals or projects which have been accepted, policies which have been adopted, and the like, and implies the performance of the acts that definitely carry them into effect or ensure their being put into operation. What these acts are varies according to the nature of the thing considered; thus, an agreement to reduce armaments is not implemented until the countries concerned have definitely determined the extent to which each one will destroy old armaments, the lowered rate at which it will make needed replacements, and the penalties which will accompany failure to observe the pledge; "equality of status" which was granted by the Imperial Conference of 1926 to the dominions of the British Commonwealth of Nations, was not implemented until the Statute of Westminster was passed by Parliament in 1931 repealing certain laws incompatible with this status and granting certain powers essential to its maintenance; an act providing for a greatly increased army and navy is not implemented until the necessary money is appropriated.

Ana. *Execute, administer: execute, fulfill, discharge, *perform: compel, constrain, oblige, *force.

Ant. Relax (discipline, rules, demands, etc.). — Con. Ignore, forget, disregard, *neglect.

enfranchise. Affranchise, emancipate, manumit, *free, release, liberate, deliver, discharge.

engage. Pledge, plight, *promise, covenant, contract.

Ana. Bind, *tie: agree, accede, acquiesce, *assent, consent, subscribe: hire, *employ.

engagement. 1 Engagement, affiancement, betrothal, espousal, sponsalia, as here compared, mean an agreement between a man and woman to marry each other.

Engagement, the ordinary term, implies merely a mutual pledge and carries no suggestion of a formal contract.

Affiancement, now rare as a noun (more frequent as a verb, especially as the participial adjective affianced) adds to engagement the implication of a formal announcement or of public acknowledgment. It may or may not imply the existence of a contract. Betrothal, even in loose use, stresses the act of plighting troth; in strict use, it suggests not only the act, but a ceremony in which the pledge is passed. Commonly also, in this stricter sense, it implies a formal contract regarding dowry and dower. Espousal, originally and in commonest current use, designates the act or ceremony of marriage. However, it is sometimes applied to the betrothal ceremony. This usage seems to have grown out of confusion with sponsalia, the term in canon law for a formal contractual marriage agreement. Espousal, in this sense, or sponsalia, in Roman Catholic usage, implies a contractual relationship which constitutes an impediment to the marriage of either party to another person and which makes such a marriage illegal, though not void.

Ana. Promising or promise, plighting, pledging or pledge, covenanting or covenant, contracting or contract (see corresponding verbs at PROMISE).

2 Engagement, appointment, rendezvous, tryst, assignation, date agree in meaning a promise or an agreement to be in a specified place at a specified time, usually for a specified or understood purpose. Engagement is the general term usable in place of any of the others; as, he has no business engagements for the rest of the week; an engagement to play golf at four o'clock; the lecturer can make no more engagements for the season.

Appointment is applied chiefly to an engagement with a person who because of the exigencies of his office, his profession, or his position in life must keep a calendar and apportion his time carefully among those who wish to consult him professionally or confer with him; as, the governor sees visitors only by appointment; the doctor's secretary said it was impossible to make an appointment before Thursday of the following week. Rendezvous more often designates a place agreed upon for the meeting of persons, often a group of persons (as, the old soldiers made the town hall their rendezvous), than an engagement to meet. This latter sense, however, is now more frequently found because the word was so used in Alan Seeger's poem written during the World War, "I have a rendezvous with Death" ("At some disputed barricade . . . When Spring trips north again this year, And I to my pledged word am true, I shall not fail that rendezvous"). As a consequence, rendezvous now usually connotes a pledge or covenant (often an implicit one) to meet something or someone that cannot be escaped without violation of one's honor. "This generation of Americans has a rendezvous with destiny" (F. D. Roosevelt). Tryst is now chiefly poetic; like rendezvous, it may designate the place of meeting (which, however, is more often termed trysting place) as well as the agreement to meet at a certain place, but the latter is the commoner denotation of tryst; as, a lovers' tryst; to keep their tryst in the wood. "Vivien, like the tenderest-hearted maid That ever bided tryst at village stile" (Tennyson). Assignation now usually denotes a lovers' tryst, but it commonly conveys a suggestion of an illicit love or of a clandestine meeting. Date is colloquial for engagement, and is used especially of casual engagements between friends or of an agreed meeting between a young man and young woman.

3 *Battle, action, push.

Ana. *Encounter, skirmish, brush: *contest, conflict, combat, fight.

Ana. Produce, *bear, yield: *provoke, excite, stimulate, quicken: rouse, arouse (see STIR).

engine. *Machine, apparatus, appliance.

engineer, v. *Guide, pilot, lead, steer.

Ana. Manage, direct, *conduct, control.

English, adj. English, British, Anglo-Saxon, Anglican. Only the first two of these terms are frequently confused, but all of them are sometimes used carelessly. English suggests primarily a racial difference; it implies reference to the people who inhabit England, especially in contrast to those (the Scots and the Welsh) who inhabit other parts of the island called Great Britain (or Britain for short). Thus, the English language is not only the tongue of this people, but it was developed in that part of Great Britain inhabited by them. Consequently, whenever anything is thought of as the peculiar possession or contribution of the people of England, English is the required adjective; as, English traditions; English blood; English customs; an English Christmas; English common law; English fair play. British, as applied to a people, suggests reference primarily (especially in historical writing) to the race which inhabited Great Britain prior to the invasions of Low Germans in the fifth and sixth centuries; it is, however, used frequently with reference to the people of Great Britain or of the United Kingdom, and less often, but in a generic sense, of any person of English, Scottish, Welsh, or Irish descent living in any part of the British Empire whether inside or outside the British Isles; as, any subject of British descent. "She didn't look British, she looked like a foreigner, a Hungarian or something like that" (Maugham). More often, however, British suggests a political reference, or implies connection with a political unit, the British Empire, or especially, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (or, prior to 1922, Great Britain and Ireland); as, British subjects; British dominions, colonies; the British sovereign, constitution, parliament (English only when the emphasis is on its origin); the British prime minister. These, however, are the precise uses of British; in looser usage English is often employed where British would be the exact term. Anglo-Saxon, a much misused term, in discriminating use always implies reference either to the people which in England was formed by the consolidation of the Low German invaders, Danes, and native Celts (the original British) after the sixth century, or to the language brought into England by these invaders and developed by Anglo-Saxons; as, the Anglo-Saxon heptarchy; Anglo-Saxon (as distinguished from Celtic, Danish, Norman, etc.) elements in the English language. In loose modern usage, the term often implies English or British birth or ancestry, especially when free from admixture; as, of Anglo-Saxon stock: in still looser use, it implies the predominance of persons of British ancestry; as, the Anglo-Saxon nations. Anglican is very occasionally used in place of English; its chief application, however, is to the Established Church of England, or to the communion (Anglican Communion) or loose federation of churches, including the Church of England and those churches in other countries (such as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States) which are offshoots of the former and follow, in general, its doctrines, discipline, and ritual; as, Anglican services; Anglican preachers.

Ana. Refresh, *renew, restore, rejuvenate: stimulate, excite, quicken, galvanize, *provoke: entertain, recreate, divert, *amuse: inspire, fire, *inform, animate.

Ant. Deaden: subdue. — Con. *Depress, oppress, weigh down, on, or upon.

enmity. Enmity, hostility, antipathy, antagonism, animosity, rancor (or rancour), animus agree in meaning intense deep-seated dislike or ill will or a manifestation of that feeling. Enmity implies more than the absence of amity or a friendly spirit; it suggests positive hatred which may or may not be dormant or concealed. "I will put enmity between thee and the woman" (Genesis iii. 15). "Angry friendship is sometimes as bad as calm enmity" (Burke). Hostility, on the other hand, suggests active and usually, but not necessarily, open enmity manifesting itself, as in warfare, in violent attacks, in ostracism, and the like. "The unremitting hostility with which... [these poems] have each and all been opposed" (Wordsworth). "If we could read the secret history of our enemies, we should find in each man's life sorrow and suffering enough to disarm all hostility" (Longfellow). Antipathy and antagonism usually imply a temperamental or constitutional basis for one's hatred or dislike. Antipathy suggests aversion or repugnance, and often, in consequence, avoidance or repulsion of the person or thing hated. "Inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded" (Washington). "Mark... found it so hard to conceal his antipathy that he could not understand... [why] Dayrell went out of his way to cultivate his society" (C. Mackenzie). Antagonism stresses the clash of temperaments and the quickness with which hostilities are provoked or the spirit of resistance is aroused; as, Karl Marx believed that the hostility of one nation to another will come to an end when the antagonism between classes within these nations vanishes. "Some note of viceregal authority must have lingered in her voice for the caretaker's antagonism changed to a sort of bedraggled obsequiousness" (V. Sackville-West). Animosity and rancor denote emotions of such intensity or violence that they may, if not given release, provide the ground for active hostility. Animosity usually suggests anger, vindictiveness, and sometimes, a desire, if not an intent, to destroy that which one hates. "The Bishop had let the parish alone, giving their animosity plenty of time to cool" (Cather). "Her hatred of the idea of it was intensified into a violent animosity" (Bennett). Rancor stresses bitterness and ill will amounting to malevolence; it often implies a grudge or grievance. "'Tis not my speeches that you do dislike, But 'tis my presence that doth trouble ye. Rancour will out: proud prelate, in thy face, I see thy fury" (Shak.). Animus suggests less emotional violence than animosity, but it implies more definitely a prejudice or ill will that seeks to find expression. "There was no mistaking his intentions; he had transferred his animus to me, convinced I was to blame for his rejection" (V. Heiser).

Ana. Hate, hatred, detestation, abhorrence, loathing (see under HATE, v.): aversion (see ANTIPATHY); malignity, ill will, malevolence, *malice.

Ant. Amity. — Con. Friendliness, amicability (see corresponding adjectives at AMICABLE): *friendship, comity, good will.

ennui. Doldrums, boredom, *tedium.

Ana. Depression, dejection, dumps, blues, vapors, melancholy, *sadness: listlessness, languidness, languor, languor, spiritlessness (see corresponding adjectives at LANGUID): satiation or satiety, surfeiting or surfeit, cloying (see corresponding verbs at SATIATE).

enormity. Enormity, enormousness are usually distinguished in good current usage, even though both mean the state or the quality of being enormous. Enormity applies preferably to the state or quality of exceeding all bounds in wickedness or evil, and therefore of being abnormally, monstrously, or outrageously evil.

"Newson... failed to perceive the enormity of Henchard's crime" (Hardy). "The sensation of standing there... and wishing her dead, was so strange, so fascinating and overmastering, that its enormity did not immediately strike him" (E. Wharton). Enormousness applies to the state or quality of exceeding all other things of its kind in size or amount; as, the enormousness of a whale; the enormousness of the cost of war; the enormousness of Greater New York; the enormousness of a candidate's majority in an election. Enormity, but not enormousness, may also be used as an instance of that which is characterized by enormity, or monstrous wickedness; as, the enormities of which Caligula was guilty.

Ana. Outrageousness, atrociousness or atrocity, heinousness, monstrousness (see corresponding adjectives at OUTRAGEOUS): flagrancy, grossness, rankness (see corresponding adjectives at FLAGRANT).

enormous. Enormous, immense, huge, vast, gigantic, giant, gigantean, colossal, mammoth, elephantine, titanic, herculean, Cyclopean, Antaeon, Gargantuan, Brobdingnagian (or, incorrectly, Brobdignagian) come into comparison as meaning exceedingly or excessively large. Enormous suggests an exceeding of all bounds and therefore abnormality not only in size or amount but in degree (specifically of wickedness); as, enormous rocks; enormous herds; enormous expenditures; an enormous appetite; an enormous change; to take enormous delight in something; enormous wickedness; enormous crimes. Immense etymologically implies immeasurableness, but in current use it more often suggests a size, amount, degree, or the like, which exceeds ordinary measurements or standards; it therefore often means extremely large without suggesting abnormality or monstrousness; as, an immense plain; immense clouds; "the world of today... in its immense variety" (C. W. Eliot); the immense influence of a book. Huge commonly suggests immensity of bulk, vast suggests immensity of extent; as, a huge mass of earth; a vast expanse of the sky; "huge over-dressed dowagers" (Wilde); a vast expanse of bosom. In the extended senses of the terms, these distinctions do not always hold but careful writers and speakers usually prefer huge when the emphasis is on the greatness of a person's (or thing's) capacity (as, his huge enjoyment of a tour; a huge eater) and vast when the emphasis is on a thing's range, scope, or variety, as well as extent (as, vast knowledge; his vast interests; the vast number of his activities). Gigantic implies comparison (literally or figuratively) with the size, the prowess, or the activities of a giant or one who has exceeded normal human limits in size and in strength; as, a gigantic man; gigantic efforts; "a gigantic rose-tree" (L. P. Smith); "if this is our object, we must confess that our [academic] instruction is a gigantic failure" (Grandgent). Giant, gigantean are often used in place of gigantic, the ordinary word in best usage. Colossal implies comparison (literally or figuratively) with a statue of enormous height and size (such as the Colossus of Rhodes, a statue of Apollo, 120 feet in height) and therefore suggests stupendousness or incredibility; as, "the colossal speed of 15,000 miles a second" (Jeanes); "physics is building colossal high-voltage engines for invading the recesses of the atoms" (Karl K. Darrow); "wars have now become so colossal that every woman's husband, father, son, brother, or sweetheart, if young and strong enough to carry a rifle, must go to the trenches" (Shaw). Mammoth and elephantine suggest the hugeness characteristic of, or a ponderousness appropriate to, the mammoth (an extinct and very large elephant), and the elephant; as, a mammoth ox; a mammoth rock; the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky; an elephantine tread; "he was no sooner stretched in bed, than he seemed to be of an enormous size; all his limbs—his nose, his mouth, his toes—were elephantine!" (Meredith). All the other terms imply the enormousness or the hugeness of certain mythical or fictitious personages: titanic, that of the Titans, or the primeval Greek gods, conceived of as colossal in size and earth-shaking in power (as, a titanic effort; a titanic ship; "Eight million volts, or four million, or even a single million—these are titanic voltages!"—Karl K. Darrow); herculean, that of the Greek hero Hercules, noted for his gigantic strength and prowess (as, a herculean task; "he swallowed at one gigantic gulp, and out of the same herculean jug"—Mencken); Cyclopean, that of a mythical race of giants of great brute strength and capacity for heavy work (as, a Cyclopean engine); Antaeus, that of Antaeus, the mythical Libyan giant and wrestler, son of Gaea (the goddess Earth), whose strength was renewed when he touched his mother earth (as, Antaeus powers; Antaeus strength); Gargantuan, that of Gargantua, the gigantic king with an enormous appetite who is the hero of the satirical romance (usually called Gargantua) by Rabelais (as, a Gargantuan pudding; a Gargantuan voice; a Gargantuan appetite); Brobdingnagian, that of the inhabitants of the mythical country of Brobdingnag (in Swift's Gulliver's Travels), where each man is "as tall as an ordinary spire steeple" (as, "a bran-new brobdingnagian hotel"—Disraeli).

Ana. Prodigious, stupendous, tremendous, *monstrous, monumental: inordinate, exorbitant, *excessive, extravagant.

enormousness. *Enormity.

Ana. Immenseness or immensity, hugeness, vastness (see corresponding adjectives at ENORMOUS): tremendousness, prodigiousness, stupendousness, monstrousness, (see corresponding adjectives at MONSTROUS).

enough. *Sufficient, adequate, competent.

Ana. Satisfying, contenting (see SATISFY): ample, plenteous, *plentiful.

Con. *Meager, scanty, scant, skimpy, exiguous: *deficient.

enquire. Variant of INQUIRE.

enquiry. Variant of INQUIRY.

enrage. Infuriate, madden, incense, *anger.

Ana. Exasperate, provoke, aggravate, roil (see IRRITATE).

Ant. Placate. — Con. *Pacify, appease, mollify, propitiate, conciliate.

ensconce. Screen, secrete, *hide, conceal, cache, bury.

Ana. Shield, guard, safeguard, protect, *defend: shelter, lodge (see HARBOR).

Con. Expose, exhibit, display, *show.

ensign. *Flag, standard, banner, color, streamer, pennant, pennon, jack.

ensnare. Snare, entrap, trap, bag, *catch, capture nab, cop.

Ana. *Lure, entice, inveigle, decoy.

ensue. *Follow, succeed, supervene.

Ana. Issue, emanate, proceed, stem, *spring, derive, originate, rise, arise: pursue, *follow, chase.

ensure. Ensure, insure, assure, secure come into comparison because they all carry as their underlying meaning to make a person or thing sure. Ensure and insure are practically variant forms when they mean to make one thing sure, certain, or inevitable as the consequence, result, or sequel of another. Ensure, however, is generally preferred by good writers and speakers; as, this medicine will ensure (or insure) his recovery; to take precautions that will ensure (or insure) the safety of passengers. "That to read poetry is a gentlemanly occupation is not a very high class motive for reading it, but it insured poetry against neglect" (Day Lewis). "The child crept to the edge, and was balanced on the very verge. To call to it, to touch it, would have insured its destruction" (Jefferies). Both words may also take a personal object (seldom a personal subject except in the technical sense of insure), but the preferred word, when the implication is that of making a person sure by removing all doubt, or suspense, or uncertainty from his mind, is assure; thus, a certain financial arrangement may ensure a fixed income to a person for a long period, or it may assure him of a fixed income for that time. For assure usually means to impart certainty or, when the subject of the verb is a person, to impart one's own conviction or subjective certitude. "I dare assure thee that no enemy Shall ever take alive the noble Brutus" (Shak.). "What your father needs is to be assured that your change of plans is going to make you happy" (M. Austin). Insure (but no longer ensure) and assure are closely related in their technical sense of to indemnify (a person) against loss by a contingent event (see INSURANCE), but insure is now the common and general term even in Great Britain where assure was once frequently used specifically in reference to life insurance. Secure implies the performance of an act, the taking of a measure, or the existence of a condition that ensures the safety of a person or of a thing, or his or its protection against contingencies; as, "how to secure the lady from surprisal" (Milton); "lock the door to secure us from interruption" (Dickens); "[the cultivated Greek needed] a competence, to secure him against sordid cares, health, to ensure his physical excellence" (G. L. Dickinson). Specifically, one secures a debt, or a note, or any financial obligation when one provides the means whereby the creditor will be protected from loss in the event of the debtor's default.

entente. Treaty, pact, compact, covenant, concordat, convention, cartel, *contract, bargain, indenture, mise.

enter. 1 Enter, penetrate, pierce, probe, as here compared, agree in meaning to make way into something so as to reach (at least) the interior. Enter (see also ENTER, 2) is the most comprehensive of these words and the least explicit in its implications. When the word takes a person for its subject, it often means little more than to go in or to go into (as, he entered the house; the women entered the dining room), but sometimes it also suggests the beginning of a course of study, a career, or the like (as, to enter college; to enter Parliament; "to enter the highest finance"—Belloc). When enter takes a thing for its subject, it implies a making way through some medium, sometimes a dense, sometimes a resisting, medium; as, the rain could not enter the frozen earth; the bullet entered the body near the heart; such an idea never entered his mind. Penetrate (see also PERMEATE) carries a far stronger implication than enter of an impelling force or of a compelling power that makes for entrance (as, "the salt rain. . . penetrates the thickest coat"—Jefferies): it also more often suggests resistance in the medium (as, "Frémont had tried to penetrate the Colorado Rockies"—Cather; his sight could not penetrate the darkness) and it may imply either a reaching the center or a passing through and an issuing on the further side (as, to penetrate the depths of a forest; armor plate so thick that no cannon ball can penetrate it). Penetrate, especially as an intransitive verb, often specifically takes as its subject something that is intangible or at least not objective but that has (in affirmative expressions) the power of making its way through; as, the influence of Christianity has penetrated to the ends of the earth; a penetrating odor; a penetrating voice. Often also, as distinguished from the other terms, penetrate suggests the use of a keen mind, or the exercise of powers of intuition or discernment in the understanding of the abstruse or mysterious; as, "We cannot penetrate the mind of the Absolute" (Inge); "in seeking to penetrate the essential character of European art" (Binyon); "Aunt Rosa could penetrate certain kinds of hypocrisy, but not all" (Kipling). Pierce in the earliest of its English senses implies a running through with a sharp-pointed instrument such as a sword, a spear, a knife, or the like; as, "they pierced both plate and mail" (Spenser); to pierce his opponent with a sword. In all of its extended senses it carries a far stronger implication than penetrate of something that stabs or runs through, or of something that cuts into the very center or through to the further side; as, to feel the piercing cold in every nerve; "A passion like a sword-blade That pierced me thro' and thro'" (V. Lindsay); "How was one to pierce such hidebound complacency?" (C. Mackenzie). Often, the term imputes great poignancy or aesthetic effectiveness far beyond what is usual to the thing that pierces; as, "The remembrance of all that made life dear pierced me to the core" (Hudson); "Whatever is expressed with art—whether it be a lover's despair or a metaphysical theory—pierces the mind and compels assent and acceptance" (A. Huxley). Probe derives its implications from the earliest of its senses, to use a probe (i.e., a long slender instrument used by surgeons in exploring wounds, cavities, and the like, for the sake of ascertaining their depth, their condition, or their contents). In its extended senses it implies penetration so far as circumstances allow or so far as one's powers or skills permit and it usually suggests an exploratory or investigatory aim; as, "The bog or peat was ascertained, on probing it with an instrument, to be at least fifteen feet thick" (Lyell); "Probe my quick core, and sound my depth" (C. Rossetti); "the only one...with whom he cared to probe into things a little deeper than the average level of club and chop-house banter" (E. Wharton). In one of its current senses, probe means little more than to investigate thoroughly as by questioning those in a position to know facts; as, "A rascally calumny, which I was determined to probe to the bottom" (Scott).

Ana. Invade, entrench, *trespass, encroach: *intrude, butt in: *begin, commence, start.

Ant. Issue from.

2 Enter, introduce, admit are synonymous only when they mean to cause or permit to go in or get in. Enter, in its causative sense, is used chiefly in idiomatic phrases, though occasionally it is employed in the sense to drive or force in; as, he could not enter the wedge between the layers of rock. In idiomatic use, it commonly implies writing down, as in a list, a roll, a catalogue, or a record, but in some of these phrases it also connotes the observance of other formalities; thus, to enter a word in a dictionary is to list it in alphabetical order and define its meaning; to enter one's son at a private school is to send in his name as a candidate for admission; to enter a judgment is to put it upon record in the proper legal form and order. Introduce is often preferred to enter when it implies insertion. "The painter who was introducing a tree into his landscape" (H. Ellis). "When a bit of finely filiated platinum is introduced into a chamber containing oxygen and sulphur dioxide" (T. S. Eliot). "Aunt Harriet...introduced herself through the doorway...into the interior of the vehicle" (Bennett). It is the precise word when used of things not native and brought into a country or locality for the first time; as, plants introduced into America by the colonists. Sometimes, its use connotes an alien character in that whose entrance is effected; as, to introduce one's own ideas into the interpretation of a poem. Admit, as here compared, usually means let in; it may imply a human agent; as, the maid admitted the callers to the drawing room: more often, however, it is predicated of a means; as, small windows admit light to the cell.

Ana. Insert, interpolate, intercalate, insinuate, *introduce.

enterprise, n. *Adventure, emprise, quest.

Ana. Exploit, *feat, achievement: struggle, striving, endeavor, essay, attempt (see under ATTEMPT, v.).

entertain. 1 *Harbor, shelter, lodge, house, board.

Ana. *Receive, admit: cultivate, cherish, foster (see NURSE): *feed, nourish.

2 Divert, *amuse, recreate.

Ana. *Please, delight, gratify, rejoice, gladden, regale: beguile, *while, wile.

entertainment. Diversion, amusement, *recreation. See under AMUSE.

Ana. *Feast, fete, fiesta, festival: *banquet, dinner: play, sport, disport (see under PLAY, v.).

enthuse. *Thrill, electrify.

enthusiasm. 1 *Inspiration, afflatus, fury, furor, frenzy.

Ana. *Ecstasy, rapture, transport: fanaticism, zealotry, bigotry (see corresponding nouns at FANATIC).

2 Fervor, ardor, *passion, zeal.

Ant. Apathy. — Con. Impassivity, phlegm, stolidity (see under IMPASSIVE): unconcern, detachment, aloofness, indifference (see corresponding adjectives at INDIFFERENT).

enthusiast, n. Enthusiast, fanatic, zealot, bigot, as here compared, denote a person who manifests excessive ardor, fervor, or devotion in his attachment to some cause, party, church, or the like. Although enthusiast in current general use commonly denotes a person of keen and ardent interests, and carries either favorable or unfavorable connotations, such as mental or spiritual vitality or a subordination of judgment to enthusiasm, its strict etymological sense still obtains in historical works and is the more common in literature up to the nineteenth century. In that sense, the term applies particularly to a preacher, a member of a religious sect, or, sometimes, a poet, who claims to be immediately inspired or who outwardly manifests signs (such as rapture, madness, intense emotionalism) associated with divine inspiration or possession by a god. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries particularly, the term was usually one of contempt applied to a member of one of the new evangelical sects such as Anabaptists; as, "the visions, voices, revelations of the enthusiast" (Glanvill). "Harmonic twang!... Such as from lab'ring lungs th'enthusiast blows" (Pope). "She [the Roman Catholic Church] thoroughly understands what no other Church has ever understood, how to deal with enthusiasts" (Macaulay). Fanatic, like enthusiast in this restricted sense, also carries a hint of madness or irrationality. In contrast to enthusiast, however, the term suggests extreme, monomaniac devotion and a concentration of attention, sometimes on the end to be gained but, possibly more often, on the chosen means to one's end, regardless of the real value of that end. Fanatic, therefore, in distinction from enthusiast, connotes determination, often silent determination, and an uncompromising temper; as, the murderer of Lincoln was, according to one theory, a fanatic; anarchism tends to produce fanatics. "This creature Man, who in his own selfish affairs is a coward to the backbone, will fight for an idea like a hero. He may be abject as a citizen; but he is dangerous as a fanatic" (Shaw). Zealot often implies fanaticism, it always suggests ardent devotion, but it distinctively emphasizes vehement activity in the service of one's cause, party, or church. It may or may not connote blinding partisanship but it usually suggests jealous vigilance in protecting one's beliefs or institutions. "For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight" (Pope). "A furious zealot may think he does God service by persecuting one of a different sect" (J. Gilpin). Bigot implies obstinate, often blind, devotion to one's own (especially religious) beliefs or opinions; as compared with fanatic and zealot, the term implies dogged intolerance and contempt for those who do not agree rather than enthusiasm or zeal; as, "the hell that bigots frame to punish those who err" (Shelley); "Not that the modern bigot is any more tolerant or less cruel than her ancestors" (Shaw).

Ana. Devotee, votary, *addict, fiend.

entice. *Lure, inveigle, decoy, tempt, seduce.

Ana. Snare, ensnare, trap, entrap (see CATCH): cajole, blandish, *coax, wheedle.

Ant. Scare. — Con. *Frighten, alarm, terrify, fright.

entire. 1 *Whole, total, all, gross.

Ana. Complete, *full, plenary.

Ant. Partial.

2 *Perfect, whole, intact.

Ana. Integrated, concatenated (see under INTEGRATE, v.): unified, consolidated, compacted (see COMPACT, v.).

Ant. Impaired.

entrance. Entrance, entry, entree, ingress, access, in the sense in which they are here considered, agree in meaning the act, fact, or privilege of going in or coming in. All but entree also carry the denotation of a way or means of entering. Their differences are largely in their applications and in their connotations. Entrance is the widest in its range of application and the thinnest in its specific implications; it fits in with nearly every context; as, to await the entrance of the king, of a wedding party, of the jury; a twenty-five cent ticket gives you entrance to this exhibit; the entrance is through a gate or a hole in the fence. Entry, by comparison, often but not always imputes a formal or ceremonial character to the act of entering. "The trumpet will announce the Nuncio's entry" (Browning). When used with reference to a place where one enters, it usually signifies a door, a gate, a portico, or now commonly, a vestibule or entrance hall; as, the postman throws the letters in the entry. "I hear a knocking At the south entry" (Shak.). It has almost completely yielded its meaning of the privilege or right of entrance to entree. The latter word, however, is usually restricted in its application and suggests exclusiveness in those admitting, or distinction or social gifts in those admitted. "My mother's introductions had procured me the entree of the best French houses" (Lytton). Ingress, because of legal use, carries more than any of the others the implication either of permission to enter or of encroachment; as, his deed gives him use of the path with free ingress and egress. "We pardon it; and for your ingress here Upon the skirt and fringe of our fair land" (Tennyson). When used concretely it more often suggests a natural passageway than an architectural structure; as, a narrow gap is the only ingress to the valley. Access, like ingress, implies admission where barriers are imposed, but they may be of many kinds: social, legal, personal, etc., as well as natural. "He is here at the door and importunes access to you" (Shak.). Access is distinguished from the other words of this group by its emphasis on approach rather than on entrance; as, explorers still find the North Pole difficult of access, in spite of their use of airplanes; the access to the harbor was through a long narrow channel.

Ant. Exit.

entrap. Trap, snare, ensnare, bag, *catch, capture, nab, cop.

Ana. Seize, *take, clutch: *lure, inveigle, decoy, entice. entreat. *Beg, beseech, implore, supplicate, importune, adjure, conjure.

Ana. *Ask, request, solicit: pray, appeal, plead, petition, sue (see under PRAYER).

entree. *Entrance, entry, ingress, access.

Ana. Admission, *admittance.

entrench or intrench. Trench, encroach, *trespass, infringe, invade.

Ana. *Monopolize, engross, consume, absorb: *interpose, interfere, intervene.

entrust or intrust. Confide, *commit, consign, relegate.

Ana. *Allot, assign, allocate: *rely, trust, depend, count, bank, reckon.

entreat. *Beg, beseech, implore, supplicate, importune, adjure, conjure.

Ana. *Ask, request, solicit: pray, appeal, plead, petition, sue (see corresponding nouns at PRAYER).

entry. 1 *Entrance, entree, ingress, access.

Ana. *Door, doorway, gate, gateway, portal, postern.

2 Entry, entryway, hall, vestibule, narthex, foyer, anteroom, antechamber, lobby agree in denoting a room leading to the interior of a building or of a special apartment or suite. Entry, entryway, and hall are the most common terms for a room or way through which one passes after entering a building from out of doors or after entering an apartment from a public corridor. Entry and entryway are sometimes distinguished from hall, especially in the United States and in reference to residences, when there are two rooms or ways that come under this description. The small space between an outer and an inner door in which one waits until one's ring or knock is answered is then termed an entry, or entryway; the room or passage to which one is admitted is called, in contradistinction, a hall. Vestibule is often used in a general sense, but it is more commonly applied to a large space serving as a passageway or waiting room between the outside door or doors of a building and the doors leading to the interior (often an auditorium); as, the bridal party waited in the vestibule of the church. The vestibule of a church is sometimes technically called a narthex; the vestibule of a theater and of some pretentious apartment buildings is often called a foyer. The latter term is also often applied to a large hall or reception room at the entrance to a luxurious apartment. An anteroom and an antechamber are rooms in which callers, clients, and the like, wait until admitted to an apartment, an office, or private quarters. Antechamber, in distinction from anteroom, carries connotations of a regal or official setting, and often of regal splendor. A large open space on the ground floor of a hotel or a capitol building, which serves not only as a vestibule and as an anteroom but also as a place where the guests of the hotel or the members of a legislative body in session may confer with others, is called a lobby. Though the word in American use commonly suggests an entrance room, in British use it may suggest an anteroom or a corridor; thus, lobby in reference to the British House of Commons may designate either a large room for the public outside the legislative chamber or one of two corridors (division lobbies) to which the members retire to vote when the house divides.

entryway. *Entry, hall, vestibule, narthex, foyer, lobby, anteroom, antechamber.

enumerate. *Count, tell, number.

Ana. Compute, *calculate, reckon: *add, sum, total, figure: rehearse, recount, recite (see RELATE).

enunciate. *Pronounce, articulate.

envious. Envious, jealous are not close synonyms but they come into comparison because both carry as their basic meaning that of grudging another's possession of something desirable. But envious stresses a coveting of that which belongs to another, such as riches, possessions, or attainments, or of that which has come to another, such as success or good fortune; in its strictest, but not now most common sense, it implies either a gnawing, often a malicious, desire to deprive one of that which gives him gratification, or a spiteful delight in his dispossession or loss of it; as, "Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace, To silence envious tongues" (Shak.). "Here and there along the course wherein we hoped to glide Some envious hand has sprinkled ashes just to spoil our slide" (Eugene Field). Frequently, however, the stress is on coveting, rather than on a desire to injure; as, we are all envious of your good fortune. Jealous often stresses intolerance of any rival for the possession of a thing which one regards as peculiarly one's own or on the winning of which one has set one's heart, but sometimes it merely implies intensely zealous efforts to maintain that which one possesses. The term often is used without derogation; as, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me. . . for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God" (Exodus xx. 3-5); "proud of their calling, conscious of their duty, and jealous of their honour" (Galsworthy). However, the term often carries a strong implication of distrust, suspicion, enviousness, or sometimes, anger; as, a jealous wife; "he was jealous of Carson's fame as an Indian-fighter" (Cather); stabbed by a jealous lover.

Ana. *Covetous, grasping, greedy; grudging, coveting, envying (see COVER): malign, malignant, spiteful, *malicious, malevolent.

Con. Generous, *liberal, bountiful: kindly, *kind, benign, benignant.

environment. *Background, setting, milieu, backdrop, mise-en-scène.

envision, envisage. Conceive, imagine, *think, realize, fancy.

Ana. View, behold, survey, contemplate (see SEE): objectify, externalize, materialize, *realize.

envoy. *Ambassador, legate, minister, nuncio, inter-nuncio.

envy, v. *Covet, grudge, begrudge.

Ana. *Long, pine, hanker, yearn.

eon. Variant of AEON.

eonian. Variant of AEONIAN.

ephemeral. *Transient, transitory, passing, fugitive, fleeting, evanescent, momentary, short-lived.

Ana. *Daily, diurnal: *brief, short.

epicene. Hermaphrodite, hermaphroditic, *bisexual, androgynous.

Ana. Effeminate, womanish (see FEMALE, adj.).

epicure. Epicure, gourmet, gourmand, glutton, bon vivant, gastronome, gastronomer come into comparison as meaning one who takes pleasure in eating and drinking. An epicure, in modern usage, is one who is choice and fastidious while at the same time voluptuous, in enjoyment of food and drink; the term is also applied to a connoisseur in any art the enjoyment of which suggests both feasting and delicacy of taste. "I am become a perfect epicure in reading; plain beef or solid mutton will never do" (Goldsmith). A gourmet is a connoisseur in delicate viands, liquors, wines, and the like; the term carries as its distinctive connotation the savoring of each morsel of food or sip of wine, and the power to distinguish delicate differences in flavor or quality; as, "the most finished gourmet of my acquaintance" (Thack- eray). Gourmand implies less fastidiousness and less discernment than gourmet, but it suggests a hearty interest in good food and drink rather than, as glutton, greedy and voracious eating and drinking; as, "I dare say, their table is always good, for the Landgrave is a gourmand" (Chesterfield); "Youth is a gourmand when it cannot be a gourmet" (McClure's Mag.). "It would be difficult to determine whether they were most to be distinguished as gluttons or epicures; for they were, at once, dainty and voracious, understood the right and the wrong of every dish, and alike emptied the one and the other" (Burney). Bon vivant (literally, a good liver), a French phrase much used in English, differs little from gourmand except in its stronger connotation of a lively or spirited enjoyment of the pleasures of the table, especially in the company of others; as, "The Major was somewhat of a bon-vivant, and his wine was excellent" (Scott); "he was also a bon-vivant, a diner-out, and a story-teller" (Fraser's Mag.). Gastronome and the rarer gastronomer are equivalents of epicure though far less frequently used than that term. "A conversation on the mysteries of the table, which... a modern gastronome might have listened to with pleasure" (Scott).

Ana. Connoisseur, *aesthete, dilettante.

epicurean. Sybaritic, luxurious, *sensuous, sensual, voluptuous.

Ana. Fastidious, dainty, *nice, particular.

Ant. Gross (taste, life, habits, etc.).

epigram. Aphorism, apothegm, *saying, saw, maxim, adage, proverb, motto.

episode. 1 *Digression, divagation, excursus.

Ana. *Deviation, divergence, deflection: departing or departure (see corresponding verb at SWERVE).

2 Incident, event, *occurrence, circumstance.

epistle. *Letter, missive, note, message, dispatch, report, memorandum.

epitome. Conspectus, synopsis, *abridgment, abstract, brief.

Ana. Précis, aperçu, sketch, digest, *compendium.

epoch. Era, age, *period, aeon.

equable. Even, constant, *steady, uniform.

Ana. Regular, *orderly, methodical, systematic: invariable, immutable, unchangeable (see affirmative adjectives at CHANGEABLE): *same, equal, equivalent.

Ant. Variable, changeable. — Con. Fluctuating, wavering (see SWING): *fitful, spasmodic.

equal, adj. Equivalent, *same, very, identical, identic, tantamount.

Ana. Equable, even, uniform (see STEADY): like, alike (see SIMILAR): proportionate, commensurate (see PROPORTIONAL).

Ant. Unequal. — Con. *Different, diverse, disparate, various, divergent.

equal, v. *Match, rival, approach, touch.

Ana. *Compare: square, accord, tally, correspond, *agree.

equanimity. Equanimity, composure, sang-froid, phlegm agree in meaning the mental temper of one who is self-possessed or not easily disturbed or perturbed. Equanimity suggests either a proper mental balance or a constitutionally equable temper; it therefore may imply a delicate adjustment of one's emotional and mental powers that is liable to disturbance only under great strain, or a settled attitude of mind which repels all that disturbs; as, "His placidity of demeanor... arose from... the equanimity of a cold disposition rather than of one well ordered by discipline" (Trollope); "it was some time before Wildeve recovered his equanimity" (Hardy); "Stoicism teaches men... to accept with proud equa- nimity the misfortunes of life" (Inge). Composure commonly implies the conquest of mental agitation or disturbance, but it may imply a temperamental freedom from agitation; as, "His passions tamed and all at his control, How perfect the composure of his soul" (Cowper); "There was his son lying all but dead, and the man was still unconvinced of the folly he has been guilty of. I could hardly bear the sight of his composure" (Meredith). Sang-froid (a French term meaning cold blood) implies great coolness and steadiness, especially under strain; as, "no being ever stood in a pedagogue's presence with more perfect sang froid" (Disraeli); "at all these [gambling games] she won and lost, with the same equable sangfroid" (R. Macaulay). Phlegm suggests an apathy of mind or sluggishness of temperament that results from a physical condition rather than from discipline or self-control; it therefore suggests even greater imperturbability and insensitiveness than any of the preceding terms; as, soldiers with phlegm stand war better than all others; "the patience of the people was creditable to their phlegm" (Meredith).

Ana. Poise, equipoise, *balance, equilibrium: self-possession, self-assurance, aplomb (see CONFIDENCE): tranquillity, serenity, placidity, calmness (see corresponding adjectives at CALM).

Con. Discomposure, agitation, disquieting or disquiet, perturbing or perturbation, disturbance (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE).

equilibrium. Equipoise, poise, *balance, tension.

Ana. Stableness or stability (see corresponding adjective at LASTING): stabilization, steadying (see corresponding verbs at STABILIZE): counterbalancing or counterbalance, counterpoising or counterpoise (see corresponding verbs at COMPENSATE).

equip. *Furnish, outfit, appoint, accouter, arm.

Con. Divest, dismantle, denude, *strip: despoil, spoliolate, *ravage.

equipment. Equipment, apparatus, machinery, paraphernalia, outfit, tackle, gear, matériel (or material) are comparable when they mean all the things that are used in a given work or are useful in effecting a given end. Equipment usually, but not invariably, covers everything needed for efficient operation or efficient service, except the personnel; thus, the equipment for a polar expedition would include not only the vessels, instruments, and implements required, but also the sleds, dogs, clothing, food, medicines, and the like; the equipment for any industry includes its buildings, machines, tools, and the like; the equipment, of furnishings, utensils, supplies, etc., provided for beginning housekeeping. Sometimes, but not often, equipment is more limited in its application; thus, in railroading, it covers only the rolling stock and not the roadbed and stations. In extended use equipment is also employed in reference to persons and covers the qualities and skills necessary to their efficiency or competency in a given kind of work. "Knowledge, penetration, seriousness, sentiment, humor, Gray had them all; he had the equipment and endowment for the office of poet" (Arnold). "A health officer needed more than technical training...it appeared that diplomacy should constitute a major part of his equipment" (V. Heiser). Apparatus, in its literal and collective sense, usually covers only the instruments, tools, machines, and appliances used in a given craft or profession or in a specific operation; thus, the apparatus of a dentist includes all the mechanical and electrical devices he uses in his professional work; the apparatus of a laboratory, as distinguished from its equipment, consists of all the mechanical requisites for carrying on operations or experiments. When used in reference to persons or employments not requiring mechanical devices, apparatus denotes all the external aids useful in prosecuting a particular kind of work; thus, the apparatus of a scholar in Old English includes all the reference books, texts, glossaries, bibliographies, and the like, that he finds essential to or helpful in his investigations. "Formal lectures, with an appalling apparatus of specimens, charts, and wall pictures" (Grandgent). Machinery, as a collective term, derives its implications more from its early application to the material contrivances or devices by which an end is effected, especially on the stage and in the production of a play, than from its later and more common application to the power-driven apparatus which effects certain kinds of work by transmitting and modifying force and motion. The term therefore covers all the devices, means, or agencies which permit a thing to function (as an organism, a government, an institution, a law) or which enable it to accomplish its ends (as a movement, a political party, propaganda). "The physiological machinery of the body is so adjusted that great variations of atmospheric temperature can be supported without detriment" (V. Heiser). "Public meetings, harangues, resolutions, and the rest of the modern machinery of agitation had not yet come into fashion" (Macaulay). "If the peoples wanted war, no machinery could prevent them from having it" (Inge). Paraphernalia usually suggests a collection of the miscellaneous articles or belongings that constitute the usual accompaniments (often the necessary equipment) of a person or group of persons in a particular employment, activity, or the like; as, the paraphernalia of a circus; the paraphernalia of a tourist. "Little piles of wheels, strips of unworked iron and steel, blocks of wood, the paraphernalia of the inventor's trade" (S. Anderson). The word frequently carries a slightly contemptuous connotation such as that associated with trash, trumpery, fripperies; as, to clear a boy's room of all its paraphernalia. Outfit is sometimes interchangeable with equipment, but it has a slightly more colloquial flavor and is preferred when the latter term might seem pretentious; as, a camper's outfit; a gambler's outfit. It often specifically suggests wearing apparel and other necessities for a journey, a school year, a new employment, or the like; as, a bride's outfit; a college girl's outfit; a soldier's outfit. Tackle is also a more colloquial term than apparatus, which otherwise it closely resembles; as, fishing tackle. Gear is variously used, sometimes approaching equipment (as, "You've got a good six hours to get your gear together"—Conrad), sometimes apparatus (as, sportsman's gear), sometimes outfit, or wearing apparel (as, "servants...ready in waiting at Pathankote with a change of gear"—Kipling). It is also occasionally the most general of these terms and equivalent to one's belongings collectively. "They are all, as far as worldly gear is concerned, much poorer than I" (Shaw). Matériel, a French word now naturalized in English, or its English equivalent material (somewhat rare in this use), is used in industry and in military affairs as a comprehensive and unambiguous term that covers everything but the personnel; that is, buildings, furnishings, apparatus, and supplies.

equipoise. Equilibrium, poise, *balance, tension.

equitable. *Fair, just, impartial, unbiased, dispassionate, uncolored, objective.

Ana. *Proportional, proportionate, proportionable, commensurate, commensurable: equal, equivalent, *same, identical.

Ant. Inequitable, unfair. — Con. Unreasonable, *irrational.

equity. *Justice.

equivalent, adj. Equal, *same, identical, identic, selfsame, very, tantamount.

Ana. Like, alike, comparable, parallel, uniform (see SIMILAR): proportionate, commensurate (see PROPORTIONAL): *reciprocal, correspondent, convertible.

Ant. Different. — Con. Disparate, diverse, divergent, various (see DIFFERENT): discrepant, discordant, *inconsonant, incompatible.

equivocal. Ambiguous, *obscure, dark, vague, enigmatic, cryptic.

Ana. Dubious, questionable, *doubtful.

Ant. Unequivocal. — Con. *Explicit, express, definite, specific, categorical: perspicuous, lucid, *clear.

equivocate. Prevaricate, *lie, palter, fib.

Ana. *Deceive, mislead, delude: evade, elude, *escape.

equivocation. *Ambiguity, tergiversation, double-entendre, amphibology, amphibologism.

Ana. Prevarication, lying or lie, paltering, fibbing or fib (see corresponding verbs at LIE): duplicity, dissimulation, *deceit.

era. Age, epoch, *period, aeon.

eradicate. Uproot, deracinate, extirpate, *exterminate, wipe out.

Ana. *Abolish, annihilate, extinguish, abate: *destroy, demolish, fix: obliterate, efface, *erase, blot out.

Con. *Set, fix, establish, firm, settle: *implant, inculcate, inseminate, instill, infix: propagate, engender, breed, *generate.

erase. Erase, expunge, cancel, efface, obliterate, blot out, delete, dele agree in meaning to strike out something so that it no longer has effect or existence. Erase, in its literal sense, implies a scraping or rubbing out of something that is written, engraved, or painted; as, to erase a word or a line of an inscription. In its extended sense, erase often refers to something that has been eradicated, as if by scraping or rubbing out, after it has impressed or imprinted itself on the memory of a man or on the memories of men, or has become part of an unwritten record. "Have a few years totally erased me from your memory?" (Gray). "The old boyhood notion... that a town and a people could remake him and erase from his body the marks of what he thought of as his inferior birth" (S. Anderson). Expunge (etymologically, to mark for erasure by pricks or dots set above or below) has in English use, possibly through confusion with sponge, come to imply so thoroughgoing an erasure that the thing affected is wiped out completely. "A woman's history, you know: certain chapters expunged" (Meredith). "The most primitive ways of thinking may not yet be wholly expunged" (W. James). Cancel (etymologically, to strike out something written by marking it with crossing lines suggestive of latticework) was in earliest use applied chiefly to legal documents such as deeds, indentures, wills, and the like, which were rendered null or invalid by so marking them or by tearing or otherwise defacing them. Consequently, cancel in its far more common extended sense implies some action that renders a thing null, invalid, or worthless, or rules it out of existence. Sometimes it implies a legal annulling (as, to cancel a contract or a writ); sometimes, a revoking or rescinding (as, to cancel an order); sometimes, a neutralization, as of one thing by its opposite (as, "The later kindness... may cancel a greater previous wrong"—Jowett). In legal, postal, and philatelic use, to cancel is to mark a stamp so as to indicate that it has served its purpose and to prevent its re-use. Such cancellation was made at first merely with pen and ink (pen cancellation), later with obliterators of many devices, and now usually by machine in the form of parallel lines. Efface, more strongly than erase, implies the complete removal of something impressed or imprinted on a surface; as, constant use gradually effaces the figures and letters on a coin; to efface the offensive murals in a public building. As a result, in its extended use, efface often implies destruction of every visible or sensible sign of a thing's existence. "While nations have effaced Nations, and Death has gathered to his fold Long lines of mighty Kings" (Wordsworth). "The attempt to efface the boundaries between prose and verse" (Lowes). Oftentimes, especially in reflexive use, it implies an attempt to make inconspicuous or vague; as, to efface oneself in the company of others. Obliterate and blot out both literally imply rendering a thing undecipherable by smearing it, as with ink, or with something which hides its existence; as, "A smear of decisive lead-coloured paint had been laid on to obliterate Henchard's name" (Hardy); to blot out a passage in a manuscript. Both words are more often used, however, with the implication of the removal of every trace of a thing's existence; as, the falling snow rapidly obliterated all signs of approaching spring; "A successful love... obliterated all other failures" (J. W. Krutch). "Then rose the Seed of Chaos, and of Night, To blot out Order, and extinguish Light" (Pope). Delete and the corresponding cant term of printers, dele, both imply marking something in a manuscript or proof for omission from the text that is to be published or distributed. "Whenever you feel an impulse to perpetrate a piece of exceptionally fine writing, obey it—wholeheartedly—and delete it before sending your manuscript to press" (Quiller-Couch). But delete, which etymologically means to destroy, and once carried that meaning in English, now also often suggests eradication or elimination by the exercise of arbitrary power; as, the censor deleted all the interesting parts of the letter.

Ana. *Remove, draw, withdraw: annul, *nullify, negate: *abolish, extinguish.

Con. Imprint, impress, print, stamp (see corresponding nouns at IMPRESSION).

eremite. Hermit, anchorite, *recluse, cenobite.

eristic. *Controversial, polemic, polemical, apologetic.

erosion. Erosion, corrosion, abrasion, attrition are often confused because of overlapping implications. Erosion and corrosion imply a gradual wearing away or disintegration; erosion, usually by a mechanical process such as friction; corrosion, by a chemical process such as rusting. However, they are at times used interchangeably.

Abrasion (see ABRADE), like erosion, implies a wearing away by friction, but it is applied to surfaces only and it usually suggests a more restricted area of effectiveness; as, the erosion of a hillside by running water; the abrasion of coins by ordinary handling; the abrasion of teeth in chewing. Attrition implies wearing down by abrasion or a process like abrasion, but it usually connotes action so prolonged that disintegration or, figuratively, exhaustion is the result; as, sand is often formed by the attrition of pebbles in a stream. "He [Tiberius] broke the enemy by the only methods possible—starvation, attrition, and a slow, deadly scientific envelopment" (Buchan).

erotic. Erotic, amatory, amorous, amative, aphrodisiac (or aphrodisiacal) are not always clearly distinguished in use. All involve the idea of love for the opposite sex but they are not interchangeable because of differences in denotation as well as in implications. Erotic, though the strongest in its suggestions of love as a violent passion or as a physical appetite, is rarely applied to persons; its chief use is in characterizing or classifying emotions, motives, themes in art, and the like; as, erotic love; erotic tendencies; erotic music; an erotic poet is a writer of erotic poetry. "It was the persuasion that the deprivation was final that obsessed him with erotic imaginations

...almost to the verge of madness" (H. G. Wells). Amatory is a synonym of erotic, but far weaker in its suggestion of sexual desire; it sometimes connotes little more than ardent admiration; thus, one might more correctly describe the youthful love poems of Tennyson as amatory than as erotic poetry. "Sir Lucius... has been deluded into thinking that some amatory letters received by him from Mrs. Malaprop are from Lydia" (Sir Paul Harvey). Amorous is applied chiefly to persons, their words, or their acts, especially when they are falling in love or are making love. "Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier, And back retir'd... her heart was elsewhere" (Keats). "Yielded, with coy submission, modest pride, And sweet, reluctant, amorous delay" (Milton). The word often suggests ripeness or eagerness for love. "A prince I was, blue-eyed, and fair in face, Of temper amorous, as is the first of May" (Tennyson). In this sense it is also applied to animals; as, "While falling, recalling, The amorous thrush concludes his sang" (Burns). Amative implies merely a disposition to fall in love, or a propensity for loving; it is chiefly used in describing temperaments or in analyzing character; as, he is not normally amative. Aphrodisiac, once applied chiefly to drugs, is now applied also to writings, music, works of art, and the like, that arouse or tend to arouse sexual desire; as, "the laboured unreserve of aphrodisiac novels and plays" (C. E. Monague); "three men... played upon a violin, a 'cello and a guitar some of T. P.'s most seductive and aphrodisiacal compositions" (American Mercury).

Ana. Passionate, *impassioned, fervid, perfervid, ardent, fervent: *carnal, fleshly, sensual.

erratic. Eccentric, odd, queer, *strange, singular, peculiar, unique, quaint, outlandish, curious.

Ana. Aberrant, *abnormal, atypical: *irregular, unnatural, anomalous: capricious, fickle, mercurial, *inconstant.

Con. Normal, *regular, typical, natural: *usual, customary, wonted, habitual: *common, ordinary, familiar: conventional, formal (see CEREMONIAL): *decorous, decent, seemly, proper.

error. Error, mistake, blunder, slip, lapse, faux pas, bull, howler, boner, bloomer, floater come into comparison when they denote anything such as an act, statement, or belief that involves a departure from what is, or what is generally held to be, true, right, or proper. Error etymologically implies deviation; it suggests culpability but not necessarily carelessness or intention, for it implies a guide to be followed such as a record or manuscript (as, a historical error; a typographical error), or a rule or set of rules (as, an error in addition; an error in reasoning), or a principle, law, accepted code, or the like (as, an error in conduct, a grammatical error). "Those who, with sincerity and generosity, fight and fall in an evil cause, posterity can only compassionate as victims of a generous but fatal error" (Scott). Mistake implies misconception, misunderstanding, a wrong but not always blameworthy judgment, or inadvertence; it expresses less severe criticism than error; as, he made a serious mistake when he chose the law as his profession; a child makes many mistakes in spelling when he strictly follows the phonetic method. "There is a medium between truth and falsehood, and (I believe) the word mistake expresses it exactly. I will therefore say that you were mistaken" (Cowper). Blunder is harsher than mistake or error; it commonly implies ignorance or stupidity, sometimes blameworthiness. "We usually call our blunders mistakes, and our friends style our mistakes blunders" (H. B. Wheatley). "One's translation [of a medieval poem] is sure to be full of gross blunders, but the supreme blunder is that of translating at all when one is trying to catch not a fact but a feeling" (H. Adams). Slip carries a stronger implication of inadvertence or accident than mistake, and often, in addition, connotes triviality; as, the wrong date on the check was a slip of the pen; "a social slip which makes us feel hot all over" (L. P. Smith). Often, especially when it implies a transgression of the moral law, the word is used euphemistically or ironically. "Let Christian's slips before he came hither... be a warning to those that come after" (Bunyan). "People... don't send for him [the minister] every time they make a slight moral slip,—tell a lie, for instance, or smuggle a silk dress through the custom-house" (Holmes). Lapse, though sometimes used interchangeably with slip, stresses forgetfulness, weakness, or inattention more than accident; thus, one says a lapse of memory or a slip of the pen, but not vice versa. "You gave natives bits to copy under all possible threats against lapses of accuracy" (M. Austin). When used in reference to a moral transgression, it carries a weaker implication of triviality than slip and a stronger one of a fall from grace, one's own standards, or the like. "For all his... lapses, there was in him a real nobility, an even ascetic firmness and purity of character" (H. Ellis). Faux pas (literally, a false step), a French phrase in frequent English use, once was applied to a serious moral lapse, especially one that is a cause of scandal. "The road of virtue, in which I have trod thus long, and never made one Trip, not one faux pas" (Congreve). In current use, the phrase is often applied to a mistake in etiquette; as, she was carefully instructed so that there was no danger of her making a faux pas when she was presented at the Court of St. James's. Bull and howler apply to ridiculous blunders. Bull (often Irish bull, because regarded by some persons as characteristically Irish) implies a combination of utterly incongruous ideas in a statement that at first sight or hearing appears reasonable, as, for example: He remarked that it was hereditary in his family not to have children. Howler implies ignorance or confusion of ideas and is applied chiefly to gross and ludicrous errors in information tests or in scholastic examinations; as, a printed collection of schoolboy howlers. Boner, bloomer, and, in British use, floater are all slang terms applied chiefly to gross or stupid blunders; as, to pull (i.e., make) a boner; "you are making the bloomer of a lifetime" (P. G. Wodehouse); "She... made what she called... a floater" (A. Huxley).

errorless. Faultless, faultless, *impeccable.

Ana. *Correct, accurate, exact, precise, right, nice.

ersatz, adj. *Artificial, synthetic, factitious.

erudite. *Learned, polymathic, scholarly.

erudition. Learning, scholarship, *knowledge, science, information, lore.

escape, v. 1 Escape, flee, fly, decamp, abscond agree in meaning to run away, especially from that which limits one's freedom or threatens one's well-being. Escape so stresses the idea of eluding confinement or restraint that it very often conveys no suggestion of wrongdoing or of danger. "One of the most powerful motives that attract people to science and art is the longing to escape from everyday life" (H. Ellis). "The cactus, which had escaped from a decorative garden bed and now covers virtually thousands of acres" (V. Heiser). Flee implies haste and often abruptness in the departure; as, there was evidence that the burglars had been frightened and had fled. It often, but not always, connotes disappearance, especially when used figuratively of things; as, the mists fled before the rising sun. By etymological confusion, fly has long been used as a variant of flee. However, its use is restricted in idiomatic English to the present tense where it is commonly preferred to flee. "Fly, father, fly for all your friends are fled" (Shak.). Decamp usually suggests a sudden departure to elude discovery or arrest; it commonly carries a disparaging, sometimes a humorous, connotation. "Having imparted my situation to my companion, she found it high time for us to decamp" (Smollett). Abseond adds to decamp the distinctive implications of clandestine withdrawal and concealment to avoid the consequences of fraudulent action. "He had the appearance of a bankrupt tradesman abseonding" (Meredith).

Con. *Follow, chase, pursue, trail, tag.

2 Escape, avoid, evade, elude, shun, eschew, as they are here compared, agree in meaning to get away or to keep away from that which one does not wish to incur, to suffer, to encounter, or the like. Escape when referred to persons (sometimes to animals) usually implies a threat to their liberty or well-being; in this sense it may or may not imply running away from, or even an effort to miss that which threatens, but it does suggest the latter's imminence or likelihood; as, to escape suspicion or discovery; to escape the family tendency to tuberculosis; to escape annoyance; to escape a blow by dodging it; few fish can escape this net. When referred to things, especially to inanimate or even to intangible things, escape is largely figurative and connotes something comparable to a net which holds and confines, yet permits passage through it; as, details which escape the mind; "nothing escaped the kind eyes" (Deland); "The exquisite beauty of this passage, even in translation, will escape no lover of poetry" (G. L. Dickinson). Avoid, in contrast with escape, suggests a keeping clear of that which one does not wish to risk or knows to be a source of danger, rather than a getting away from that which actually threatens; thus, one may escape suspicion by avoiding persons or places that are being watched; one may avoid all known sources of contagion, yet not escape infection. "He kept himself somewhat aloof, seeming to avoid notice rather than to court it" (Arnold). Avoid, however, is often used interchangeably with escape; it is the preferred word when a danger is averted by forethought, prudence, or caution. "Mother and son avoided an open rupture by never referring to their differences" (Santayana). "By pooling our difficulties, we may at least avoid the failures which come from conceiving the problems of government to be simpler than they are" (Frankfurter). Evade implies escape or the intent to escape, but it also commonly suggests avoidance by the use of adroit, ingenious, or, sometimes, underhand means; thus, one evades suspicion who escapes it by spreading rumors that throw others off the scent; one evades a question one does not wish to answer by seeming not to hear it. "The exacting life of the sea has this advantage over the life of the earth, that its claims are simple and cannot be evaded" (Conrad). "'I have a horror of the men who evaded service during the war'" (R. Macaulay). Elude comes closer to escape than to avoid, but stresses a slippery or baffling quality in the thing which gets away or cannot be captured. "Whose secret presence, through creation's veins running quicksilverlike, eludes your pains" (FitzGerald). "For are we not all fated to pursue ideals which seem eternally to elude us" (L. P. Smith). Elude, however, is sometimes used in place of evade when there is a strong suggestion of shiftiness or unreliability or of the use of stratagems; as, she is adept in eluding her obligations; in the game of hide-and-seek the players try to elude discovery by the one seeking their hiding places. Shun differs from avoid chiefly in its added implication of an abhorrence or aversion that is sometimes temperamental in its origin, but oftentimes rational and dictated by one's conscience, one's experience, or one's sense of prudence; as, "[lepers] shunned and rebuffed by the world" (V. Heiser); "to shun for his health the pleasures of the table" (Quiller-Couch). "Thus have I shunn'd the fire for fear of burning" (Shak.). "I used to live entirely for pleasure. I shunned suffering and sorrow of every kind" (Wilde). Eschew, up to the eighteenth century, was a close synonym of avoid; as, "What cannot be eschew'd must be embraced" (Shak.). It now admits the implication of avoidance only when the idea of keeping clear of for moral or prudential reasons (see FORGO) is stressed. "Observers...thought that capitalists would eschew all connection with what must necessarily be a losing concern" (Macaulay).

Con. *Incur, contract, catch: *bear, endure, suffer, tolerate, abide.

eschew, v. 1 *Shun, elude, avoid, evade, escape.

Ant. Choose. — Con. *Adopt, embrace, espouse: *incur, contract, catch: *take, assume.

2 Forbear, *forgo, abnegate, sacrifice.

Ana. Abstain, *refrain, forbear.

escort, v. Conduct, convoy, chaperon, *accompany, attend.

Ana. Protect, shield, guard, safeguard, *defend: lead, *guide, pilot, steer.

esoteric. Occult, *recondite, abstruse.

Ana. Mystic, *mystical, anagogical, cabalistic: arcane, *mysterious.

especial. *Special, specific, particular, individual, respective, concrete.

Ana. Pre-eminent, surpassing, *supreme: paramount, *dominant, predominant, preponderant, sovereign: *exceptional.

espousal. 1 Usually espousals. Spousal, *marriage, matrimony, nuptials, wedding, wedlock.

2 Betrothal, sponsalia, *engagement, affiance.

espouse. Embrace, *adopt.

Ana. Assume, *take: *support, uphold, advocate, champion, back.

Con. Renounce, *abjure, forswear: forsake, *abandon, desert.

espy. Descry, behold, *see, perceive, discern, notice, remark, note, observe, survey, view, contemplate.

essay, v. Endeavor, assay, strive, struggle, *attempt, try.

Ana. Work, labor, toil, travail (see corresponding nouns at WORK).

essay, n. 1 Endeavor, assay, striving, struggle, attempt, try. See under ATTEMPT, v.

Ana. *Effort, exertion, trouble, pains: toil, labor, *work, travail.

2 Essay, article, paper, theme, composition are here compared as denoting a relatively brief discourse written for others' reading or consideration. Essay is the only one of these terms which suggests a literary character or is included in classifications of literary types. As here considered, it may designate any writing that attempts to cover a subject briefly, competently, and interestingly, whether the attempt is successful or not, and whether it is intended for publication or for submission to a teacher or others for criticism. In such usage, an essay is often distinguished from a short story or an argument, and though use of the word does not debar the introduction of a narrative or argumentative method, it typically has an expository or descriptive aim. Article, in careful use, always carries the implication found in all senses of this word: that of membership in a whole without sacrifice of distinctness and individuality. Therefore article is correctly applicable only to one of the separate, but in itself complete, writings which make up a single issue of a journal or a magazine or a book, such as an encyclopedia or a history written by different persons; as, have you read the article on the prospects of war in today's newspaper?; a writer of articles for magazines; the encyclopedia's article at "carpet" will furnish you information concerning Oriental rugs. Paper is applied to a writing, chiefly an informative writing, that is intended for reading, as at a meeting of a club or a learned society, or for publication, as in a scientific or learned journal, or as a college exercise, especially in a nonliterary course; as, the most interesting paper on the program of the Woman's Club was one on the history of dolls. Theme and composition, as here considered, are applied to writings that are school exercises and submitted for criticism. Although they are seldom distinguished in their use, except that theme is more often employed in colleges and high schools, and composition in the lower schools, there is a real difference in the implications of the words. Theme, strictly, implies the development and elaboration of a definite subject; its tests are chiefly adequacy, or its completeness of treatment within limitations, and readability, or its power to interest those who read it and impress its points on their minds. Composition, on the other hand, implies organization of details, facts, ideas, or the like (sometimes of sentences and paragraphs), so that the result is a unified and clear piece of writing.

essential, adj. 1 *Inherent, intrinsic, constitutional, ingrained.

Ana. *Innate, inborn, inbred, congenital: *inner, inward: elemental (see ELEMENTARY): *characteristic, individual, peculiar, distinctive.

Ant. Accidental. — Con. Adventitious, fortuitous, incidental (see ACCIDENTAL): contingent, *dependent, conditional, adjective.

2 Essential, fundamental, vital, cardinal agree in meaning so important as to be indispensable. That is essential, in the strictest sense of the word, which belongs to the very nature or essence of a thing and which therefore cannot be removed without destroying the thing itself or its distinguishing character, efficacy, or the like; as, the essential doctrines of Christianity; the essential ingredient in a medicine; "both historically and essentially, the French revolutionary spirit means devotion to reason" (Brownell). That is fundamental upon which everything else in a system, institution, or the like, is built up, by which the whole is supported, or from which each addition is derived, and without which, therefore, the whole construction would topple down. "Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "The power of concentrated attention as the fundamental source of the prodigious productiveness of great workers" (C. W. Eliot). That is vital which is as necessary to a thing's existence, continued vigor, efficiency, or the like, as food, drink, health, and the like, are to living things; as, a question the solution of which is vital to human happiness; the vital interests of a people; the capture of the fortified town was vital to the invaders. That is cardinal upon which something turns or hinges or actively depends; thus, the cardinal virtues (prudence, fortitude, temperance, justice, and sometimes, patience and humility) are not, in Christian theology, the highest virtues (which are the Christian virtues faith, hope, and charity), but they are fundamental and without them moral progress would be impossible; so, the cardinal arguments in a brief; the cardinal defects in a character. "Cardinal events are not to be forgotten" (De Quincey). "I repeat this sentence, with emphasis on its cardinal words" (Karl K. Darrow).

Ana. Basic, basal, underlying, *fundamental, substratal: principal, foremost, capital, *chief, main, leading: prime, *primary, primal.

Con. *Subordinate, secondary, dependent: *auxiliary, subsidiary, accessory, contributory, subservient.

3 Indispensable, requisite, necessary, *needful.

Ana. Required, needed, wanted (see LACK, v.).

Ant. Nonessential.

establish, v. 1 *Set, settle, fix, firm.

Ana. *Implant, infix, inculcate, instill: *secure, rivet, anchor, moor.

Ant. Uproot (a tree, a habit, a practice, etc.): abrogate (a right, a privilege, a quality, etc.). — Con. Eradicate, extirpate, wipe out, *exterminate.

2 *Found, institute, organize.

Ana. Start, inaugurate, *begin, commence, initiate.

Ant. Abolish (a society, an institution, etc.).

estate, n. Status, *state, condition, situation, mode, posture.

esteem, v. Respect, admire, regard. See under REGARD, n.

esteem, n. Respect, admiration, *regard.

Ana. *Honor, homage, reverence, deference, obeisance: veneration, reverence, worship, adoration (see corresponding verbs at REVERE).

Ant. Abomination: contempt. — Con. Despite, scorn, disdain (see under DESPISE): abhorrence, loathing, hatred, hate, detestation (see under HATE, v.).

esthete, n. Variant of AESTHETE.

esthetic, n. Variant of AESTHETIC.

estimate, v. 1 Estimate, appraise (or apprise), evaluate, value, rate, assess, assay are here compared only as meaning to judge a thing with respect to its worth. Estimate, as here considered, usually implies a personal judgment (sometimes, but far from always, a reasoned judgment) which, whether considered or casual, is by the nature of the case neither thoroughly objective nor definitive. "In estimating him [Byron] and ranking him we have to strike a balance between the gain which accrues to his poetry . . . from his superiority, and the loss which accrues to it from his defects" (Arnold). "To estimate the Frenchwoman's moral nature with any approach to adequacy it is necessary . . . to avoid viewing her from an Anglo-Saxon standpoint" (Brownell). "Mr. Brownell says that he did not care enough about his friends to discriminate between them, which was the reason he estimated Alcott so highly" (A. Repplier). Appraise implies the intent to fix definitely and in the capacity of an expert the monetary worth of the thing in question, such as the price it ought to bring in the market if sold, or in case of its loss by fire, theft, etc., the monetary compensation due its owner from the insuring company; as, to appraise the decedent's real estate; to appraise a fire loss. In extended use, appraise, in contrast to estimate, implies an intent to give a final, an accurate, or an expert judgment of a thing's worth; estimate, therefore, is often preferred by persons speaking of their own judgments because appraise seems presumptuous or pretentious. "It is not my business to appraise [Ernest Hemingway] . . . A writer should expound other writers or let them alone" (F. M. Ford). "This difficulty of appraising literature absolutely inheres in your study of it from the beginning" (Quiller-Couch). The participial adjective appraising is often used to qualify eye, glance, look, etc.; it then suggests close, critical inspection or scrutiny; as, "addressing him with a watchful appraising stare of his prominent black eyes" (Conrad); "the monumental and encyclopaedic critic is to be regarded with a carefully appraising eye" (T. S. Eliot). Evaluate, like appraise, suggests an intent to arrive at a mathematically correct judgment; it seldom suggests, however, an attempt to determine a thing's monetary worth, but rather to find its equivalent in other and more familiar terms; as, by marks in numbers or in letters a teacher evaluates a student's work; many persons find it impossible to evaluate a work of art except in terms of morals. Value, as here compared (see APPRECIATE, 2), comes very close to appraise in that it also implies an intent to determine or fix the market price, but differs from appraise in that it carries no implication of an authoritative or expert judgment and must depend on the context to make that point if it is essential; thus, the appraiser valued at $10,000 condemned property which had already been valued by the owner at $15,000 and by the city at $8000; experts were called in to value (or appraise) the gems which the alleged smuggler had valued (not appraised) at $1000. In extended use and in reference to things not marketable, value is most often found with a negative or with a restrictive word such as only; as, he values his life not a penny; he values success only as a steppingstone. Rate often adds to estimate the implication of fixing in a scale of values; as, to rate one profession above another in usefulness; to rate one person's qualifications as superior to another's. "We English are capable of rating him far more correctly if we knew him better" (Arnold). Assess and assay, very specific terms literally, are rapidly coming into use in extended senses which make them synonyms of the other words in this group. Assess literally implies valuing for the sake of determining the tax to be levied; in extended use, it implies a determining of the exact value or extent of a thing prior to judging it, to using it as the ground for a decision, or the like. "The task of defining that influence or of exactly assessing its amount is one of extraordinary difficulty" (A. Huxley). "His [Augustus's] mind... had been working back upon the long record of his people, and striving to assess the many elements upon which Rome's future depended" (Buchan). Assay, which literally implies chemical analysis for the sake of determining a substance's (usually, a metal's) quality, quantity, or value, in extended use implies a critical analysis for the sake of measuring, weighing, and appraising. "To assay... changes which the great reformers within and without the Catholic Church accomplished" (J. H. Randall, jr.). Ana. *Judge, adjudge, adjudicate: determine, *discover, ascertain: settle, *decide, determine.

2 Reckon, *calculate, compute.

Ana. Figure, cast, sum (see ADD): *count, enumerate: *conjecture, surmise, guess.

estrangle. Estrange, alienate, disaffect, wean agree in meaning to cause one to break a bond or tie, as of affection or loyalty. Estrange always implies separation or divorcement with consequent indifference or hostility; alienate may or may not suggest actual separation, but it does imply loss of affection or interest, withdrawal of support, or the like, and often connotes a diversion of that affection, interest, etc., to another object. "A little knowledge often estranges men from religion, a deeper knowledge brings them back to it" (Inge). "I don't want [by ritualistic innovations] to alienate those who are just beginning to appreciate the idea of lending greater dignity to the worship of Almighty God" (C. Mackenzie). Estrange is preferable when the indifference or hostility is mutual, alienate when the blame can be fixed on one person or party or on a third person or party; as, Mr. and Mrs. Brown have been estranged for a year, but she alienated him by her extravagance (or, his affections were alienated by another woman). Disaffect is more often used with reference to groups from whom loyalty is expected or demanded; it stresses the effects of alienation without separation, such as unrest, discontent, or rebellion; as, the workers were disaffected by paid agitators. "To disaffect and discontent his majesty's late army" (Clarendon). Wean implies separation from that which has a strong hold on one or on which one depends as a nursing on its mother. Unlike the other words, it often suggests merit rather than fault in the person who breaks the bond; as, to wean a person from a bad habit. "To wean your minds from hankering after false Germanic standards" (Quiller-Couch).

Ant. Never.

everlasting, adj. Everlasting, endless, interminable, unceasing, never-ending are here compared as meaning continuing on and on without end. Unlike infinite, eternal, and similar words (see INFINITE), these terms do not presuppose the absence of a beginning and therefore usually have reference only to continued extent or duration. However, everlasting is often used interchangeably with eternal, differing from it only in placing more stress on the fact of enduring throughout time than on the quality of being independent of time or of all similar human limitations; as, "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms" (Deuteronomy xxxiii. 27); "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal" (Matthew xxv. 46). Therefore, in serious use, everlasting, rather than eternal, is applied to material things or earthly conditions which endure, or seem to endure, forever; as, "See Cromwell damn'd to everlasting fame" (Pope); everlasting flowers; "These mighty gates of everlasting rock" (De Quincey). In lighter use, the term is little more than a hyperbolic term expressing loss of patience or extreme boredom; as, these everlasting headaches; his everlasting stupidity. Endless is applicable not only to things which continue in time but also in extent: the word is used literally (as implying no end) chiefly when a circular form or construction is implied (as, an endless belt): usually it implies no known or apparent or determinable end; as, an endless chain of letters; an endless road through the mountains; "There has been endless discussion whether we have a distinct faculty for the knowledge of God" (Inge); "endless masses of hills on three sides, endless weald or valley on the fourth" (Jefferies). Interminable, like endless, is rarely used in its literal sense of incapable of being brought to an end or termination: rather it applies to something so prolonged or protracted that it is exceedingly wearisome or exhausts one's patience; as, "the weeks were interminable and papa and mamma were clean forgotten" (Kipling); "the [fiddler's] air was now that one... which... best conveys the idea of the interminable—the celebrated 'Devil's Dream'" (Hardy). Unceasing and never-ending, like interminable, suggest undue prolonging or protracting, but they emphasize the extraordinary capacity for going on and on rather than the psychological effect produced (usually on others) by long-continuing activity or continual recurrence; as, unceasing effort; never-ending pursuit of an ideal; a never-ending hate; "Jules de Goncourt... died from the mental exhaustion of his unceasing struggle to attain an objective style adequate to express the subtle texture of the world as he saw it" (H. Ellis).

Ana. *Exclude, eliminate, shut out: reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE): *dismiss, fire, cashier, discharge.

evidence, n. Evidence, testimony, deposition, affidavit are, in their legal senses, closely related but not synonymous terms. The last three designate forms of evidence, or material submitted to a competent legal tribunal as a means of ascertaining where the truth lies in a question of fact. Evidence also implies the intention of the side offering the material to use it as a basis for inference and argument and, therefore, as a medium of proof. Testimony is the evidence offered by persons who are alleged to be in a position to know the facts, such as eyewitnesses or experts. It always implies declaration under oath or affirmation, usually on the stand in open court. Testimony does not necessarily constitute evidence for the side that calls the witness, for that depends upon various things, such as inferences that may be drawn from it favorable to the opposition or the effect that cross-examination has upon it. Deposition, though still occasionally used interchangeably with testimony, is more properly used in a restricted sense to designate a form of testimony given orally in response to questioning by competent officers (usually in advance of court proceedings), taken down in writing, and sworn to or properly affirmed. Affidavit covers any written declaration made upon solemn oath before a recognized magistrate or officer. An affidavit may or may not be used as testimony, but when so used, it is as a rule because a witness cannot take the stand. An affidavit submitted as testimony is properly (but not invariably) distinguished from a deposition. When used specifically and in contrast with deposition, affidavit always implies that the declaration has been obtained by one side to the dispute and that there has been no cross-examination.

evidence, v. Evince, manifest, demonstrate, *show.

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, betray, divulge: display, exhibit, expose, *show: prove, *indicate, betoken, attest, bespeak.

evident. Evident, manifest, patent, distinct, obvious, apparent, palpable, plain, clear come into comparison when they mean readily perceived or apprehended. Evident implies the existence of visible signs, all of which point to the one conclusion; it may be applied to something which is beyond the range of the senses, such as another person's state of mind, a hidden condition, or an imminent event, but which can be inferred from the outward indications; as, her evident delight in the gift; it is evident that he has reached the end of his resources; the evident breakdown of the negotiations for peace. Manifest implies an outward revelation or expression or an open exhibition; it is applied as a rule to something which is displayed so clearly that its recognition seemingly involves no inference. "His joy in the prospect of departure from the Five Towns, from her... was more manifest than she could bear" (Bennett). "Where the work of such a master [as Milton] is at its best, the greatness of his spirit is most greatly manifest" (L. P. Smith). Patent, as here compared, implies an opposition to that which is imperceptible or obscure but existent; it therefore is applied to things which are not invariably or as a class evident or manifest, such as a cause, an effect, a mistake, an imperfection, etc.; as, the seller is required by law to disclose to the buyer latent as well as patent defects in the article sold. "A man is... in jeopardy even when the error is patent on the face of the record, as when he is tried on a defective indictment" (Justice Holmes). "Three very patent reasons for the comparatively slow advance of our children" (Grand-gent). Distinct (as here compared: see also DISTINCT) implies such sharpness of outline or of definition that the thing requires no effort of the eyes to see or discern (as, distinct features; his handwriting is unusually distinct), or of the ears to hear or interpret (as, distinct utterance; distinct enunciation), or of the mind to apprehend or comprehend without confusion (as, the course of his reasoning is not only evident, it is distinct; he gave a distinct account of everything that occurred). Obvious stresses ease in discovery (sometimes, ease in accounting for) and often connotes conspicuousness in that which is discovered, or little need of perspicacity in the discoverer: it is therefore often applied to something not successfully concealed, or something crudely manifest. "Obvious heirs he had none, any more than he had obvious progenitors" (V. Sackville-West). "Nonsense, Percy. It is perfectly obvious. He used to be attracted by Clare, and now he is attracted by Jane" (R. Macaulay). "The avidity with which he surrendered himself to her perfectly obvious methods" (M. Austin). "Acting on the conviction of Mr. Justice Holmes that 'at this time we need education in the obvious more than investigation of the obscure'" (Frankfurter). Apparent, as here compared (see APPARENT, 2), is often so close to evident in meaning that the two words are difficult to distinguish. But evident usually implies inference directly from visible signs or effects, and apparent from evidence plus more or less elaborate reasoning: therefore apparent in precise use is applied to that which is apprehended through an induction, a deduction, or a similar course of reasoning; as, the absurdity of their contention is apparent (better than evident) to one who knows the effects produced by the same causes in the past. "As experience accumulated it gradually became apparent that the oils of any of the trees of the [same] family... were equally efficacious" (V. Heiser). "The true science of metaphysics," he [Joubert] says, "consists... in rendering sensible that which is abstract; apparent that which is hidden" (Arnold). Palpable (see also PERCEPTIBLE) implies perceptibility through another sense than that of sight; it therefore is applied to something that is felt, or heard, or smelled, or realized through some other avenue of knowledge such as a sixth sense. "'Tis probable that thou hast never lived, And palpable that thou hast never loved" (R. Garnett). "We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us" (Keats). Plain and clear are less literary and more colloquial terms than the others here discriminated. They are both applied to something that is immediately apprehended or unmistakably understood, plain implying familiarity or distinctness or a lack of intricacy or complexity, and clear an absence of that which confuses or muddles the mind or which obscures the issues; as, "a plain answer to a direct question" (S. M. Crothers). "I was treated with... deference, and... plainly regarded as a possible purchaser" (L. P. Smith). "Yes, that makes much which was dark quite clear to me" (Galsworthy). "Proof as sharp and clear as anything which is known" (Karl K. Darrow).

evil, adj. *Bad, ill, wicked, naughty.

Ana. *Base, low, vile; iniquitous, nefarious, flagitious, *vicious, villainous, infamous; *pernicious, baneful; *execrable, damnable.

Ant. Exemplary; salutary.

evil, n. Evil, ill, bale come into comparison when they mean whatever is harmful or disastrous to morals or well-being. Evil is the ordinary term capable of use in any context and referable not only to deeds and practices actually indulged in or to conditions actually suffered (as, to lead a life of evil; prostitution is known as the social evil; the evils of war; to correct the evils in a system of government) but also to motivating desires or actuating causes of such deeds, practices, or conditions (as, think no evil; evil [the deed or condition] comes of evil [the cause]; to shun evil [temptations, or places of temptation]), and to their harmful effects or consequences (as, "The evil that men do lives after them"—Shak.; "Evils which our own misdeeds have wrought"—Milton). Evil is also the term in general use for the abstract conception of whatever is the reverse of good, especially of the morally good, or as a designation of anything that is thought of as the reverse of a blessing; as, to be able to distinguish good from evil; the origin of evil; St. Francis of Assisi accounted poverty a blessing rather than an evil. "Evil no nature hath; the loss of good Is that which gives to sin a livelihood" (Herrick). "Evil is not a quality of things as such. It is a quality of our relation to them" (Lippmann). Although ill, like evil, may imply an antithesis to good, it is seldom used to designate the abstraction except in a poetic context and in direct contrast to good. "O, yet we trust that somehow good Will be the final goal of ill" (Tennyson). Also, it is now rare in the sense of moral evil, although it occurred frequently in that sense up to the eighteenth century. "To do aught good never will be our task. But ever to do ill our sole delight. As being the contrary to His high will Whom we resist" (Milton). In present use, as in the past, ill is applied chiefly to whatever is distressing, painful, injurious, and the like, and is more often used in reference to what is actually suffered or endured than to what may be inflicted or imposed on one. "And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?" (Shak.). "They could never in such a Utopian State feel any other ills than those which arise from bodily sickness" (Hume). "There mark what ills the scholar's life assails,— Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail" (Johnson). "Servitude, the worst of ills" (Cowper). Bale, a poetic word even in the late Middle Ages and in the Renaissance, was rare until toward the end of the eighteenth century when it was revived by romantic poets. It usually implies an opposition to bliss and carries less explicit but more doleful connotations than either evil or ill, such as of woe, pain, misery, and desolation; as, "Bring us bale and bitter sorrowings" (Spenser); "tidings of bale she brought" (Bryant).

Ana. *Severe, stern: *rigid, rigorous, strict, stringent; arduous, difficult, *hard.

Ant. Easy; lenient.

exalt. Exalt, magnify, aggrandize are here compared chiefly as used in modern English and as meaning to increase in importance or in prestige. Exalt and magnify also come into comparison in their now archaic sense of to extol or to glorify. "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together" (Psalms xxxiv. 3). In present use, exalt retains its etymological implication of lifting up but, as here narrowly considered, emphasizes a raising in a scale of values without necessarily affecting the quality of the thing raised. Therefore, one exalts something above another or at the expense of another. "Rousseau's readiness to exalt spontaneity even at the expense of rationality" (Babbitt). "There is a valid reason for not preventing games, but...not...for exalting them into a leading position in the school curriculum" (B. Russell). Magnify stresses increase in size; it now commonly suggests an agency (such as an optical device) which affects the vision and causes enlargement of actual or apparent size, or one (such as a vivid imagination) which affects the judgment and leads to exaggeration. "Kind, quiet, near-sighted eyes, which his round spectacles magnified into lambent moons" (Deland). "The public opinion which...magnifies patriotism into a religion" (Brownell). Aggrandize emphasizes increase in greatness or mightiness; it implies efforts, usually selfish efforts, directed to the attainment of power, authority, or worldly eminence. "If we aggrandize ourselves at the expense of the Mahrattas" (Wellington). "Have we a satisfaction in aggrandizing our families...?" (Fielding). Ana. Elevate, raise, *lift: heighten, enhance, *intensify: extol, laud, *praise.

Ant. Abase. — Con. Demean, debase, degrade, humble, humiliate (see ABASE): disparage, depreciate, detract from, derogate from, *decry, belittle, minimize.

examination. Inspection, scrutiny, scanning, audit. See under SCRUTINIZE, v.

Ana. Questioning, interrogation, inquiry, catechism, quizzing or quiz (see corresponding verbs at ASK).

examine. 1 Inspect, *scrutinize, scan, audit.

Con. Anomaly, *paradox.

2 *Model, exemplar, pattern, paradigm, ideal, beau ideal, standard, mirror.

Ana. Archetype, *prototype: *paragon, sublimation, apotheosis.

Con. Precept, rule, *law.

exasperate. Provoke, nettle, *irritate, aggravate, roil, peeve.

Ana. Vex, *annoy, irk, bother: *anger, incense, enrage, madden, infuriate.

Ant. Mollify. — Con. *Pacify, placate, appease, propitiate, conciliate.

excavate. *Dig, delve, exhume, disinter, spade, grub.

exceed. Exceed, surpass, transcend, excel, outdo, outstrip agree in meaning to go or to be beyond a stated or implied limit, measure, or degree. Exceed may imply an overpassing of a limit set by one's right, power, authority, jurisdiction, or the like (as, this task exceeds his ability; he has exceeded his authority in allowing such use of our land), or by prescription, as in time, space, or the like (as, they were penalized if they exceeded the allotted time by even one day). The term may also imply superiority in size, amount, degree, number, or the like, according to a given standard or measure; as, "My wrath shall far exceed the love I ever bore" (Shak.); "Though the pleasures of London exceed In number the days of the year" (Cowper). Surpass is often used in place of exceed, especially when superiority to a given standard or measure is implied; as, the reality surpassed (or exceeded) our expectations. When the intent is to imply superiority in quality, as in virtue, in merit, or in skill, rather than in quantity or extent, surpass is to be preferred to exceed; as, the poem is not surpassed in English literature for sheer beauty of sound; he surpasses all others in keenness of mind. Transcend carries so strong an implication of rising across or above a limit or measure that, although it is sometimes used in place of exceed (as, "its limits [the powers of the government] are not to be transcended" — Ch. Just. Marshall) and often in place of surpass (as, "this sorrow transcending all sorrows" — Hudson), it is the precise term to use when a higher than human or earthly limit, standard, or measure is implied; as, "A point of view transcending the purely human outlook on the universe" (Binyon); "In the rather sloppy Socialism which pervades this document there is nothing which seems to transcend the limits of unaided human intelligence" (Inge). Excel definitely implies pre-eminence in accomplishment, achievement, attainment, or the like; if no standard of comparison is indicated, that is, when the verb is used intransitively, it suggests superiority to all (as, he excelled in the painting of miniatures); if one is indicated, it differs little from surpass or transcend (as, "Love divine, all love excelling" — C. Wesley; he excelled his friends in archery). "During their seminary years he had easily surpassed his friend in scholarship, but he always realized that Joseph excelled him in the fervor of his faith" (Cather). Outdo is a more colloquial term than excel or surpass, but it is often preferred when there is the intent to connote the breaking of a previously established record; as, "He hath in this action outdone his former deeds doubly" (Shak.); "The waves beside them danced; but they [the daffodils] Outdid the sparkling waves in glee" (Wordsworth). Outstrip is often preferred to excel or surpass when one wishes to suggest a race, a competition, or a similar strenuous effort to get ahead; as, he would not allow anyone to outstrip him in zeal; to outstrip another candidate in the power to win votes.

excel. Surpass, transcend, *exceed, outdo, outstrip.

excellence. Excellence, merit, virtue, perfection are here compared as meaning a quality or feature of a person or thing that gives him or it especial worth or value. Excellence applies to any quality or feature in which the person or thing excels or surpasses all others: since the term carries no implication that he or it is without fault, defect, or blemish, it is often qualified by a word such as particular, specific, distinctive, or the like; as, the particular excellence of this cake is its lightness and of that cake its richness; "The great excellence of the eastern tableland was...in pasture and in forest" (Dean Stanley); "The artisan, for example, ranks...lower than the professional man; but no one maintains that he is...incapable by nature...of the characteristic excellence of man" (G. L. Dickinson). Merit (as here considered: see also DUE) may be used interchangeably with excellence, but it typically carries no suggestion of a surpassing quality: rather, it applies to a quality or feature that has evident worth or value or is highly commendable. It is used chiefly in critical estimates in which good points (merits) are displayed against bad points (defects or faults); as, "Mr. Wright's version of the Iliad, repeating in the main the merits and defects of Cowper's version" (Arnold); "Seneca had as much to do with its [the early Elizabethan drama's] merits and its progress as with its faults and its delays" (T. S. Eliot); "The faculty of discerning and using conspicuous merit in other people distinguishes the most successful administrators, rulers, and men of business" (C. W. Eliot). Virtue, because of the long association of the term with moral goodness (for this sense see GOODNESS) is, in current use, chiefly applied to a moral excellence or a conspicuous merit of character; as, "[They] have no vices...one is inclined to ask whether, when the right path is so easy to them, they really have any virtues" (H. Ellis); "reverence for age and authority, even for law, has disappeared; and in the train of these have gone the virtues they engendered and nurtured" (G. L. Dickinson). But the term still often applies to the quality, feature, or the like, that is the source of a person's or thing's peculiar or distinctive strength, power, or efficacy; as, the special virtue of a newly discovered remedy for pneumonia; "that unsparing impartiality which is his [Hallam's] most distinguishing virtue" (Macaulay); "An aristocracy, if it is to survive, needs certain virtues; these were to be imparted at school" (B. Russell). Perfection, in the sense here considered as well as in its abstract sense of faultlessness ("Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null, Dead perfection, no more"—Tennyson) suggests an attainment of the ideal. It, therefore, is usually found in less restrained writing or speech than the other terms when it applies to an excellence in the highest degree; as, "But eyes, and ears, and ev'ry thought, Were with his sweet perfections caught" (Spenser); "What tongue can her perfections tell?" (Sidney).

Ana. Value, *worth: property, *quality, character.

Ant. Fault. — Con. *Blemish, defect, flaw: failing, frailty, foible, vice (see FAULT).

exceptionable. *Exceptional.

Ana. *Offensive, repugnant, loathsome, repulsive, revolting: repellent, distasteful, obnoxious, invidious, *repugnant.

Ant. Unexceptionable: exemplary. — Con. Pleasing, agreeable, gratifying, *pleasant, grateful, welcome.

exceptional. Exceptional, exceptionable, although not synonyms, are liable to confusion. That is exceptional which is itself an exception, and so is out of the ordinary, being either extraordinary or unusual; as, this is an exceptional opportunity; "the bath was habitual in the twelfth century and exceptional at the Renaissance" (H. Adams). That is exceptionable (cf. the commoner unexceptionable) to which exception may be taken (that is, to which an objection may be made), and which is therefore displeasing or offensive to others; as, exceptionable conduct; there was nothing exceptionable in his comment.

Ana. Outstanding, remarkable, *noticeable, conspicuous, prominent, salient, signal: rare, *infrequent, uncommon, scarce: singular, unique, *strange: anomalous, *irregular.

Ant. Common (sense 3): average. — Con. Ordinary, familiar, popular, vulgar (see COMMON).

excerpt, n. *Extract, pericope.

excess, n. Excess, superfluity, surplus, surplusage, overplus agree in denoting that which goes beyond a limit or bound. Excess applies to that which exceeds any limit, measure, bound, or the like (as, "In measure rein thy joy; scant this excess"—Shak.; "the proper point between sufficiency and excess"—H. James; "I think poetry should surprise by a fine excess"—Keats); often it specifically implies intemperance, immoderation, or the like (as, "early excesses the frame will recover from"—Meredith; "restrain the excesses of the possessive instinct"—H. Ellis). Superfluity applies to an excess of money, clothes, possessions, or the like, that is above or beyond what is needed or desired; as, "the inventory of thy shirts, as, one for superfluity, and another for use!" (Shak.); "Her superfluity the poor supplies" (Cowper); "I succumb easily to anyone who asks me to buy superfluities and luxuries" (A. Huxley). Surplus applies to the amount or quantity of something that remains when all that has been needed has been used, spent, sold, or the like, or when all debts have been paid; as, his salary was so small that there was no surplus for investment; the problem is how to dispose of the large surplus in this year's cotton crop; the company divided its surplus (that is, the amount of income in excess of fixed charges and dividends) among its shareholders and employees. Surplusage may be used in place of surplus, but good writers and speakers employ the term when they wish to imply wasteful or useless excess; as, "the subsequent part of the section is mere surplusage, is entirely without meaning, if such is to be the construction" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "Say what you have to say...with no surplusage" (Paler). Overplus is often used in place of surplus, but it less often implies a remainder than an addition to what is needed; as, "the overplus of a great fortune" (Addison); there was no overplus in the proceeds this year.

Ana. Lavishness, prodigality, profuseness or profusion, luxuriance, exuberance (see corresponding adjectives at PROFUSE): inordinateness, immoderation, extravagance (see corresponding adjectives at EXCESSIVE).

Ant. Deficiency: dearth, paucity. — Con. Meagerness, scantiness, scantness, exiguousness (see corresponding adjectives at MEAGER).

excessive. Excessive, immoderate, inordinate, extravagant, exorbitant, extreme come into comparison as meaning characterized by going beyond or above its proper, just, or right limit. Excessive implies an amount, quantity, extent, or the like, too great to be just, reasonable, endurable, or the like; as, to attach an excessive importance to attendance at every lecture of a course; the excessive heat of a midsummer afternoon; "Excessive lenity and indulgence are ultimately excessive rigor" (Knox). Immoderate is often used interchangeably with excessive (as, immoderate heat), but in precise use, it distinctively implies lack of restraint, especially in the feelings or their expression; as, immoderate zeal; immoderate laughter. Inordinate (etymologically, disordered) implies an exceeding of the bounds or limits prescribed by authority or dictated by good judgment; as, "The great difficulty of living content is the cherishing of inordinate and unreasonable expectations" (T. F. Brown); "I am always staggered...by the inordinate snobbery of the English press" (A. Huxley); "the parent...will be inordinately pleased by the child's cleverness and exasperated by his stupidity" (B. Russell). Extravagant (etymologically, wandering outside the bounds) often adds to excessive or immoderate the implications of wildness, lawlessness, or indifference to restraints such as of truth, decency, prudence, or the like; as, extravagant praise; "[he] went off in a second extravagant roar of laughter" (Hudson). "Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that...a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises? This is too extravagant to be maintained" (Ch. Just. Marshall). The term often specifically implies prodigality in expenditure; as, "She was rapacious of money, extravagant to excess" (Fielding). Exorbitant (etymologically, going out of the track, or usual course) implies excessiveness marked by a departure from that which is the customary or established amount or degree; it often but not always connotes extortion or excessive demands on the part of the agent, or the infliction of hardships on the person af-fectured; as, "The legislature...imposed an exorbitant security for their appearance" (Gibbon); "a resolution to contract none of the exorbitant desires by which others are enslaved" (Spectator); "The men who worked in the brick-kilns lived in this settlement, and paid an exorbitant rent to the Judge" (Deland). Extreme, as here compared (see also LAST, adj.), implies an excessiveness or extravagance that seems to reach the end of that which is possible; it is often hyperbolic in actual use; as, the result gave him extreme satisfaction; "the extreme oddness of existence is what reconciles me to it" (L. P. Smith); "The most extreme...statement of such an attitude would be: nothing is poetry which can be formulated in prose" (Day Lewis).

Ana. *Superfluous, surplus, supernumerary, extra, spare: *intense, vehement: redundant (see WORDY).

Ant. Deficient. — Con. *Meager, scanty, scant, skimpy, exiguous, sparse.

exchange, v. Exchange, interchange, bandy, swap agree in meaning to give a thing to another in return for another thing from him. Exchange may imply a disposing of one thing for another, by or as by the methods of bartering or trading (see SELL); as, to exchange horses; the hostile forces exchanged prisoners of war; to exchange one's farm products for manufactured goods. Sometimes the term specifically implies a substitution, such as a change of a first purchase for something else (as, wedding presents are often exchanged by the bride at the store where the givers purchased them; to exchange a palace for a cell), or an alternation of things by two, sometimes more, persons (as, to exchange letters; to exchange a few words with each other). Interchange is rarely used in place of exchange except when alternation, as in reciprocal giving and receiving, is implied, often with the connotation of a continuous succession; as, the townspeople and the summer residents interchanged courtesies with each other; "There were repeated cheerings and salutations interchanged between the shore and the ship" (Irving). Bandy, from its earliest sense in English, implies a tossing or beating to and fro as, or in the same manner as, a tennis ball. Hence, the term is often used in place of interchange when vigorous, rapid, and more or less prolonged action is implied; as, "to bandy hasty words" (Shak); to bandy compliments. Often, however, bandy implies heated or active discussion or a passing of information from one to another; as, "Your name is... frequently bandied at table among us" (Irving); "The stories they invent... and bandy from mouth to mouth!" (Dickens). Swap (a colloquial term used in both Great Britain and America) commonly implies the exchange of one thing for another of the same species, and is therefore usually followed by a plural object; as, to swap horses; to swap knives; to swap stories.

Ana. Barter, trade (see SELL).

excise, n. Impost, *tax, levy, assessment, rate, customs, duty, toll, tariff, tribute, tithe, teind, cess.

excite. *Provoke, stimulate, pique, quicken, galvanize.

Ana. *Stir, rouse, arouse, rally, waken, awaken: agitate, disturb, perturb, *discompose, disquiet: animate, inspire, fire (see INFORM).

Ant. Soothe, quiet (persons): allay (fears, anxiety, etc.).

exclude. Exclude, debar, blackball, eliminate, rule out, shut out, disbar, suspend agree in meaning to prevent someone or something from forming part of something else as a member, a constituent, a factor, or the like. Exclude (etymologically, to shut out) implies in strict use a keeping out of what is already outside; it therefore suggests a prevention of entrance or admission; as, to exclude light from a room by closing the shutters; to exclude a subject from consideration; to exclude a class from certain privileges. Debar implies the existence of a barrier (literal or figurative) which is effectual in excluding someone or something on the outside from entering into a group, body, or system, from enjoying certain privileges, powers, or prerogatives, or from doing what those not so restrained do naturally or easily; as, a high wall debarred boys from entering; poor health debars him from society. "The qualifications demanded... would be likely to debar 99 per cent of the secondary school instructors in America" (Grandgent). "The Japanese designer was debarred by instinct and tradition from using the resources of texture and of light and shade" (Binyon). Blackball strictly implies exclusion from a club or society by vote of its members (originally by putting a black ball into a ballot box). "He was very nearly black-balled at a West End club of which his birth and social position fully entitled him to become a member" (Wilde). The term has some extended use, but it usually implies a deliberate (though not necessarily a voted) decision to exclude a person from one's coterie, clique, set, or the like. Eliminate differs from the preceding words in implying a getting rid of, or a removal of what is already in, especially as a constituent element or part; as, to eliminate a quantity from an equation, a subject from a curriculum; to eliminate a poison from the system. "It is always wise to eliminate the personal equation from our judgments of literature" (J. R. Lowell). "In most poets there is an intermittent conflict between the poetic self and the rest of the man; and it is by reconciling the two, not by eliminating the one, that they can reach their full stature" (Day Lewis). Rule out may imply either exclusion or elimination, but it usually suggests a formal or authoritative decision; as, to rule a horse out of a race; to rule out certain candidates for a position. Shut out may imply exclusion of something by preventing its entrance or admission (as, close the windows to shut out the rain) or, in sports use, to prevent from scoring (as, the home team was shut out in the second game). Disbar (often confused with debar) implies the elimination by a legal process of a lawyer (attorney, counselor, or barrister) from the group of those already admitted to practice, thereby depriving him for cause of his status and privileges. Suspend implies the elimination of a person who is a member of a staff, a body, or other organization, or a student at a school or college, often for a definite, sometimes for an indefinite, period of time and, usually, because of some offense or serious infraction of the rules: the term seldom, if ever, implies that the case is closed or that readmission is impossible; as, to suspend ten members of a club for nonpayment of dues. "There was but one course: to suspend the man from the exercise of all priestly functions" (Cather).

Ana. *Hinder, bar, block: preclude, obviate, ward off, *prevent: *banish, exile, ostracize, deport.

Ant. Admit (persons): include (things). — Con. *Comprehend, embrace, involve (see INCLUDE).

exclusive. *Select, elect, picked.

Ana. Excluding, eliminating, debarring, shutting out, ruling out (see EXCLUDE): *narrow, strait: aristocratic, patrician (see corresponding nouns at GENTLEMAN): *gentle, genteel.

Ant. Inclusive. — Con. Catholic, cosmopolitan, *universal: *common, ordinary, familiar, popular, vulgar.

ex cogitate. Revolve, weigh, *consider, study, contemplate.

Ana. *Ponder, meditate, ruminate, muse: cogitate, reflect, deliberate, speculate, *think.

excommunication. Excommunication, anathema, interdict are here compared only in their technical ecclesiastical meanings, especially in historic Christian use, and as denoting a punishment for one's offense or offenses by suspension of the privileges of membership in the Church. Excommunication always implies ejection from the Church as a communicant (but not always as a worshiper) and denial of the sacraments for as long as one is unrepentant and refuses to make atonement. It does not, except when qualified by major excommunication, imply public censure or ceremonial expulsion. Anathema, as a term implying ecclesiastical censure or an ecclesiastical ban, antedates Christianity. "Neither shalt thou bring any thing of the idol into thy house, lest thou become an anathema [Authorized Version, 'a cursed thing'] like it" (Doan's Version, Deuteronomy vii. 26). These connotations of a ban and the curse of God were carried over into Christian use and the word, when it came to mean a kind of excommunication, was eventually applied to the severest form of major excommunication, one involving a solemn promulgation of the expulsion by the pope, a denunciation of the offender as a thing accursed, and his condemnation to Hell unless repentant. Interdict does not imply excommunication or loss of church membership; it is a form of censure or of punishment whereby a group, as a state, a community, or a diocese, or, sometimes, a person, suffers the deprivation of divine worship, of the Sacraments, or of the right to Christian burial, etc., through papal or episcopal prohibition of them for a stated or indefinite term.

Ana. Ejection, expelling or expulsion, ousting, dismissal (see corresponding verbs at EJECT).

excoriate. *Abrade, chafe, fret, gall.

Ana. *Injure, hurt, damage, mar, impair: flay, *skin, peel: *abuse, maltreat, outrage: tongue-lash, berate, upbraid, revile, *scold: *execrate, objurgate, curse, damn.

excruciating. Excruciating, agonizing, racking agree in meaning intensely and, usually, unbearably painful. All are commonly used as strong intensives and applied to pain, suffering, torture, and the like. When used to qualify other things, they mean causing intense pain or suffering. Excruciating carries strong suggestions of acute physical torture or of exquisitely painful sensation; as, the excruciating pains of cancer; excruciating engines of torture; excruciating noises. Agonizing stresses anguish of mind even when it strongly implies physical suffering. "An agonizing spasm of pain—a memento mori—shot through me and passed away" (W. J. Locke). "Lives there a man so firm, who, while his heart feels all the bitter horror of his crime, Can reason down its agonizing throbs" (Burns). Racking suggests sensations of pulling and straining and tearing comparable to those suffered by a person on the rack; as, racking pains in the chest; a racking headache; racking doubts.

Ana. Torturing, tormenting, racking, grilling (see AFFLICT): *intense, vehement.

exculpate. Exculpate, absolve, exonerate, acquit, vindicate agree in meaning to free from a charge or burden. Exculpate implies simply a clearing from blame, especially in a matter of small importance; as, to exculpate oneself from a charge of inconsistency. Absolve implies a release, often a formal release, either from obligations or responsibilities that bind the conscience, or from the consequences or penalties of their violation; as, to absolve one from blame or responsibility; to absolve a person from a promise. Exonerate implies relief, often in a moral sense, from what is regarded as a load or burden. "It [exemption of a judge's salary from taxation] seems to me no reason for exonerating him from the ordinary duties of a citizen" (Justice Holmes). In general, exonerate more frequently suggests such relief from a definite charge that not even the suspicion of wrongdoing remains; as, to exonerate a person charged with theft. Acquit implies a decision in one's favor with reference to a specific charge; as, to acquit of all participation in a crime. "You do acquit me then of anything wrong? You are convinced that I never meant to deceive your brother...?" (Jane Austen). Vindicate, unlike the preceding words, may have reference to things as well as to persons that have been subjected to attack, suspicion, censure, ridicule, or the like. As here compared (see also MAINTAIN), it implies a clearing through proof of the injustice or the unfairness of such criticism or blame, and the exoneration of the person or the justification of the thing. "Time has vindicated the prudence of the Griffiths, the Daffies, and the Pears [early large-scale advertisers]" (C. E. Montague). "You may find yourself... summoned to serve on a jury and make decisions involving the disgrace or vindication, the imprisonment or freedom, the life or death of your fellowcreatures" (Shaw).

Ana. Justify, *explain, rationalize: *excuse, condone, pardon, forgive, remit.

Ant. Inculpate: accuse. — Con. Blame, denounce, reprehend, reprobate, censure (see CRITICIZE): charge, arraign, indict, criminate, incriminate, impeach (see ACCUSE).

excursion. Trip, jaunt, tour, cruise, *journey, voyage, expedition, pilgrimage.

Ana. Ride, drive (see under RIDE, v.).

excursus. Divagation, *digression, episode.

excuse, v. Excuse, condone, pardon, forgive, remit agree in meaning not to exact punishment or redress for (an offense) or from (an offender). In polite use, excuse, pardon, and forgive usually suggest a hope that one is not annoyed. Both excuse and condone imply an overlooking or passing over, either without censure or without adequate punishment; in careful use, one excuses faults, omissions, or neglects, especially in social or conventional obligations, or the person committing them (as, please excuse my interruption; "In her heart she did not at all justify or excuse Cyril"—Bennett), and one condones grave offenses such as a breach of the moral code or a violation of law (as, "We condone everything in this country—private treason, falsehood, flattery, cruelty at home, roguery, and double-dealing"—Thackeray; "Slavery struck no deep roots in New England soil, perhaps because the nobler half of the New England conscience never condoned it"—A. Repplier). Pardon (opposed to punish) and forgive (opposed to condemn) are often employed interchangeably, but in strict usage they are differentiated. One pardons when one frees from the penalty due for an offense or refrains from exacting punishment for it (as, to pardon ten prisoners at Christmas; will you pardon my intrusion?; "it became necessary... to fly for our lives.... We could not look to be pardoned"—Hudson); one forgives when one gives up not only any claim to requital or retribution, but also any resentment or desire for revenge (as, "To err is human, to forgive, divine"—Pope; "The wrath... is past... and I, Lo, I forgive thee, as Eternal God Forgives!"—Tennyson). Remit is a synonym only in the idiomatic phrase to remit sins, in which it means to free from the punishment due for one's sins.

Ana. Justify, *explain, account for, rationalize: acquit, vindicate, *exculpate, absolve, exonerate, vindicate: *palliate, extenuate, gloze, gloss, whitewash.

Ant. Punish. — Con. Censure, reprobate, reprehend, blame, *criticize: chastise, castigate, discipline, chasten, correct (see PUNISH).

excuse, n. Plea, pretext, *apology, apologia, alibi.

Ana. Explanation, justification, rationalization (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN): palliation, extenuation, whitewashing, glossing (see corresponding verbs at FALLIATE).

execrable. Execrable, damnable, accursed, cursed agree in meaning so odious as to excite profanity. In actual use they vary little, if any, in force and only slightly in implications. Good usage, to a certain extent, however, limits their applications. Execrable is applied chiefly to that which is bad beyond description; as, execrable taste; execrable poetry or music; an execrable performance of Hamlet. Damnable and accursed are applied most often either to persons, their acts and their vices, or to things that excite righteous indignation and strong condemnation. "Unless that man in there is to be given a chance of expiation in another life, then capital punishment is a damnable horror" (C. Mackenzie). "Accursed tower! accursed fatal hand That hath contrived this woful tragedy!" (Shak.). Cursed varies in dignity, sometimes being applied to that which merely excites profanity and sometimes to that which in itself is worthy of imprecation. "Merciful powers, Restrain in me the curse thoughts that nature Gives way to in repose!" (Shak.). Ana. *Outrageous, atrocious, heinous, monstrous: *base, low, vile: loathsome, revolting, repulsive, *offensive, repugnant.

execrate. Execrate, curse, damn, ban, anathematize, objugate agree in meaning to denounce violently and indignantly. Execrate implies intense loathing or hatred and, usually, a fury of passion; as, "they execrate... their lot" (Cowper); to execrate the men who were responsible for their misery; it often suggests acts as well as words which give an outlet to these emotions. "For a little while he [Antony] was execrated in Rome; his statues were overthrown, and his name was blotted from the records" (Buchan). Curse in earlier use often implied an invocation to the Supreme Being to visit deserved punishment upon a person or to afflict him for his sins. "He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it" (Proverbs xi. 26). In more modern use, curse and damn (see also SENTENCE) do not markedly differ in meaning. Both usually imply angry denunciation by blasphemous oaths or profane imprecations. "I heard my brother damn the coachman, and curse the maids" (Defoe). Curse and ban were not clearly distinguished in earlier use, for both implied an invocation that was the opposite of a blessing or benediction. In modern literary use ban, more often than curse, is used as the opposite of bless, and often is associated with it. It implies any attitude from strong (usually vocal) disapproval to violent execration. "Ever she blessed the old and banned the new" (W. Morris). Anathematize implies solemn denunciation, as of an evil, a heresy (not necessarily religious), an injustice, or the like. It is used chiefly in reference to the impassioned denunciations of preachers, moralists, and the like; as, to anathematize the violation of a treaty; to anathematize graft in politics. Objurgate differs from execrate chiefly in implying less fury or passion; it often suggests the denunciations of an extremist or of a savage critic; as, cranks are people who objurgate everything that displeases them personally. "His [Theodore Roosevelt's] objurgations...surely accomplished nothing; the hyphenate [hyphenated American] of 1915 is still a hyphenate in his heart" (Mencken).

Ana. Denounce, condemn, reprobate, censure, reprehend (see CRITICIZE): revile, berate, rate (see SCOLD).

Con. *Commend, applaud, compliment, recommend: *praise, laud, extol, acclaim, eulogize.

execute. 1 Effect, fulfill, discharge, *perform, accomplish, achieve.

Ana. Complete, finish, conclude, *close: *realize, actualize, externalize, objectify.

2 Execute, administer, and their derivative adjectives, esp. executive, administrative, and nouns, esp. executive, executor (feminine executrix, rarely executress), administrator (feminine administratrix or administratress) are often confused not only because of overlapping meanings but also because they are employed in reference to similar, and often identical, spheres of activity, acts, or powers. They are, however, only occasionally interchangeable, partly because of distinct technical meanings and partly because idiom determines their choice. In discriminating use, both verbs (and usually their derivatives) always imply vested authority or deputed powers, and therefore suggest a source of that authority or power or a prior determination of what is to be done. They come closest in meaning when used of one who governs in obedience to the will of the people, and whose function it is to see that the laws made by the people's representatives are enforced. Execute, in such a context, stresses the carrying out or into effect of that which has been determined by a legislature; administer always implies management and therefore stresses rather the actual exercise of the powers given by law and the performance of executive duties; thus, the president is sworn to execute the laws of his country, but he often finds difficulty in administering them to the satisfaction of all. Idiom permits us to say that the president executes (not administers) the will of the people, and that he administers (not executes) his office competently, or the affairs of the country to the admiration of all. "I invite consideration of the...demands citizens make upon government, [and] the instruments by which these demands are executed" (Frankfurter). "The Senate [of ancient Rome], with the twin tasks of administering an empire and curbing the new democracy, failed in both" (Buchan). Executive and administrator also reveal similar differences in implications but they are commonly distinct in application. Executive is applied to a person who is the responsible head of a government, or an institution, or a business, or of one of its departments; administrator is applied to one charged with the management of something; as, the Secretary of the Treasury is the administrator of the finances of the United States. Sometimes, administrator is applied to one in temporary control; thus, an ad interim pastor or rector is called an administrator of the parish in some churches; in some British colonies, the colonial secretary serves as acting governor under the title of Administrator.

Execute and administer carry the same fundamental implications when applied to settling the affairs of an estate; thus, one executes (not administers) the provisions of a will; one administers (not executes) the estate of a deceased person (sometimes of an incompetent or of a bankrupt). This difference is commonly manifest in executor and administrator. Executor is applied only to one appointed by the maker of a will to see that the provisions of his will are carried out; administrator is applicable to an executor, but is strictly used as a designation of a person legally appointed to settle the estate of one who has died without leaving a will.

Ana. *Enforce, implement: *govern, rule.

3 *Kill, dispatch, slay, murder, assassinate.

executive, adj. Administrative (see under EXECUTE, 2). executive, n. Executor, administrator. See under EXECUTE, 2.

executor (fem. executrix, rarely executress). Administrator (see under EXECUTE, 2).

exemplar. Pattern, ideal, beau ideal, example, *model, mirror, standard, paradigm.

Ana. Archetype, *prototype: apotheosis, *paragon, phoenix, nonpareil, nonesuch, sublimation: type, *symbol.

exemplify. Exemplify, illustrate come into comparison when they mean to use, as a writer or speaker, concrete instances or cases to make clear that which is difficult, abstract, general, or remote from experience, or to serve, as an instance, case, or the like, in achieving that end. Exemplify implies the use of examples for clarification of a general or abstract statement, or as aid in revealing the truth of a proposition or assertion; as, a good preacher usually exemplifies each point that he seeks to impress upon his congregation; "the notes of Coleridge [on Massinger] exemplify Coleridge's fragmentary and fine perceptions" (T. S. Eliot); "Each, in his way, exemplifies the peril that besets a highly gifted poetic nature" (Lowes). Illustrate implies the use not only of concrete examples but also sometimes of pictures or sketches, and the intent not only to clarify but to make vivid or real that which is being explained or to drive home most effectively a point that is being made; as, the textbook is adequately illustrated with photographs and diagrams; "I will illustrate the word a little further" (J. R. Lowell); "The assertion...leans for support...upon the truth conveyed in those words of Cicero, and wonderfully illustrates and confirms them" (Arnold). "The world was no more made to serve us by illustrating our philosophy than we were made to serve the world by licking its boots" (Santayana).

exemption. Exemption, immunity come into comparison as meaning the act or fact of freeing, or the state of being free or freed, from something burdensome, disagreeable, painful, or the like. Exemption is more restricted in its meaning for it applies usually to a release from some legal (or similarly imposed) obligation or burden to which all others in the same circumstances (not similarly freed) are liable; as, married men with families may apply for exemption from military service; "[They] have no vices, but they buy that exemption at a price, for one is inclined to ask whether...they really have any virtues" (H. Ellis). Immunity covers all cases for which an exemption may be given or obtained, but the term carries so strong an implication of privilege and of freedom from certain common restrictions that it is often used in reference to persons or classes of persons especially favored by the law or by nature; as, "entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the Constitution and laws of the State attached to that character" (Ch. Just. Taney); "the question of the immunities of the clergy had been publicly raised" (Froude); "the man of creative imagination pays a ghastly price for all his superiorities and immunities" (Mencken). In current specific use, immunity implies a physical power to resist disease (commonly, a particular disease), or particularly to resist infecting microorganisms or their products; as, to build up immunity (or an immunity) to diphtheria; "he may...after long years of exposure to plague...even develop a certain immunity" (V. Heiser).

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, discover, divulge: *show, manifest, evidence, evince, demonstrate.

Con. *Suppress, repress: *hide, conceal, secrete, bury.

exhibit, n. *Exhibition, show, exposition, fair.

exhibition. Exhibition, show, exhibit, exposition, fair are here compared only in a very specific sense as meaning a public display of objects of interest. Exhibition and (less often in formal use, except in art circles; but commonly as a colloquialism) show are applicable to any such display of objects of art, manufacture, commerce, or the like, or to any display by pupils, members, associates, or the like, of their prowess or skill in gymnastics, oratory, music, or the like; as, the annual exhibition of the Academy of Fine Arts; an exhibition of Navaho blankets; the one-man show of paintings at the D... Galleries; a gymnastic exhibition; a cattle show. In law, exhibition is applied to any such public display from which the exhibitor or exhibitors hope to make a profit and for which they must obtain a license. An exhibit is an object or collection displayed in an exhibition; as, the English exhibit at the World's Fair. In law, exhibit refers only to a document or a material object produced in court or before an examiner and properly identified for use as evidence. Exposition is now the technical term for a very large exhibition, especially one involving the participation of many states, countries, or the like; as, the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893; the annual Canadian National Exposition at Toronto; the annual Eastern States Exposition at West Springfield, Massachusetts. Fair applies usually (though far from invariably; as, for example, a world's fair) to a small exhibition of wares, produce, stock, and the like, sometimes for the promotion of sales, sometimes in competition for prizes for excellence; as, street fairs in Paris; a county fair.

exhume. Disinter, excavate, *dig, delve, grub, spade.

Ana. Unearth, *discover.

Ant. Bury. — Con. Secrete, cache, conceal, *hide.

exigency. 1 Pass, emergency, pinch, strait, crisis, contingency, *juncture.

Ana. *Difficulty, vicissitude, rigor, hardship: *predicament, plight, fix, quandary, dilemma, jam, pickle, scrape.

2 Necessity, *need.

Ana. Demanding or demand, requirement, exacting or exaction, claiming or claim (see corresponding verbs at DEMAND): compulsion, coercion, constraint, duress (see FORCE, n.).

exiguous. *Meager, scant, scanty, skimpy, scrumpy, spare, sparse.

Ana. Diminutive, tiny, *small, little: tenuous, slender, slight, *thin: limited, restricted, confined (see LIMIT, v.).

Ant. Capacious, ample.

exile, v. *Banish, expatriate, ostracize, deport, transport, extradite.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. Proscribe, attain, condemn (see SENTENCE): expel, *eject, oust.

exist. *Be, live, subsist.

existence. Existence, being, actuality are closely allied in meaning but not always interchangeable. Existence is the inclusive term which designates the state or condition of anything regarded as occurring in space or time, as distinct and apart from all other things, and as having a nature or substance of its own; as, customs that have recently come into existence; a mathematical point has no real existence; wars that threaten the existence of civilization; his misfortunes have existence only in his imagination. The opposite of existence is its complete negation nonexistence. Being, when it denotes existence, adds varying implications: sometimes it implies life, consciousness, or personality; as, "In him we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts xvii. 28); sometimes it implies fullness or completeness of existence and absence of imperfection; as, "Everything else is in a state of becoming, God is in a state of Being" (F. W. Robertson); sometimes it suggests the complex of qualities or characteristics that constitute the nature of a person or a personified thing. "All the forces of his being were massed behind one imperious resolve" (Buchan). Actuality, as a synonym of existence, stresses realization or attainment; in discriminating use, it usually implies opposition to possibility or potentiality; as, ambition is the spur that makes dreams come into actuality. "Risks which have been seized upon as actualities when they have been merely potentialities" (T. S. Eliot).

Ana. *State, condition, situation, status, estate: subsisting or subsistence, living or life (see corresponding verbs at BE).

Antf. Nonexistence.

exonerate. Acquit, vindicate, absolve, *exculpate.

Ana. *Relieve, lighten, alleviate: *excuse, remit.

Antf. Charge (a person with a task, a duty, a crime, etc.).

exorbitant. Inordinate, extravagant, *excessive, immoderate, extreme.

Ana. *Onerous, burdensome, oppressive, exacting: greedy, grasping, *covetous: extorting or extortionate (see corresponding verb at EDUCE).

Antf. Just (price, charge, etc.). — Con. *Fair, equitable: reasonable, *rational.

exordium. Preamble, preface, *introduction, foreword, prologue, prelude, overture, prolegomenon, proem, prolation, protasis, avant-propos.

expand. Expand, amplify, swell, distend, inflate, dilate agree in meaning to increase or to cause to increase in size, bulk, or volume. Expand is the most inclusive term in this group, and may often be used interchangeably with any of the others. It distinctively implies enlargement by opening out, unfolding, spreading, or the like, and may be used when the enlarging force is either internal or external; as, tulips expand in the sun; the flag expanded in the breeze; to expand a sponge by soaking it in water; to expand tires by introducing air; to expand one's chest by breathing exercises; their business is expanding. Amplify implies extension of that which is inadequate and, often, not clear, as by filling out with details or by magnifying the volume; as, to amplify a statement; devices for amplifying sounds. "They [the Modernists] don't claim that the Divine revelation has been supplanted or even added to, but that it has been amplified" (C. Mackenzie). "The author follows the Vulgate narrative closely...but amplifies and embroiders" (Sainsbury). Swell implies expansion, often abnormal expansion, beyond a thing's original circumference or normal limits; as, warm spring rains cause the leaf buds to swell; the river is swelling; his hand is swollen; gifts to swell the endowment fund. Often it implies increase in intensity, force, volume, or the like; as, "the laughter swelled to hooting" (Galsworthy). "Caesar's ambition, Which swell'd so much that it did almost stretch The sides o' the world" (Shak.). Often, both in literal and figurative use, it implies puffing up or puffing out, to the point of bursting; as, swollen veins; his heart swelled with pride (or with indignation). Distend always implies swelling caused by pressure from within forcing extension outward in all possible directions. Sometimes it presupposes previous collapse; as, a rubber bag distends when filled with water; sails distended by the wind: sometimes it implies an exceeding of the normal bounds; as, a stomach distended by gas; "like the flesh of animals distended by fear or desire" (Cather). Inflate usually implies distention by artificial means, as by the introduction of gas or air or, figuratively, by puffing up with something as insubstantial or as easily dissipated as gas or air; as, to inflate a balloon; to inflate values; to inflate the currency; an inflated idea of one's own importance. "Poems...so inflated with metaphor, that they may be compared to the gaudy bubbles blown up from a solution of soap" (Goldsmith). Dilate implies expansion in diameter; it therefore suggests a widening out of something circular rather than a puffing up of something globular or spherical. "As round a pebble into water thrown dilates a ring of light" (Longfellow). "Half-frighted, with dilated eyes" (Tennyson). "Some stirring experience...may swiftly dilate your field of consciousness" (C. E. Montague).

Ana. Enlarge, *increase, augment: *extend, protract, prolong.

Antf. Contract: abridge (a book, article, etc.): circumscribe (a range, a scope, a power, etc.).

expanse. Expanse, amplitude, spread, stretch are comparable when they denote an area or range of considerable or conspicuous extent. Expanse is applied chiefly to vast areas, open to view and usually uniform in character; as, "pure as the expanse of Heaven" (Milton); "Thy mariners explore the wide expanse" (Cowper); "great expanse of country spread around and below" (D. H. Lawrence). Amplitude is more often applied to that which is relatively vast in its proportions or range; it additionally implies fullness, abundance, or sometimes complexity; as, "people with a dignity of port, an amplitude of back" (L. P. Smith); "she went forth into the amplitude of tanned wild [the heath]" (Hardy); "an immense, leisurely, true novel...with a Tolstoyan or Proustian amplitude" (L. P. Smith). Spread is applied to an expanse thought of as drawn out in all directions; as, "the water...a ripply spread of sun and sea" (Browning); "a trackless spread of moor" (Blackmore); "under the immense spread of the starry heavens" (Stevenson). Stretch is applied to an expanse thought of especially with reference to its extent in one of its two dimensions, which one usually being indicated in the context; as, the beach was a wide (or narrow) stretch of sand; a stretch of farmland extending as far as the distant mountains, "the great stretches of fields that lay beside the road" (S. Anderson).

Ana. *Range, reach, scope, compass, sweep, orbit: domain, territory, sphere, *field.

expansive. *Elastic, resilient, buoyant, volatile, effervescent.

Ana. Exuberant, luxuriant, lavish, prodigal (see PROFUSE): generous, *liberal, bountiful: *elated, elate, exultant: exalted, magnified, aggrandized (see EXALT).

Antf. Tense: reserved. — Con. *Stiff, inflexible, rigid: stern, austere, *severe: taciturn, *silent, reticent.

expatiate. *Discourse, taciturn, dilate.

Ana. analogous words. Antf. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ana. *Speak, talk, converse: *expand, amplify: *discuss, argue, dispute: expound, *explain: *relate, narrate, recount, recite, rehearse.

expatriate, v. Exile, *banish, ostracize, deport, transport, extradite.

Ant. Repatriate.

expect. Expect, hope, look, look for, await come into comparison because they agree in meaning to have something in mind as more or less certain to happen or come about. They vary, however, so greatly in their implications and in their constructions that they are seldom interchangeable. Expect usually implies a high degree of certainty, but it also involves the idea of anticipation, as by making preparations or by envisioning what will happen, or what one will find, or what emotions one will feel; as, he told his mother not to expect him for dinner; she had reason to expect that the trip would be exciting. "He seems to require and expect goodness in his species as we do a sweet taste in grapes and China oranges" (B. Mandeville). "What can you expect of a girl who was allowed to wear black satin at her coming-out ball?" (E. Wharton). Hope implies entertainment of the idea that one may expect what one desires or longs for; although it seldom implies certitude, it usually connotes confidence and often, especially in religious use, it implies profound assurance; as, he dared not hope that he would succeed in his venture, for he feared disappointment. "Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter i. 13). "He can never expect, he can never even reasonably hope, that reason will ever hold in leash the emotions" (H. Ellis). Look (usually followed by to with an infinitive and sometimes also by to with a personal object) is less literary than expect; it often also suggests more strongly than expect a counting upon or a freedom from doubt; as, they look to profit by their investment; they looked to their son to help them in their old age. Look for, on the other hand, does not imply as much assurance; it suggests rather an attitude of expectancy and watchfulness; as, they are looking for news in the next post; there is no use looking for their return tonight. Await often adds to look for the implication of being ready mentally (sometimes physically) for the event; it also suggests waiting, often patient waiting; as, we await your reply with interest; the two armies are eager for action, each awaiting an attack by the other. "I... had known it would happen to me, and now it was there with all the strangeness and dark mystery of an awaited thing" (T. Wolfe). Await also differs from the other words in this group in its capacity for taking as subject the thing expected and as object the person who is expecting; as, good fortune awaits you; death awaits all men.

Ana. *Foresee, foreknow, anticipate, apprehend, divine. Ant. Despair of.

expectorate. *Spit.

expedient, adj. Expedient, politic, advisable are comparable when they are used to imply a choice, as of course, action, or method, and to mean dictated by practical wisdom, or by motives of prudence. That is expedient from which definite and, usually, immediate advantages accrue. Originally and still occasionally, the word and its derivatives carry no trace of a derogatory implication. "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you" (John xvi. 7). "The old man believed that the whip of shame and pain could drive her... into an appreciation of the expediency of morality" (Deland). In its sense development, expedient came to imply determination by immediate conditions and, hence, to mean necessary or suitable under present circumstances. "There shall be appointed... such number of... justices of the peace as the president of the United States shall, from time to time, think expedient" (Ch. Just. Marshall). As a result, expedient now commonly implies opportuneness (sometimes with a hint of time-serving) as well as advantageousness; as, they decided that it was not expedient (that is, neither opportune nor of advantage) to interfere now. Very frequently also, it connotes an ulterior motive such as self-interest. "It [civilization] was all founded on social expediency, on primitive laws to protect inheritance, to safeguard property" (R. Macaulay). Consequently, expedient is often opposed to right, the former suggesting a choice determined by temporal ends, the latter one determined by ethical principles. "Too fond of the right to pursue the expedient" (Goldsmith). That is politic which is the judicious course, action, or method from the practical point of view. Though often used interchangeably with expedient, politic in discriminating use is applied to choices involving tactics, or the effective handling of persons, and expedient to choices involving strategy, or the gaining of objectives; as, the move was a politic one, for it served to win friends to the cause and to placate its enemies. "Community of race... is mainly a politic fiction, at least in countries of European civilization, in which the races are inextricably mixed up" (Encyc. Brit., 12th Ed.). Like expedient, however, politic often implies material motives. "The question with me is... whether it is not your interest to make them [the American colonists] happy... Is a politic act the worse for being a generous one?" (Burke). That is advisable which is expedient in the original, underogatory sense of that word. Advisable has now nearly lost its original derivative sense, and is preferred by writers or speakers who wish to avoid any of the unpleasant implications of expedient, or sometimes, of politic. "I don't think that it's altogether advisable to mention Dickens in a sermon... Some people might be offended at mentioning a novelist in church" (C. Mackenzie).

Ana. Advantageous, *beneficial, profitable: useful, utilitarian (see corresponding nouns at USE): *seasonable, opportune, timely, well-timed: feasible, practicable, *possible.

Ant. Inexpedient. — Con. Detrimental, deleterious (see PERNICIOUS): harming or harmful, hurting or hurtful, injuring or injurious (see corresponding verbs at INJURE): *futile, vain, fruitless.

expedient, n. *Resource, resort, shift, makeshift, stopgap, substitute, surrogate.

Ana. *Device, contrivance, contraption: *means, agency, instrument, instrumentality, medium.

expedition. 1 Dispatch, speed, *haste, hurry.

Ana. *Celerity, legerity, alacrity: agility, nimbleness, briskness (see corresponding adjectives at AGILE).

Ant. Procrastination. — Con. Delaying or delay, retarding or retardation, slowing, slackening (see corresponding verbs at DELAY).

Ant. Admit (sense 1).

expense. Cost, *price, charge.

expensive. *Costly, dear, valuable, precious, invaluable, priceless.

Ana. Exorbitant, extravagant, *excessive, immoderate.
Ant. Inexpensive.

experience, n. Experience, experiment are now rarely, if ever, synonymous terms but they are so closely associated in meaning that they are sometimes confused. Both terms denote a practical as opposed to a speculative way of finding out about a thing (or, often, a person) facts that are not obvious or outwardly evident. Experience implies direct personal knowledge through immediate observation, actual practice, or conscious subjection, as to an emotional or mental state or condition: it especially implies knowledge which comes as a result of one's normal way of life, one's particular environment, or one's character or training. Experience is applicable not only to an individual's way of finding out facts, but to a group's way, as that of a class, a people, a race, or the like. "She knew by prevision what most women learn only by experience: she had mentally walked round love, told the towers thereof, considered its palaces; and concluded that love was but a doleful joy" (Hardy). "In the case of my own boy, and presumably in other cases too, the experience of overcoming fear is extraordinarily delightful" (B. Russell). "A colouring harmony obtained by the aid of a long experience in the effects of light on translucent surfaces" (Viollet-le-Duc, transl. by H. Adams). "I feared that Mr. Powell's want of experience would stand in his way of appreciating the unusual" (Conrad). Experiment, on the other hand, implies the performance of an action or operation or the submission of a person (often oneself) or of a thing to a test which has for its end or aim proof or disproof (as of a theory or hypothesis), the showing by trial that a thing will or will not work or accomplish what is claimed for it, or the establishment, verification, or illustration of a general truth such as a scientific law: thus, one may consciously drink too much liquor either to have an experience (not experiment) of the release from care which is said to accompany a certain degree of intoxication, or to make an experiment (not experience) of the truth of that theory; some peoples try democracy as an experiment and later accept it or reject it on the ground of their experience. "Faith begins as an experiment, and ends as an experience. It begins as a resolution to stand or fall by the noblest hypothesis, as Frederic Myers says; but it is verified progressively as we go on" (Inge).

experiment, n. *Experience.

Ana. Trying or trial, testing or test, proving or proof, demonstrating or demonstration (see under PROVE).

expert, adj. *Proficient, adept, skilled, skillful.

Ana. Practiced, drilled (see PRACTICE, v.): trained, schooled (see TEACH): *dexterous, deft, feat, adroit.

Ant. Amateurish. — Con. Inept, maladroit, *awkward, clumsy.

expert, n. Expert, adept, artist, artiste, virtuoso, wizard, dab, dabster come into comparison only when they designate a person who shows mastery in a subject, an art, or a profession, or who reveals extraordinary skill in execution, performance, or technique. Expert always implies successful experience, broad knowledge of one's subject, and distinguished achievements; it is applied specifically to one who is recognized as an authority in his field; as, an expert in city planning; a handwriting expert. "This problem in triangulation was extremely difficult, and an expert in geodesy was brought from the United States" (V. Heiser). Adept, originally applied to an alchemist who claimed to have discovered "the great secret" of transmutation of base into precious metals, still, in discriminating use, connotes understanding of the mysteries of some art or craft or penetration into secrets beyond the reach of exact science. "Thou art an adept in the difficult lore Of Greek and Frank philosophy" (Shelley). It tends, in modern use, to imply subtlety or ingenuity; as, he is an adept in intrigue; he is an adept at evasion. Artist, as it comes into comparison with the other words of this group, stresses extraordinary skill in execution, or in giving outward form to that which the mind conceives. Much more than any other word in this group it stresses the incentives to skill in performance, such as a passion for perfection in workmanship, a loving attention to detail, a feeling for the material in which one works. "The good craftsman... becomes an artist in so far as he treats his materials also for themselves... and is perpetually besieged by dreams of beauty in his work" (S. Alexander). "And it came to pass that after a time the artist was forgotten, but the work lived" (O. Schreiner). Artiste was taken over from the French, during the nineteenth century, when artist tended to become restricted in its application to painters and sculptors. It was originally applied to actors, singers, and dancers; now it is often, more or less humorously, also applied to workers in crafts where adeptness and taste are indispensable to distinguished achievement; as, that milliner is an artiste. Virtuoso, though often close to artist in meaning, stresses the outward display of great technical skill or brilliance in execution, rather than the inner passion for perfection or beauty. It is applied chiefly, though far from exclusively, to performers on musical instruments, especially to pianists, violinists, and violoncellists; as, the compositions of Liszt are the delight of virtuosi. "This precise evocation of forms and colors by the great virtuosos of description" (Babbitt). Wizard, a colloquial term, may be used in place of any of the preceding words: it is often hyperbolic, however, and suggests the achievement of wonders or of the impossible; as, Steinmetz was regarded as the wizard among investigators of electricity. Dab and dabster are British terms implying great proficiency or expertness. The former, originally a schoolboy term, is found in works of good writers, but the latter is chiefly in dialectal use. "I wish to show I am a dab in history" (Thackeray).

Ant. Amateur. — Con. Tyro, dabbler, dilettante (see AMATEUR): *novice, apprentice, probationer.

expiate, v. Expiate, atone (or atone for) agree in meaning to make or give satisfaction for an offense, a sin, a crime, or the like. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are observable in their derivative nouns expiation and atonement. Expiate and expiation imply an attempt to undo the wrong one has done, by suffering the penalty, by doing penance, or by making reparation or redress. "Let me here, As I deserve, pay on my punishment. And expiate, if possible, my crime" (Milton). "Unless that man in there is to be given a chance of expiation in another life, then capital punishment is a damnable horror" (C. Mackenzie). Atone and atonement have been greatly colored in their meanings by theological controversies concerning the Atonement, or the redemptive end, for which Christ, as God, became man, and suffered and died on the cross. The original meaning of the verb in English was to "make one," by reconciling persons at odds with each other. "I was glad I did alone my countryman and you" (Shak.). By extension, it also meant to compose or settle differences, an altercation, or the like. "The constable is called to alone the broil" (J. Heywood). Consequently the implication of reconciliation became mixed with and sometimes subordinated to other implications such as appeasement, propitiation, or reparation. Atonement, as a theological term with various interpretations, sometimes stresses one or more of these implications to the exclusion of the others. In current general use, however, alone (usually alone for) and atonement emphasize a restoration, through some compensation, of a balance that has been lost. When the reference is to an offense, sin, crime, or the like, the words usually imply expiation, but they stress the rendering of satisfaction for the evil that has been done by acts that are good or meritorious; thus, one expiates a sin by doing penance for it, but one atones for it by leading a good life afterwards. "She hated herself for this movement of envy...and tried to atone for it by a softened manner and a more anxious regard for Charlotte's feelings" (E. Wharton). But not only an offense, but also a deficiency or a default may be atoned for by an excess of something else that is equally desirable. "For those who kneel beside us At altars not Thine own, Who lack the lights that guide us, Lord, let their faith atone!" (Kipling).

Ana. Redress, remedy, rectify, *correct, amend: redeem, deliver, save (see RESCUE).

expiation. Atonement (see under EXPIATE, v.).

Ana. *Penitence, repentance, contrition: *trial, tribulation, cross, visitation.

explain. 1 Explain, expound, explicate, elucidate, interpret, construe come into comparison when they mean to make oneself or another understand the meaning of something. To explain, the most general term, is to make plain or intelligible to another or others something not known or clearly understood; as, to explain to a boy the mechanism of an engine; the teacher explained the meanings of the new words in the poem. Expound implies careful, elaborate, often learned setting forth of a subject in such a way as to explain it, as in a lecture, a book, a treatise, or the like; as, a clergyman expounding a Biblical text; to expound a point of law. "Sir A. Eddington in two masterly chapters...expounds the law of gravitation" (S. Alexander); to expound the duties of the citizen. Explicate (literally, to unfold), a somewhat learned term, adds to expound the idea of development or detailed analysis; as, "the mind of a doctor of the Church who could...explicate the meaning of a dogma" (T. S. Eliot); "the explication of our Saviour's parables" (Atterbury). Elucidate implies a throwing light upon a subject, a work, a passage, or the like, especially by clear or luminous exposition or illustration; as, to elucidate an obscure passage; "the simplicity of the case can be added...when the object is to addle and not to elucidate" (Shaw). Interpret implies the making clear to oneself or to another the meaning of something which presents more than intellectual difficulties (such as a poem, a dream, an abstraction, a work in a foreign language) and requires special knowledge, imagination, sympathy, or the like, in the person who would understand it or make it understood; as, "I have tried in this all too hasty sketch to interpret...the indwelling spirit and ideal of the art of the Far East" (Binyon); "Love...[as] the initiation into the higher life...was not invented but interpreted by Plato" (G. L. Dickinson); "an inscription which no one could understand or rightly interpret" (Hudson). Construe is preferred to interpret when the difficulties are textual, either because of the strangeness of the language (such as by being foreign, ancient, dialectal, technical, or the like) or because of ambiguities or equivocations in it. It therefore may suggest either translation involving careful analysis of grammatical structure (as, to construe ten lines of Vergil) or a highly individual or particular interpretation; as, "The phrase 'every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce' may be construed to mean 'while engaged in trade or commerce' without violence to the habits of English speech" (Justice Holmes); "somehow or other, [he] had construed the ordinarily polite terms of his letter of engagement into a belief that the Directors had chosen him on account of his special and brilliant talents" (Kipling).

Ana. *Analyze, resolve, dissect, anatomize, break down: *discuss, argue, dispute: *exemplify, illustrate.

2 Explain, account for, justify, rationalize are synonymous when they mean to give or tell the cause, reason, nature, or significance of something obscure or questionable. One explains what is hard to understand, as that which is mysterious in its origin or nature, or lacks an apparent or sufficient cause, or is full of inconsistencies. "These sciences [mathematics and physics] have not succeeded in explaining the phenomena of life" (Inge). "This...study of Napoleon, which, while free from all desire to defend or admire, yet seems to explain Napoleon" (H. Ellis). Explain often implies an attempt to excuse or to set oneself right with others. "One can do almost anything...if one does not attempt to explain it" (E. Wharton). One accounts for something, rather than explains it, when one feels that it is incumbent on one to give an explanation. This sense of account for arises out of an earlier one meaning to render an account of something one has to answer for; as, to account for money entrusted to one's care; to account for the use of one's time or opportunities. In careful English this implication of responsibility is strong in account for as here considered. "We [certain philosophers] fail, we are told, to account for the world. Well, the world is a solid fact, which we have to accept, not to account for" (Inge). "Going about her business as if nothing had happened that needed to be accounted for" (E. Wharton). One justifies oneself or another when one explains certain acts or behavior in an attempt to free oneself or another from blame. It may or may not imply consciousness of guilt or a definite accusation. "Powell...began to justify himself. 'I couldn't stop him,' he whispered shakily. 'He was too quick for me'" (Conrad). "So far is he from feeling the pangs of conscience that he constantly justifies his act" (G. L. Dickinson). "In her heart she did not at all justify or excuse Cyril" (Bennett). One rationalizes that which is or seems to be contrary to reason when one attempts an explanation that is in accord with scientific principles or with reality as known to the senses; as, to rationalize the Greek myths; to rationalize the Genesis story of creation. In very modern use, rationalize often comes close to justify without, however, so strong an implication of blame and with the added implication of self-deception and, at times, of hypocrisy. "In other countries the plutocracy has often produced men of reflective and analytical habit, eager to rationalize its instincts" (Mencken). "Propaganda...is influential only when it is a rationalization of the...prejudices or interests of those to whom it is addressed" (A. Huxley).

Ana. *Excuse, condone: *exculpate, exonerate, acquit, absolve.

explicate, v. *Explain, expound, elucidate, interpret, construe.

explicit. Explicit, express, specific, definite, categorical are here compared chiefly as applied to statements, utterances, language, and the like, and as meaning perfectly clear in significance or reference. That is explicit which is stated so plainly and distinctly that nothing is left to be inferred or to cause difficulty by being vague, equivocal, or ambiguous; as, explicit directions or promises; "to give an explicit and determinate account of what is meant by [the principle of utility]" (Bentham). That is express which is both explicit and is uttered or expressed with directness, pointedness, or force; as, an express prohibition or understanding; express testimony. "The defendant should be enjoined from publishing news obtained from the Associated Press for—hours after publication by the plaintiff unless it gives express credit to the Associated Press; the number of hours...to be settled by the District Court" (Justice Holmes). That is specific which is perfectly precise in its reference to a particular thing or in its statement of the details covered or comprehended; as, in addition he made two specific criticisms of the school, one dealing with its lack of a playground, the other with the defective ventilation of certain rooms; a command should always be specific (that is, it should specify all details). That is definite which leaves no doubt either as to its reference or to its details (and therefore is specific) or as to what is excluded; definite, far more than specific, suggests precise and determinate limitations; as, he was asked to make a definite statement concerning the young man's prospects with the company. Actually, specific and definite are often used interchangeably without loss; but careful writers and speakers usually prefer specific when they wish to stress particularization of reference or specification of details, and definite when they wish to emphasize clear limitations; thus, a colonel's command to a scout may be specific and yet not perfectly definite if, for example, it leaves the scout in doubt as to what he should do when circumstances become extremely dangerous or the possibility of escape is being cut off. Categorical (see also ULTIMATE, 2) implies explicitness without the least suggestion of a qualification or condition; thus, a categorical answer is demanded of a person testifying in court when he is compelled to answer yes or no; a categorical denial is a denial that is complete and contains not the slightest reservations. "It is perilous to make categorical assertions" (Lowes).

Ana. Precise, exact, accurate (see CORRECT): *clear, lucid, perspicuous.

Ant. Ambiguous. — Con. Equivocal, vague, enigmatic, cryptic, dark, *obscure: *implicit, virtual, constructive.

exploit, v. *Feat, achievement.

Ana. Act, deed, *action: *adventure, enterprise, emprise, quest.

expose. Display, exhibit, *show, parade, flaunt.

Ana. *Reveal, disclose, discover, divulge: demonstrate, evince, manifest, evidence, *show: air, ventilate, vent, voice, utter, *express: publish, advertise, proclaim, broadcast, *declare.

exposé, n. Exposure, *exposition.

exposed. Open, *liable, subject, prone, susceptible, sensitive, incident.

Ana. Threatened, menaced (see THREATEN).

Con. Protected, shielded, guarded, safeguarded, defended (see DEFEND).

exposition. 1 Fair, *exhibition, exhibit, show.

2 Exposition, exposure, exposé come into comparison when they mean a setting forth or laying open of a thing or things hitherto not known or fully understood. Exposition often implies a display of something such as wares, manufactures, a collection of rarities, antiques, or the like (for this sense see EXHIBITION); even more often, it implies a setting forth of that which is necessary for the elucidation or explanation of something such as a theory, a dogma, the law (as, "You know the law, your exposition Hath been most sound"—Shak.) or the events or situations preceding a story or play (as, the first quarter of the first act is devoted to the exposition). In a more general sense, especially in academic use, exposition applies to that type of writing which has explanation for its end or aim, and is thereby distinguished from other types the object of which is to describe, to narrate, or, by argument, to prove a contention. Exposure (see also FRONTAGE) is now preferred to exposition as a term implying a laying (someone or something) bare or open, especially (but not invariably) to detrimental or injurious influences or to reprobation, contempt, or severe censure; as, fabrics faded by exposure to the sun; exposure to a contagious disease; the exposure of a candidate's unsavory past; the exposure of a person's motives. Exposure is the correct term for the time during which a sensitive surface, such as that of a photographic film, is laid open to the influence of light; as, an exposure of two seconds. Exposé is often used in place of exposure for a revealing (usually a formal or deliberate revealing) of something that is discreditable to a person or group; as, an exposé of an allegedly charitable association; an exposé of a judge's graft.

expostulate. Remonstrate, protest, *object, kick.

Ana. *Oppose, resist, combat: argue, debate, dispute, *discuss.

exposure. 1 *Frontage, aspect.

Ana. *Prospect, outlook.

2 Exposé, *exposition.

Ant. Cover: covering. — Con. *Shelter, refuge, asylum, retreat.

expound. *Explain, explicate, elucidate, interpret, construe.

Ana. Dissect, anatomize, break down, *analyze, resolve: illustrate, *exemplify.

express, adj. *Explicit, definite, specific, categorical.

Ana. Expressed, voiced, uttered (see EXPRESS, v.): lucid, *clear, perspicuous: distinct, plain (see EVIDENT): precise, exact, accurate (see CORRECT).

Con. *Implicit, constructive, virtual: vague, *obscure, cryptic, enigmatic, ambiguous, equivocal.

express, v. Express, vent, utter, voice, broach, air, ventilate come into comparison when they mean to let out what one feels or thinks. Express, the most comprehensive of these words, implies an impulse to reveal not only one's thoughts or feelings, but also one's experiences, one's imaginative conceptions, one's personality, or the like; it implies revelation not only in words but also in gestures, in action, in dress, in what one makes or produces, especially as works of art. "Once again I have to express surprise and satisfaction" (Lucas). "In speaking or writing we have an obligation to put ourselves into the hearer's or reader's place....To express ourselves is a very small part of the business" (Quiller-Couch). "There were so many different moods and impressions that he wished to express in verse" (Joyce). Vent stresses an inner compulsion to expression, such as a pent-up emotion that seeks an outlet or a powerful passion that cannot be controlled; as, he vented his spleen in libelous caricatures. "His heart's his mouth: What his breast forges, that his tongue must vent" (Shak.). "By means of ferocious jokes...he [Mark Twain] could vent his hatred of pioneer life and all its conditions" (Van W. Brooks). Utter stresses the use of voice; it does not, however, always imply speech; as, to utter a yell; to utter one's relief by sobbing. When speech is implied, the context often suggests a reason for secrecy as well as for revelation. "He was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter" (2 Corinthians xii. 4). "Begin by encouraging him to utter freely even his most shocking thoughts" (B. Russell). Voice does not necessarily imply vocal utterance, but it invariably suggests expression in words. "I revelled in being able to voice my opinions without being regarded as a dangerous lunatic" (C. Mackenzie). Very often voice suggests that the writer or speaker serves as a mouth-piece; as, the editorial voices the universal longing for peace; one, bolder than the rest, voiced their disapproval of the proposal. Broach stresses mention for the first time, especially of something long thought over and awaiting an opportune moment for disclosure; as, the mayor did not broach the project until he felt that public opinion was in its favor. Air implies exposure, often in the desire to parade one's views, sometimes in the hope of attracting attention or sympathy; as, to air one's opinions of the government; to air a grievance. Ventilate implies exposure also, but usually suggests a desire to get at the truth as by discovering the real issues or by weighing the evidence pro and con; it often means to investigate freely, openly, and thoroughly. "The question [the future of literature] has thus been ventilated from every point of view" (Times Lit. Sup.).

Ana. *Speak, talk: *pronounce, articulate, enunciate: *reveal, disclose, divulge, tell: *declare, proclaim, announce.

Ant. Imply. — Con. Hint, intimate, *suggest, insinuate.

expression. *Phrase, locution, collocation, idiom.

expressive. Expressive, eloquent, significant, meaningful, pregnant, sententious, as here compared, agree in meaning clearly conveying or manifesting a thought, idea, or feeling, or a combination of these. That is expressive which vividly or strikingly represents the thoughts, feelings, or ideas which it intends to convey or which inform or animate it: the term is applicable not only to language but to works of art or, in the case of music, drama, and the like, to their performance, and to looks, features, inarticulate sounds, and the like; as, a forcible and expressive word; an expressive face; "he laid great stress on the painting of the eyes, as the most expressive and dominating feature" (Binyon). "A growing emphasis on the element [in beauty] that is described by such epithets as vital, characteristic, picturesque, individual,—in short, on the element that may be summed up by the epithet expressive" (Babbitt). That is eloquent (as here considered: see also VOCAL, 2) which "speaks louder than words," and reveals with even greater or more impressive force one's thoughts, ideas, or feelings (as, "There was a burst of applause, and a deep silence which was even more eloquent than the applause"—Hardy; "I could scarcely remove my eyes from her eloquent countenance: I seemed to read in it relief and gladness mingled with surprise and something like vexation"—Hudson), or which gives a definite and clear suggestion of a condition, situation, character, or the like (as, "a tremulous little man, in greenish-black broadcloth, eloquent of continued depression in some village retail trade"—Quiller-Couch; "a sidewalk eloquent of official neglect"—Brounell). Eloquent is also applicable to words, style, and the like, when a power to arouse deep feeling or to evoke images or ideas charged with emotion is implied; as, words eloquent of feeling; a simple but deeply eloquent style. That is significant which is not empty of ideas, thoughts, purpose, or the like, but conveys a meaning to the auditor, observer, reader, or the like. The term sometimes is applied to words that express a clearly ascertainable idea as distinguished from those words that merely express a relation or a connection, such as prepositions, conjunctions, etc. (as, "his honoured client had a meaning and so deep it was, so subtle, that no wonder he experienced a difficulty in giving it fitly significant words"—Meredith; "those who lay down that every sentence must end on a significant word, never on a preposition"—H. Ellis), or to works of art or literature that similarly express a clearly ascertainable idea (such as a moral, a lesson, a thesis) as distinguished from works that exist purely for their beauty or perfection of form and have no obvious purpose or import (as, art-for-art's-sake men deny that any work of art is necessarily significant; many persons find it difficult to enjoy poems such as Coleridge's "Kubla Khan" that are not significant). More often, significant applies to looks, gestures, acts, or the like, that suggest a covert or hidden meaning or intention; as, "By many significant looks and silent entreaties, did she endeavour to prevent such a proof of complaisance" (Austen); "she could not feel that there was anything significant in his attentions" (Deland). That is meaningful which is significant in the sense just defined: the term, however, is often preferred when nothing more than the presence of meaning or intention is implied and any hint of importance or of momentousness (implications sometimes associated with significant in the sense here considered) would be confusing; as, of two close synonyms one word may be more meaningful (i.e., richer in connotations) than the other; "it was a... meaningful smile" (G. Macdonald). That is pregnant (literally, heavy with young, as a mother) which conveys its meaning with richness or with weightiness, and often with extreme conciseness or power. "It is pretty and graceful, but how different from the grave and pregnant strokes of Maurice's pencil" (Arnold). "The pregnant maxim of Bacon that the right question is the half of knowledge" (H. Ellis). "He had no talent for revealing a character or resuming the significance of an episode in a single pregnant phrase" (Maugham). That is sententious which is full of significance: when applied, as is usual, to expressions, the word connotes the force and the pithiness of an aphorism; as, "sententious and oracular brevity" (Gibbon); "sententious maxims" (T. S. Eliot). In current use, the term often connotes platitudinousness or triteness; as, "'Contentment breeds Happiness'... a proposition... sententious, sedate, obviously true" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. Revealing or revelatory, disclosing, divulging (see corresponding verbs at REVEAL): *graphic, vivid, picturesque, pictorial: suggesting or suggestive, adumbrating, shadowing (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST).

Con. *Stiff, wooden, rigid, tense, stark: stern, austere, *severe: inane, jejune, flat, banal, vapid, *insipid: vacuous, *empty.

expunge. *Erase, cancel, efface, obliterate, blot out, delete, dele.

Ana. Wipe out, eradicate, extirpate (see EXTERMINATE). exquisite, adj. *Choice, recherché, rare, dainty, delicate, elegant.

Ana. Precious, valuable, priceless, *costly: *consummate, finished: flawless, *impeccable, faultless: *perfect, intact, whole, entire.

exquisite, n. *Fop, élégant, coxcomb, beau, dandy, dude, macaroni, buck, spark, swell, nob, toff.

extemporaneous, extemporary. Extempore, extempore, extemporary, improvised, impromptu, off-hand, unpremeditated agree in meaning composed, concocted, devised, or done at the moment rather than beforehand. Extempore (now, in general use, the most common of the three words), extempore (more often used adverbially) and extemporary apply to something that is necessitated by the occasion or situation, such as a speech, a prayer, or a song, or in older and now rare use, something which must be hastily constructed, prepared, or produced; as, an extemporaneous oration;

an extempore sermon; an extemporary altar; "extemporary government" (Johnson). The terms, however, as applied to discourse, often suggest advance knowledge or thought and imply little more than the absence of a written record of what one intends to say; as, he is one of the best extemporaneous speakers of our time; extempore prayers are preferred in some churches as more likely to be sincere and fervent. Improvised stresses the absence of foreknowledge of what is to be accomplished and therefore the composing, concocting, devising, or constructing of something without advance thought or preparation and often without the necessary tools, instruments, or other equipment; as, an improvised musical accompaniment; an improvised pantomime; an improvised bed for the night in the open; "When an emergency came an army had to be improvised" (Buchan). Impromptu stresses the immediate response to a need or suggestion and the spontaneous character of that which is composed, concocted, or the like, on the spur of the moment; as, an impromptu speech or reply; an impromptu picnic; an impromptu dance. Offhand (also an adverb) carries so much stronger an implication of casualness, carelessness, or indifference than any of the preceding terms, that at times it loses its suggestion of an impromptu character and means little more than curl or brusque; as, an offhand comment; an offhand salute; an offhand manner of dealing with strangers. Unpremeditated emphasizes less strongly than extemporaneous and impromptu the immediate stimulus of an occasion but it usually suggests some strong, often suddenly provoked, emotion which drives one to composition, to action, or the like; as, "[the skylark] That from heaven, or near it, Pourst thy full heart In profuse strains of unpremeditated art" (Shelley); unpremeditated murder.

Ana. *Spontaneous, impulsive: ready, prompt, apt, *quick.

Con. Planned, designed, projected, schemed (see verbs under PLAN, n.): *deliberate, considered, studied, advised, premeditated: formal, ceremonious, *ceremonial, conventional.

extempore. *Extemporaneous, extemporary, improvised, impromptu, offhand, unpremeditated.

Ana. & Con. See those at EXTEMPORANEOUS.

extend. Extend, lengthen, elongate, prolong, protract all agree in meaning to draw out or add to so as to increase in length. Both extend and lengthen (opposed to shorten) connote an increase of length either in space or in time but extend is also used figuratively to connote increase in range as of kinds, of influence, of applicability, and the like; as, to extend (or lengthen) a road; to extend (or lengthen) one's stay; to extend (not lengthen) one's privileges, a monarch's power, a word's meaning. Elongate (usually opposed to abbreviate) denotes to increase in spatial length and has wider technical than general use; as, fibers elongated by stretching. Prolong (opposed to cut short, arrest) means to extend in duration beyond usual or normal limits; as, to prolong one's childhood; to prolong the process of digestion; exercise prolongs life. Protract (opposed to curtail) adds to the denotation of prolong the connotations of indefiniteness, needlessness, or boredom; as, a protracted debate or visit. Ana. *Increase, enlarge, augment: *expand, amplify, distend, dilate.

Ant. Abridge, shorten. — Con. Abbreviate, curtail, retrench (see SHORTEN): *contract, shrink, condense.

extension. Wing, ell, *annex, dependence.

extent. *Size, dimensions, area, magnitude, volume.

Ana. *Range, scope, compass, sweep, reach, radius: stretch, spread, amplitude, *expanse.

extenuate, v. 1 Attenuate, *thin, dilute, rarefy.

Ana. Diminish, lessen, reduce, *decrease: *weaken, enfeeble, debilitate: *moderate, temper, attemper, qualify.

Ant. Intensify. — Con. Aggravate, heighten, enhance (see INTENSIFY).

2 *Palliate, gloze, gloss, whitewash, whiten.

Ana. Condone, *excuse: rationalize, *explain, justify.

exterior, adj. *Outer, external, outward, outside.

Ana. *Extrinsic, extraneous, foreign, alien.

Ant. Interior. — Con. *Inner, inward, internal, inside, intestine: intrinsic, *inherent, ingrained.

exterminate. Exterminate, extirpate, eradicate, uproot, deracinate, wipe out come into comparison in their secondary senses in which they mean to effect the destruction or abolition of something. Exterminate (etymologically, to expel or banish from the bounds or limits) implies utter extinction; it therefore in current use usually, but not invariably, implies a killing off; as, efforts to exterminate certain pests such as mosquitoes, rats, and ragweed have not yet been successful; "the tribe [of Indians] had been exterminated, not here in their stronghold, but in their summer camp...across the river" (Cather). Extirpate (literally, to pluck up a plant by the stem and root so as to cause its death) implies extinction as of a race, or family, or species, or growth, but it may carry a less immediate implication of killing off than extermination carries, by suggesting the destruction or removal of the means whereby a thing is propagated rather than the destruction of all the individuals involved; thus, a tribe might be extirpated (or exterminated) by a famine; a heresy is often extirpated (rather than exterminated) by the removal of the leaders from a position of influence; a vice cannot easily be extirpated so long as the conditions which promote it remain in existence. Eradicate (literally, to pluck out by the roots) stresses the driving out or elimination of something that has taken root or has established itself; as, diphtheria has been nearly but not completely eradicated from the United States; it is difficult to eradicate popular superstitions; "he must gradually eradicate his settled conviction that the Italians and the French are wrong" (Grandgent). Uproot (which literally means the same as eradicate) differs from the latter word chiefly in being more definitely figurative and in suggesting forcible and violent methods similar to those of a tempest that tears trees out by their roots; as, "Hands...red with guiltless blood...uprooting every germ Of truth" (Shelley); "end forthwith The ruin of a life uprooted thus" (Browning); refugees from the peoples uprooted by war. Deracinate varies little from uproot in meaning but is far less common in use. "Frights, changes, horrors, Divert and crack, rend and deracinate The unity and married calm of states Quite from their fixture!" (Shak.). "He fascinated the young Anderson's intellect and deracinated certain convictions" (W. R. Bennett). Wipe out (literally, to rub out by erasing) often implies extermination (as, the entire battery was wiped out by shell fire) but it equally often suggests a canceling or obliterating as by payment, retaliation, exhaustion of supply, or the like (as, to wipe out a debt; to wipe out an old score; to wipe out a disgrace; the fall in share prices wiped out his margin).

Ana. *Abolish, extinguish, annihilate, abate: obliterate, efface, expunge, blot out, *erase: *destroy, demolish, raze.

external, adj. *Outer, exterior, outward, outside.

Ana. *Extrinsic, extraneous, foreign, alien.

Ant. Internal. — Con. Interior, intestine, *inner, inward, inside: intrinsic, ingrained, *inherent.

externalize. Materialize, actualize, *realize, embody, incarnate, objectify, substantiate, substantialize, hypostatize, reify.

extinguish. *Abolish, annihilate, abate.

Ana. Extirpate, *exterminate, eradicate, uproot, wipe out: obliterate, efface, blot out, expunge, *erase: *suppress, repress.

extirpate. *Exterminate, eradicate, uproot, deracinate, wipe out.

Ana. Extinguish, *abolish, annihilate: obliterate, efface, expunge, *erase, blot out: *destroy, demolish, raze.

Con. Propagate, *generate, engender, breed.

extol. Laud, *praise, eulogize, acclaim.

Ana. Applaud, *commend, compliment: *exalt, magnify, aggrandize.

Ant. Decry: abase (oneself). — Con. Depreciate, disparage, detract from, derogate from, belittle, minimize (see DECRY): denounce, condemn, censure, reprobate, reprehend, *criticize.

extort. Extract, *educe, elicit, evoke.

Ana. Draw, drag, *pull: compel, *force, constrain, oblige, coerce: exact, *demand, require.

extra, adj. Supernumerary, spare, surplus, *superfluous.

extract, v. Extort, elicit, *educe, evoke.

Ana. Draw, *pull, drag: *demand, require, exact: obtain, procure, gain, win, acquire, *get.

extract, n. Extract, excerpt, pericope agree in denoting a passage transcribed or quoted from a book or document. Extract is the general term referring to any such passage regardless of the principle of its selection or its further use; as, extracts for citation are copied by the typists as indicated to them by the readers; he makes many extracts from every book he reads. Excerpt differs from extract in implying careful selection for a definite purpose that is commonly indicated in the context; as, to back up his points by excerpts from the authoritative writers on the subject; excerpts from his letters were entered as evidence. Pericope applies generally to any passage to which attention is specifically called. In its most common use, however, it applies specifically to the passage excerpted from Scriptures to be read in a religious service such as the Mass, or to be used as a text by the preacher; as, the pericope of the day was taken from the Gospel of St. John.

extradite. Deport, transport, expatriate, *banish, exile, ostracize.

Ana. Surrender, *relinquish, yield, resign.

extraneous. *Extrinsic, foreign, alien.

Ana. External, exterior, outside, *outer, outward: adventitious, *accidental, incidental.

Ant. Relevant: essential (sense 1). — Con. Intrinsic, *inherent, ingrained, constitutional: intestine, internal, *inner, inside, interior, inward: pertinent, germane, material (see RELEVANT).

extravagant. Inordinate, immoderate, *excessive, exorbitant, extreme.

Ana. Preposterous, absurd, *foolish, silly: *profuse, prodigal, lavish, exuberant.

Ant. Restrained. — Con. Frugal, *sparing, economical.

extreme, adj. 1 *Last, final, terminal, latest, concluding, eventual, ultimate.

2 Exorbitant, inordinate, *excessive, immoderate, extravagant.

extreme, n. Extreme, extremity come into comparison when they mean the utmost limit or degree of something. Extreme, however, usually applies to either of two limits which are diametrically opposed, or are as far removed from each other as possible; as, a climate where extremes of heat and cold are unknown; "Twixt two extremes of passion, joy and grief" (Shak.); "my tendency is to unite extremes rather than to go between them" (H. Ellis). The term may, however, when used with a verb of motion or one suggesting movement, imply a definite direction and therefore denote the utmost limit or degree in that direction; as, he always goes to an extreme (sometimes, "goes to extremes"); he is always dressed in the extreme of fashion. Extremity, on the other hand, usually implies the utmost removal from that which is reasonable, sane, safe, tolerable, endurable, or the like; as, the extremity of their opinions; "an extremity of caution" (H. G. Wells); an extremity of suffering. Often the term applies concretely to the state or condition of one in extreme pain, grief, anxiety, suffering, poverty, or the like; as, "The queen's in labor. They say, in great extremity" (Shak.); "those...who succour heroic minds in their worst extremities" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Antithesis, antipodes, contrary. See under OPPOSITE, adj.

extremity. *Extreme.

Ana. *Limit, bound, bound, end, confine, term.

extricate, v. Extricate, disentangle, untangle, disencumber, disembarass come into comparison as meaning to free or release from that which binds or holds one back. Extricate, the most widely useful of these words, implies a situation in which a person is (or persons are) so entangled in difficulties, perplexities, or the like, or so restrained from free action or free movements, that great force or ingenuity is required to bring about his (or their) release; as, the fly was not able to extricate itself from the spider's web; to extricate oneself from financial difficulties; his friends succeeded in extricating him from a very awkward predicament; to extricate one's car from the mud into which its wheels had sunk. Disentangle, which is etymologically akin to extricate in meaning, adheres far more closely than the latter word to its literal sense of to free from that which entangles; also, it is used typically of things, rather than of persons, and therefore seldom, if ever, involves the ideas of difficulty or perplexity except for the person who seeks to free the thing entangled or to unravel that which is intricately complicated; as, to disentangle a strand from a twisted skein; "[Seneca] is a dramatist...whom the whole of Europe in the Renaissance delighted to honour. It is obviously a task of some difficulty to disentangle him from his reputation" (T. S. Eliot); "I could not then so far analyse all that is roughly lumped together as 'religion' as to disentangle the essential from the accidental" (H. Ellis). Untangle is sometimes used, especially in colloquial English, in place of disentangle with much the same implications; as, to untangle one's foot from a vine in which it is caught. Disencumber implies a freeing from that which weighs down, clogs, or imposes a very heavy burden; as, "He can call a spade a spade, and knows how to disencumber ideas of their wordy frippery" (G. Eliot); "the trees, laden heavily with their new and humid leaves, were now suffering more damage than during the highest winds of winter, when the boughs are specially disencumbered to do battle with the storm" (Hardy). Disembarass implies a release from that which embarrasses as by impeding, hampering, or hindering; as, before going to the tennis court, she disembarassed herself of her long, clinging dress and put on a loose shirt and shorts; "to disembarass himself of his companion" (Scott); "I have never been able...to disembarass my head of the most wonderful vision that ever took possession of any man's" (Landor).

Ana. Disengage, *detach, abstract: liberate, release, *free: *rescue, deliver.

Con. *Hamper, fetter, trammel, shackle, clog, hog-tie, manacle: impede, obstruct, *hinder, block.

extrinsic. Extrinsic, extraneous, foreign, alien are comparable when they mean external to a thing (sometimes a person), its true nature, or its original character. Extrinsic applies to that which is distinctly outside the thing in question or is derived from something apart from it; thus, a ring may have extrinsic value because of sentimental or historical associations; extrinsic influences, such as chance or the assistance of friends, may help a man to succeed. "[Those] who would persuade us . . . that style is something extrinsic to the subject, a kind of ornamentation laid on" (Quiller-Couch). Extraneous, though often used interchangeably with extrinsic, applies chiefly to that which is introduced from outside and may or may not be capable of becoming an integral part of the thing; as, to advance arguments extraneous to the real issue; water is rarely pure and free from extraneous matter. "Style . . . is not—can never be—extraneous ornament" (Quiller-Couch). "Whatever we gain comprehension of, we seize upon and assimilate into our own being . . . ; that which had been extraneous is become a part of ourselves" (H. B. Alexander). Foreign applies to that which is so different from the thing under consideration that it is either inadmissible because repellent or, if admitted, incapable of becoming identified with it, assimilated by it, or related to it; as, much coal contains foreign matter; inflammation caused by a foreign body in the stomach. "The mysticism so foreign to the French mind and temper" (Brownell). "Look round our World . . . Nothing is foreign: Parts relate to whole . . . ; All serv'd, all servicing: nothing stands alone" (Pope). Alien applies to that which is so foreign that it can never be made an inherent or an integral part of a thing. The word often suggests repugnance or at least incompatibility or irreconcilableness. "A voluptuous devotionality . . . totally alien to the austerity and penetrating sincerity of the Gospel!" (Inge). "He would often adopt certain modes of thought that he knew to be really alien to his nature" (Wilde).

Ana. External, *outer, outside, exterior, outward: acquired, gained, earned (see GET).

Ant. Intrinsic. — Con. Internal, *inner, inside, inward, interior, intestine: *real, actual, true.

exuberant. Lavish, *profuse, prodigal, luxuriant, lush.

face, n. Face, countenance, visage, physiognomy, mug, puss agree in denoting the front part of a human (sometimes animal) head including the mouth, nose, eyes, forehead, and cheeks. Face is the simple and direct word, applicable either to one's own or another's; as, your face is dirty; she struck him in the face; "To feel the fog in my throat, The mist in my face" (Browning); "Was this [Helen of Troy's] the face that launched a thousand ships and burnt the topless towers of Ilium?" (Marlowe). Countenance applies especially to the face as it reveals one's mood, character, changing emotions, or the like, to others; as, a benign countenance; "his face was not the cheerful countenance of yesterday" (Cather); his countenance changed when he heard the news; "Something feminine—not effeminate, mind—is discoverable in the countenances of all men of genius" (Coleridge). In the phrases "to keep in countenance" (that is, to maintain one's composure) and "to put out of countenance" (that is, to lose one's composure or cause one to lose it) the term denotes the facial expression as it appears normally when one is composed. Sometimes the word is used in place of face when a formal term is desired; as, "That vile representation of the royal countenance" (Swift). Both face and countenance may be used in personifications when the outward aspect or appearance of anything is denoted; as, "startling transformations in the outward face of society are taking place under our very eyes" (Frankfurter); "Beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies" (Milton). Visage is a more literary term than the preceding words; it often suggests attention to the shape and proportions of the face, but sometimes to the impression it gives or the changes in mood which it reflects; as, "black hair; complexion dark; generally, rather handsome visage" (Dickens); "his visage all agrin as at a wake" (Tennyson). Physiognomy is the preferred word when the reference is to the contours of the face, the shape of the features, and the characteristic expression as indicative of race, character, temperament, or the like; as, he has the physiognomy of a Pole, of an ascetic; "Nor is there in the physiognomy of the people the slightest indication of the Gaul" (Landor). Figuratively, the term is applicable to the significant or sharply defined aspect of things; as, "[it] is not exactly one of those styles which have a physiognomy . . . which stamp an indelible impression of him [their author] on the reader's mind" (Arnold); "the changing yet abiding physiognomy of earth and sky" (Lowes). Mug, although it dates from around 1800 and is used humorously by many good writers, is still regarded as slang; usually, but not invariably, it carries a suggestion of an ugly, but not necessarily displeasing, physiognomy; as, "I found

A. Tennyson in chambers at Lincoln's Inn: and recreated myself with a sight of his fine old mug" (E. Fitzgerald); "Among all the ugly mugs of the world we see now and then a face made after the divine pattern" (L. P. Smith). Puss, a term of Irish origin, and now slang (as, she has a sour puss; slap him in the puss) or dialectal, sometimes denotes a facial expression such as of anger or pouting; as, "Wipe that puss off your face" (American Mercury); but it more often denotes the physiognomy; as, "it had the head of a bear, the very head and puss of a bear" (Lady Gregory).

Ant. Foul: ill-favored.

2 Fair, just, equitable, impartial, unbiased, dispassionate, uncolored, objective come into comparison when they are applied to judgments or to judges or to acts resulting from or involving a judgment and mean free from undue or improper influence. Fair, the most general term, implies the disposition or the intention to regard other persons or things without reference to one's own interests, feelings, or prejudices, often even to the point of conceding every reasonable claim of the weaker side or of giving oneself or the stronger side no undue advantage; as, a fair distribution of one's estate; a fair decision; fair play. "When we consider how helpless a partridge is... it does seem fairer that the gunner should have but one chance at the bird" (Jefferies). "I am being fair to both sides... I don't feel I can quite condemn it [socialism] wholesale" (R. Macaulay). Just implies no divergence from the standard or measure of that which has been determined or is accepted as right, true, lawful, or the like, and dealings that are exactly in accordance with those determinations, no matter what one's personal inclinations or interests may be or what considerations in favor of the person or thing judged may be adduced; as, a just judge; "every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence" (Hebrews ii. 2). "Some juster prince perhaps had... safe restored me to my native land" (Pope). "How much easier it is to be generous than just" (Junius). "To divert interest from the poet to the poetry... would conduce to a juster estimation of actual poetry, good and bad" (T. S. Eliot). Equitable implies a freer and less rigid standard than just, often, but not invariably, that which guides a court of equity as distinguished from a court of law and which provides relief where rigid adherence to the law would make for unfairness (as, he has an equitable claim to the property); more often, however, it implies fair and equal treatment of all concerned; as, "a form of society which will provide for an equitable distribution of... riches" (J. W. Krutch); "it depended wholly on their [the Roman governors'] individual characters whether their terms of office were equitable or oppressive" (Buchan). Impartial implies absence of favor for, or absence of prejudice against, one person, party, or side, more than the other; as, an impartial tribunal, judgment, summing up of evidence. Unbiased expresses even more strongly the absence of all prejudice or prepossession, and a disposition to be fair to all; as, an unbiased history; to give an unbiased opinion or testimony. Dispassionate implies freedom from the influence of passion or strong feeling, often also implying great temperateness or even coldness in judgment; as, a dispassionate judgment, inquiry, critic, observer. Uncolored (see also COLORLESS) implies freedom from all influences that would affect the truth or accuracy of an account, a statement, or a judgment, such as personal feeling, a desire to embellish, or the like; as, an uncolored story of a battle; an uncolored record of one's experiences; a statement of facts, uncolored by personal prejudice. Objective implies a tendency to view events or phenomena as apart from oneself and therefore to be judged as they are (or were) in fact and without reference to one's personal feelings, prejudices, opinions, or the like; as, "Nor must we be content with a lazy scepticism, which regards objective truth as unattainable" (B. Russell); "Even so far stand the great... objective writers above all who appeal to you by parade of personality or private sentiment" (Quiller-Couch); "The simplicity and practical cast of his [Xenophon's] mind made him a good objective reporter of the Socratic conversations" (J. R. Smith).

Ana. Disinterested, detached (see INDIFFERENT): reasonable, *rational.

Ant. Unfair. — Con. Partial, prepossessed, biased, prejudiced (see corresponding nouns at PREDILECTION).

Con. *Good, right: *bad, poor, wrong.

fair, n. Exposition, *exhibition, show, exhibit.

fairing. Gratuity, largess, *gift, present, favor, boon.

fairy. Fairy, faery, fay, elf, sprite, pixy (or pixie), gnome, dwarf, goblin, brownie (or brownny), puck, nix (or, in feminine form, nixie), shue, leprechaun, banshee come into comparison as denoting a legendary supernatural being, chiefly in medieval and modern folklore, capable of assuming a human form and of entering into relations with men for their weal or woe. Fairy is the general term for one of this class, but with many writers the term implies a specific kind of being. In its concrete sense, fairy applies mainly to either of two types: one who assumes the form of a marvelously beautiful woman and lures men to her abode where they are held enchanted and unable to return to earth; the other who is sometimes masculine but more often feminine, who is extremely diminutive in size, and who, usually, is a creature of lightness and grace possessing magical powers. By some writers the former is distinguished as the Celtic, the latter as the Teutonic, fairy but this classification often breaks down owing to the variety of conceptions that prevail and their intermingling. Also, Shakespeare and Charles Perrault, a Frenchman, are often given credit for the second and more common conception of a fairy. Under the influence of the Faerie Queene, the spelling faery has come to connote existence in an unreal, romantic, and visionary world such as one associates with Spenser's poem or with the so-called Celtic fairy; as, "O blessed Bird! the earth we pace Again appears to be An unsubstantial, faery place; That is fit home for Thee!" (Wordsworth); "Magic casements, opening on the foam Of perilous seas, in faery [changed by Keats from an original fairy] lands forlorn" (Keats). Fay, a more or less poetic term for fairy, often, but far from invariably, suggests reference to the diminutive fairy; as, "fays shall haunt the green" (Collins). Elf is historically the correct term in English for the so-called Teutonic fairy; the term also carries a stronger implication than fairy of sportiveness, of helpfulness or harmfulness (often malicious, but still more often mischievous), of soullessness, and of eeriness in the places which they haunt or inhabit; as, "Ye tiny elves that guiltless sport" (Burns); "The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!" (Tennyson). Sprite is used as an equivalent of elf when its ethereal quality or its soullessness is especially to be suggested; as, a mischievous sprite; "that shrewd and knavish sprite Call'd Robin Goodfellow" (Shak.); "she was a sprite rather than a human spirit, fastidiousness with her took the place of morality" (H. Ellis). Pixy, originally a dialectal term for fairy or elf, especially in southwestern England, retains in its extended use its early implications of a being that delights in misleading or annoying human beings or is extremely sportive or gay; thus, a person who fell into a state of mental bewilderment was said to be pixy-led; a pixy ring (now commonly called a fairy ring) is a circular fungus growth in a lawn or meadow where pixies are supposed to dance in the moonlight. Gnome and dwarf designate a sprite (usually conceived of as masculine, misshapen, and extremely ugly) who dwells below the surface of the earth and has guard of metals and minerals or is a skilled artificer of weapons and the like. When his power to terrify or injure men is emphasized he is sometimes called a goblin; when he is thought of as man's helper who performs in secrecy at night heavy work, such as churning, threshing, and sweeping, he is often called a brownie; when both mischievous and helpful characteristics are implied, pucc is often employed, but in nearly every case goblin, brownie, and pucc carry few of the very specific implications usually found in gnome or dwarf; as, "Swift on his sooty pinions flits the gnome" (Pope); Snow White took refuge with kindly dwarfs; "the Gobble-uns'll [the goblins will] git you Ef you don't watch out" (J. W. Riley); "The Brownie formed a class of beings, distinct in habit and disposition from the freakish and mischievous elves" (Scott); "As I am an honest Pucc . . . We will make amends ere long" (Shak.). Nix (or, feminine, nixie) designates a water sprite similar to a merman or mermaid; as, "If a pixie, seek thy ring; If a nixie, seek thy spring" (Scott). Shue and leprechaun are in Celtic folklore the equivalents respectively of fairy and of gnome, but shue often carries stronger implication of rare appearance to the human sight than fairy, and leprechaun one of greater elusiveness and trickery than gnome. Banshee applies to a female shue who is heard keening or wailing near a house, as a warning of an approaching death in the family.

faith. 1 *Belief, credence, credit.

Ana. Assurance, conviction, *certainty, certitude: assenting or assent, acquiescence, agreement (see corresponding verbs at ASSENT).

Ant. Doubt. — Con. *Uncertainty, skepticism, dubiety, dubiousity: *unbelief, disbelief, incredulity.

2 Dependence, reliance, confidence, *trust.

Ana. Assurance, certitude (see CERTAINTY).

Con. Incredulity, *unbelief, disbelief: mistrust, suspicion, *uncertainty, doubt: misgiving, *apprehension.

3 Creed, *religion, persuasion, church, denomination, sect, cult, communion.

Ana. Tenets, dogmas, doctrines (see singular nouns at DOCTRINE).

faithful, adj. Faithful, loyal, leal, true, constant, staunch (or staunch), steadfast (or stedfast), resolute come into comparison as meaning firm in adherence to the person, the country, the cause, or the like, to whom or to which one is bound by duty or promise. Faithful in its now most common sense implies firm and unwavering adherence to a person or thing to whom or to which one is united by some tie such as marriage, friendship, political allegiance, gratitude, or honor, or to the oath, pledge, promise, or the like made when one has accepted a position, an office, an obligation, or the like; as, a faithful husband is faithful to his marriage vows; a faithful public servant is faithful to his oath of office. "[Cleopatra] was faithful to the main policy of her life, the restoration of Egypt to the position which it had held under the first Ptolemies" (Buchan). The term is also used when only firm adherence to actuality or reality as in representation or portrayal is implied: it then comes close to accurate or exact in meaning; as, the photograph is a faithful likeness; a faithful description of village life. Loyal implies faithfulness to one's plighted troth or continued allegiance to the leader, the country, the institution, the principles, or the like, to which one feels oneself morally bound: the term suggests not only adherence but an unwillingness to be tempted from that adherence; as, most of the subjects remained loyal to their sovereign; "Your wife, my lord; your true And loyal wife" (Shak.); "We [French Canadians] are loyal because we are free" (Laurier); "I've been loyal to Arch Gunnard for a long time now," Lonnie said, "I'd hate to haul off and leave him like that" (Erskine Caldwell). Leal, a much older word in English than loyal, has been practically displaced by the latter term except in poetic and in Scottish use. Nevertheless, the word has a value of its own which is not quite that of loyal, but nearer to that of true (or sometimes to tried and true). In the sense in which true is here considered (see also REAL), there is a strong implication of steadiness in one's allegiance, devotion, fidelity, or the like, which suggests utter dependability and no fear of a change. These connotations are also strong in leal; as, "I'm wearin' awa' To the land o' the leal [i.e., Heaven]" (C. Nairne); "Honest Allan Cunningham... a leal and true Scotsman" (Scott); "Thou, Scotland's son, that would'at be leal and true" (Blackie). Constant also stresses firmness or steadiness in attachment, devotion, or the like, but it carries a weaker implication of strict adherence to one's vows, pledges, obligations, and the like. Consequently, it often implies a state of mind that is the opposite of fickleness rather than a course of action that is the opposite of unfaithfulness and disloyalty. "Even Rochester, utterly bad and ignoble, was not only a poet and a wit but a loyal husband (constant if not faithful)" (A. Repplier). "I never knew a pair of lovers More constant than those two" (Millay). Staunch carries far more strongly than loyal an implication of one's unwillingness to be turned aside from those to whom one owes allegiance, to whom one has pledged one's troth, or to an institution, such as a church or political party, to which by conviction one belongs. From its earliest and still current sense of watertight and sound, as applied to a ship, it suggests an inherent imperviousness to all suggestions or influences that would weaken one's loyalty or steadiness in faith; as, a staunch believer; a staunch Republican; a staunch adherent of the Stuarts; "staunch fidelity to law and order" (C. E. Montague). "He was staunch, however, to church and king" (Irving). "You, who from a girl have had a strong mind and a staunch heart" (Dickens). Steadfast so stresses unwavering or unswerving adherence that the term is applicable not only to persons but to things that maintain a steady course or an unchanging quality or character (as, "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast"—Hebrews vi. 19; "the blue, the steadfast, the blazing summer sky"—V. Woolf). However, its most usual application is to persons or their attachments (as, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable"—1 Corinthians xv. 58; "If love... survives through all sorrow, and remains steadfast with us through all changes"—Thackeray; "Narrow of vision but stead- fast to principles"—A. Repplier). Resolute implies steadfastness and, often, stanchness, but it throws the emphasis upon a determination which cannot be broken down, and often suggests firm adherence to one's own purposes or ends rather than to those of others; as, "not... resolute and firm, but perverse and obstinate" (Burke); "she sat there resolute and ready for responsibility" (Conrad). "The resolute abstinence [of Chinese and Japanese painters] from cast shadows, as a method of giving relief, is partly to be explained by the desire not to be seduced into mere imitative resemblance" (Bin-yon).

Ana. Devoted, *loving, affectionate: tried, trustworthy, *reliable, dependable.

Ant. Faithless. — Con. Disloyal, false, perfidious, traitorous, treacherous (see FAITHLESS): fickle, *inconstant, unstable.

faithless. Faithless, false, disloyal, traitorous, treacherous, perfidious agree in meaning untrue to a person or institution that has a right to expect one's fidelity or allegiance. Faithless applies to any person, utterance, or act that in any degree implies a breach of a vow, a pledge, a sworn obligation, allegiance, or the like. Although often used interchangeably with the strongest of the terms here discriminated, then implying a betrayal of a person or cause, it is also capable of implying untrustworthiness, unreliability, or loss or neglect of an opportunity to prove one's devotion or faith; as, "And hopeless, comfortless, I'll mourn A faithless woman's broken vow" (Burns); "Faithless alike in friendship and in love" (Cowper); "The remnant... Have been abandoned by their faithless allies" (Shelley). False, as here considered, differs from faithless in its greater emphasis upon a failure to be true, or constant in one's devotion or adherence, to someone or something which has a claim upon one than upon a breach of a vow, pledge, sworn obligation, or the like: however, it may, like faithless, carry varying connotations with respect to the gravity or heinousness of that failure; as, a false friend; "Never was Plantagenet False of his word" (Marlowe); "we hope that we can give a reason for the faith that is in us without being false to the strictest obligations of intellectual honesty" (Inge); "the conception of a lordly splendid destiny for the human race, to which we are false when we revert to wars and other atavistic follies" (B. Russell). Disloyal implies lack of faithfulness in thought, in words, or in actions, to one's friend, superior, sovereign, party, country, or the like; as, to be disloyal to one's school; a disloyal subject. "Good party people think such open-mindedness disloyal; but in politics there should be no loyalty except to the public good" (Shaw). Traitorous implies either actual treason or a serious betrayal of trust or confidence; as, a traitorous general; a traitorous act; a traitorous breach of confidence. Treacherous is of wider application than traitorous: as used of persons it implies readiness, or a disposition, to betray trust or confidence (as, a treacherous spy; a treacherous friend): as used of things it suggests aptness to allure to peril or disaster by false or delusive appearances; as, treacherous sands; "the treacherous Ocean" (Shelley); "Up steep crags, and over treacherous morasses, he moved... easily" (Macaulay). Perfidious (which etymologically implies the reverse of faithful) is a more contemptuous term than treacherous for it implies baseness or villainy as well as an incapacity for faithfulness in the person concerned; as, a perfidious violation of a treaty; perfidious dealings. "Spain... to lavish her resources and her blood in furtherance of the designs of a perfidious ally" (Southey).

Ana. *Inconstant, unstable, fickle, capricious: wavering.

A colon (:): groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

fluctuating (see SWING, v.): *changeable, changeful.
Ant. Faithful. — Con. Loyal, leal, true, staunch, steadfast, resolute, constant (see FAITHFUL).

fake, n. Sham, humbug, counterfeit, simulacrum, *imposture, cheat, fraud, deceit, deception.

faker. *Impostor, mountebank, charlatan, empiric, quack.

Ana. Defrauder, cheater or cheat, swindler, cozenor (see corresponding verbs at CHEAT).

fallacious. Sophistical, casuistical, paralogistic. See under FALLACY.

Ana. *Irrational, unreasonable: *misleading, deceptive, delusive, delusory: equivocal, ambiguous (see OBSCURE).

Ant. Sound, valid.

fallacy. Fallacy, sophism, sophistry, casuistry, paralogism are here compared as meaning unsound and misleading reasoning or line of argument. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are distinguishable in the corresponding adjectives fallacious, sophistical, casuistical, paralogistic. Fallacy and fallacious, in specific logical use, imply an error or flaw in reasoning that vitiates an entire argument; thus, a syllogism in which one argues from some accidental character as though it were essential and necessary [as, The food you buy, you eat; you buy raw meat; therefore you eat raw meat] contains a fallacy or is fallacious. "The many fallacies that lurk in the generality and equivocal nature of the terms 'inadequate representation'" (Burke). In more general use, fallacy and fallacious apply to any conception, belief, theory, or the like, that is erroneous and logically untenable, whether it has been arrived at by reasoning or by conjecture, or has been taken over from others; as, "The arguments of the Federalist are intended to prove the fallacy of these apprehensions" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "the separatist fallacy, the belief that what may be good for any must be good for all" (J. A. Hobson); "like a well-wrought but fallacious theory" (S. Alexander). Sophism and sophistry and sophistical imply, as fallacy and fallacious do not necessarily imply, either the intent to mislead or deceive by fallacious arguments, or indifference to the correctness of one's reasoning provided one's words carry conviction; the terms, therefore, often connote confusingly subtle, equivocal, or specious reasoning. Sophism, however, applies usually to a specific argument of this character, sophistry often, but far from invariably, to the type of reasoning employing sophisms; as, "skilled to plead, with a superficial but plausible set of sophisms, in favour of . . . contempt of virtue" (Shelley); "the juggle of sophistry" (Coleridge); "This evil is . . . inexcusable by any sophistry that the cleverest landlord can devise" (Shaw); "in the end he [Hobbes in his theory of the will] lands himself in sophistries" (T. S. Eliot); "Rousseau does not often indulge in such an unblushing sophism" (Babbitt); "the sophistical plea that matter is more important than manner" (C. E. Montague). Casuistry and casuistical imply sophistry only in their extended and now more common senses. In their earlier (and still current) senses both have reference to the science that deals with cases of conscience, or the determination of what is right and wrong in particular cases where there is justifiable uncertainty; as, "we now have to lay the foundation of a new casuistry, no longer theological and Christian, but naturalistic and scientific" (H. Ellis). In their extended use, both terms now usually imply sophistical and often tortuous reasoning in reference to moral, theological, and legal problems; as, "Those who hold that a lie is always wrong have to supplement this view by a great deal of casuistry" (B. Russell); casuistical hairsplitting. Paralogism and paralogistic are technical terms of logic, applicable chiefly to any formal fallacy especially in syllogistic reasoning; as, "He is here guilty of a gross paralogism" (Hume); "We made no appeal even to Theism: which it would . . . have been grossly paralogistic to do, since we are maintaining Freewill as a premise towards the establishment of Theism" (W. G. Ward).

false, adj. 1 False, wrong are here compared as general terms meaning not in conformity with that which is true or right. False, in all of its senses, is colored by its etymological implication of deceit: the implication of deceiving or of being deceived is strong when the term implies a contrariety between what is said, thought, concluded, or the like, and the facts or reality; as, false statements; "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour" (Exodus xx. 16); "whether it [a poet's awareness of the process of poetic creation] is a genuine insight into the workings of his own mind or only a false explanation of them" (Day Lewis); "You can take a chess-board as black squares on a white ground, or as white squares on a black ground, and neither conception is a false one" (W. James). An intent to deceive or a deceptive appearance is implied when the term connotes an opposition to that which is real or genuine or authentic; as, false tears; false pearls; a false check; dressed in false colors; a false arch (i.e., an architectural member which simulates an arch in appearance but does not have the structure or serve the function of a true arch). The term is applied in vernacular names of plants to a species related to, resembling, or having properties similar to another species that commonly bears the unqualified vernacular; as, the pinkster flower is sometimes called false honeysuckle. Even when the word stresses faithlessness (for this sense see FAITHLESS) there is usually a hint of a deceptive appearance of faithfulness or loyalty or of self-deception in one's failure to be true; as, so far as outward appearances went, one could not believe him to be a false friend. Only in the sense of incorrect or erroneous (as, a false note; a false policy) is this implication obscured, though there is often a suggestion of being deceived into believing that the thing so described is true or right. Wrong, on the other hand, is colored in all of its senses by its etymological implication of wryness or crookedness: in general, it implies a turning from the standard of that which is true, right (especially morally right), correct, or the like, to that which is its reverse. In comparison with false, wrong is simple and forthright in its meaning; thus, a wrong conception is one that is the reverse of the truth but a false conception is not only wrong but the result of one's being deceived or of one's intent to deceive; a wrong answer to a question is merely an erroneous answer but a false answer to a question is one that is both erroneous and mendacious; wrong principles of conduct are the reverse of ethically right principles but false principles of conduct are not only wrong but are bound to lead astray those who accept them; so, to give a person wrong advice (cf. false advice); a lie is always wrong (not false, because the implication of falsity is in the word "lie"); there is something wrong about his appearance (but, there is something false in his courtesy); he may be wrong in his opinions, but he is not false to his country in trying to impress them upon others.

Ana. *Misleading, deceptive, delusive, delusory: fallacious, sophistical (see under FALLACY); mendacious, deceitful, *dishonest, untruthful: factitious (see ARTIFICIAL).

Ant. True. — Con. *Real, actual: veritable, *authentic, genuine, bona fide: veracious, truthful (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH).

Ana. Flinch, blench, *recoil, quail, shrink: fluctuate, oscillate, *swing: *shake, tremble, quake, shudder.

Con. *Persevere, persist: resolve, determine, *decide.

fame, n. Fame, renown, honor (or honour), glory, celebrity, reputation, repute, notoriety, éclat come into comparison when they mean the character or state of being widely known by name for one's deeds, and often, one's achievements. Fame is the most inclusive and, in some ways, the least explicit of these terms, for it may be used in place of any of the others, but it gives no clear suggestion of how far the knowledge of one's name extends, of the reasons for it, or of the creditableness of those reasons: although the term often implies longevity, and usually implies a cause or causes to one's credit, it does not invariably carry these favorable implications; as, to acquire some fame for his inventions; his fame was short-lived; "Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise ... To scorn delights and live laborious days" (Milton); "Fame ... that second life in others' breath" (Pope); "Popularity is neither fame nor greatness" (Hadzitt); "Fame is the thirst of youth" (Byron). Renown implies widespread fame and widespread acclamation for great achievements as in war, in government, in science, in art, or the like; as, "Those other two equalled with me in fate, So were I equalled with them in renown" (Milton); "Niten's paintings are prized, but it is as a swordsman that he won supreme renown" (Binyon). Honor (as here compared: see also HONOR, 2; HONESTY) implies a measure of fame, as in a section, a country, a continent, or the civilized world, but it also invariably implies that the knowledge of one's achievements has earned for one profound esteem or deep reverence; as, "Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honor" (Proverbs iii. 16); "one must learn to give honour where honour is due, to bow down ... before all spirits that are noble" (A. C. Benson). Glory usually suggests renown, but always it implies a position where attention is fixed on one's brilliancy of achievement and the accompaniment of enthusiastic praise or of high honor; as, "The paths of glory lead but to the grave" (Gray); "To be recognized ... as a master ... in one's own line of intellectual or spiritual activity, is indeed glory" (Arnold). "No keener hunter after glory breathes. He loves it in his knights more than himself; They prove to him his work" (Tennyson). Celebrity is often used in place of fame when the widespread laudation of one's name and accomplishments in one's own time is implied: the term usually carries a stronger implication of famousness and of popularity than it does of deep-seated or long-lived admiration and esteem. "The lonely precursor of German philosophy, he [Spinoza] still shines when the light of his successors is fading away; they had celebrity, Spinoza has fame" (Arnold). Reputation often denotes nothing more than the character of a person or place, not as it really is, but as it is conceived to be by those who know of him or of it (as, he has a good reputation in the community; it is a shame to injure a man's reputation), but in the sense in which it is here particularly considered, the term implies a measure of fame, often, but not necessarily for creditable reasons; as, his repu- tation for wit was country-wide; a painter of growing reputation; "The purest treasure mortal times afford Is spotless reputation" (Shak.). Repute is sometimes used interchangeably with reputation in either sense; as, "only a general of repute could get recruits" (Buchan). More often, however, repute suggests a relation that is closer to honor than to fame, and denotes rather the degree of esteem accorded to a person or thing than the measure of fame it acquires; as, the book has no little repute among the best critics; his work is held in high repute; he won a great deal of repute (not reputation) for his bravery. Notoriety implies nothing more than public knowledge of a person or deed with the result that it is much discussed or serves as a nine-day wonder: it usually, however, suggests a meretricious fame, and imputes sensationalism to the person or thing that wins such repute; as, he achieved notoriety as the author of a most salacious novel; "Everybody of any consequence or notoriety in Bath was well known by name to Mrs. Smith" (Austen); "that brilliant, extravagant, careless Reverend Doctor Dodd who acquired some fame and much notoriety as an eloquent preacher, the skilful editor of the Beauties of Shakespeare ... and a forger" (H. Ellis). Éclat, a French word meaning explosion, now naturalized in English, is used in place of renown or of notoriety. To either idea is added the connotation of great brilliancy or display but when the basic meaning is renown, illustriousness is especially suggested (as, "Consider what lustre and éclat it will give you ... to be the best scholar, of a gentleman, in England"—Chesterfield), and when it is notoriety, flashiness or ostentation is usually implied (as, "his success in such a pursuit would give a ridiculous éclat to the whole affair"—Scott).

Ana. Acclaim, acclamation, *applause: recognizing or recognition, acknowledgment (see corresponding verbs at ACKNOWLEDGE): eminence, distinction, illustriousness (see corresponding adjectives at FAMOUS).

Ant. Infamy: obscurity. — Con. Ignominy, obloquy, *disgrace, dishonor, odium, opprobrium, disrepute, shame.

famed. *Famous, renowned, noted, celebrated, notorious, distinguished, eminent, illustrious.

Ant. Obscure.

familiar. 1 Familiar, intimate, close, confidential, chummy, thick are here compared as meaning near to one another because of constant or frequent association, shared interests and activities, or common sympathies, or, when applied to words, acts, etc., indicative of such nearness. Familiar suggests relations or manifestations characteristic of or similar to those of a family, where long-continued intercourse makes for freedom, informality, ease of address, and the taking of liberties; consequently familiar may apply to the relations, words, acts, etc., of persons actually in such a situation, and to the attitude, style of speaking or writing, etc., of persons who assume the freedom and ease of address of those who are; as, he was familiar with only a few of his classmates, but these were undoubtedly the most gifted men in his class; familiar essays: "Time and intercourse have made us familiar" (S. Johnson); "[Goldsmith's style] so equable, so easy without being unduly familiar" (J. R. Lowell); "The familiar, if not rude, tone in which people addressed her" (N. Hawthorne); "She was a fearless and familiar little thing, who asked disconcerting questions" (E. Wharton). Intimate suggests relations characteristic of those who are in close contact with one another as through ties of blood, of friendship, or of common interests or aspirations, and who have opened their hearts or their minds to such a degree that they deeply know and understand one another; as, "The intimate political relation subsisting between the President of the United States and the heads of departments, necessarily renders any legal investigation of the acts of one of those high officers peculiarly... delicate" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "They establish and maintain... more intimate and confiding relations with us" (J. R. Lowell); "though Farfrae must have so far forgiven him as to have no objection to... him as a father-in-law, intimate they could never be" (Hardy). Intimate may also apply to a connection between a person and a thing, especially something he says, does, wears, or the like: it then implies a very close relation between that thing and his inmost thoughts or feelings or his life in the privacy of his home; as, official receptions were few, but small, intimate teas were frequent in the governor's home; "the indecency of publishing intimate letters... [such as] the love-letters of the Brownings" (H. Ellis); "her eyes, lively, laughing, intimate, nearly always a little mocking" (Cather); "a shirt-sleeved populace moved through them [the streets] with the intimate abandon of boarders going down the passage to the bathroom" (E. Wharton). As applied directly or indirectly to knowledge, intimate differs from familiar not only in idiom but also in implying not merely acquaintance but close or deep study; thus, he has an intimate knowledge of the situation; he is familiar with the facts pertaining to the situation; he is familiar with the poem in question; he has an intimate knowledge of the poem in question. Close is often used in place of intimate when one wishes to imply an attachment drawing persons together in such a way as to suggest the exclusion of others or a very strong bond of affection between them; as, close friends; a close friendship; "Seeing them so tender and so close" (Tennyson). Confidential implies a relationship based upon mutual trust or confidence or upon a willingness (often, but not necessarily, a mutual willingness) to confide one's hopes, thoughts, feelings, and the like, to the other; as, "The growing harmony and confidential friendship which daily manifest themselves between their Majesties" (Chatham); "he slipped his arm through his father's with a confidential pressure" (E. Wharton). Chummy and thick are both colloquial terms with a somewhat vulgar flavor. The former implies a kind of easy intimacy that prevails between chums (see chum under ASSOCIATE); as, the two boys were not long in camp before they became chummy. Thick differs from close in stressing constant association more than the strength of the attachment: the word may imply both (as, the two friends are now as thick as thieves), but often it carries a sinister suggestion; as, "how long have you been so thick with Dunsey that you must colloque with him to embezzle my money?" (G. Eliot).

Ana. Friendly, neighborly, *amicable; sociable, cordial, genial, affable, *gracious; easy, *comfortable, cozy, snug; intrusive, obtrusive, officious, *impertinent.

Ant. Aloof. — Con. *Indifferent, detached, unconcerned, incurious; formal, conventional, ceremonious, *ceremonial.

2 Ordinary, *common, popular, vulgar.

Ana. *Usual, wonted, accustomed, customary, habitual.

Ant. Unfamiliar: strange. — Con. Novel, newfangled, new-fashioned, *new: rare, uncommon, *infrequent: fantastic, chimerical (see IMAGINARY).

familiarize. Accustom, *habituate, addict.

Ana. Inure, season, acclimatize, acclimate, *harden: *adapt, accommodate, adjust.

Con. Wean, alienate, *estrangle.

famous. Famous, famed, renowned, celebrated, noted, notorious, distinguished, eminent, illustrious come into comparison as meaning known far and wide among men.

Famous and famed apply chiefly to men, events, and things that are much talked of or are widely or popularly known throughout a section, a country, a continent, or the like; in current English, they (especially famous) also imply good repute or a favorable reputation. Among discriminating writers and speakers these terms are applied without qualification only to those persons or things who are still so known or who were so known in the time under consideration; as, the once famous poems of Owen Meredith; he is the famous American aviator. "Some of our most famous physicians have had to struggle pitifully against insufficient means until they were forty or fifty" (Shaw). "Among the romanticists... Schleiermacher was the most famous theologian" (Inge). "A corpulent, jolly fellow, famed for humor" (N. Hawthorne). Renowned, in strict use, implies more glory or honor and more widespread acclamation than either of the preceding words; it is, however, often employed as a stronger or more emphatic term than famous with little actual difference in meaning, except for a suggestion of greater longevity of fame. "Royal kings... Renowned for their deeds... For Christian service and true chivalry" (Shak.). "Those far-renowned brides of ancient song" (Tennyson). Celebrated stresses reception of popular or public notice or attention and frequent mention, especially in print; often, but far from always, it also suggests public admiration or popular honor; as, the celebrated kidnapping of Charley Ross; the most celebrated of the cases pending before the Supreme Court; Benjamin Franklin's celebrated kite; the greatest, but the least celebrated, general in the war. Noted also implies the reception of public attention, but it often suggests more discernment or discrimination on the part of the public than does celebrated or imputes more distinction to the person or thing that is singled out for such attention. "He is the most noted, and most deserving man, in the whole profession of chirurgery" (Pope). "His two children were both daughters, one noted for her prettiness, the other for her cleverness" (H. Ellis). Notorious stresses the fact of being widely known or recognized for certain acts, certain conditions, or certain qualities; now it commonly, but not exclusively, imputes evil to those acts, conditions, or qualities, or qualifies words or phrases that denote an evil or bad person, act, quality, or the like; as, "the city's most notorious malefactor" (Lucas); "men of notoriously loose lives" (R. Macaulay); "his fine library was notorious" (Bennett). "The inconsistencies of Herbert Spencer's Agnosticism are by this time notorious" (Inge). "The courage and efficiency of Spartan troops were notorious" (G. L. Dickinson). Distinguished stresses the facts of being differentiated from all other persons or things of its kind because of his or its excellence or superiority, and of being widely and publicly recognized for these qualities; as, "[Henry Adams's] Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres is one of the most distinguished contributions to literature... America thus far has produced" (R. A. Cram); "meetings with distinguished and interesting people" (H. Ellis); "She had the most distinguished house in New York" (E. Wharton). Eminent adds to distinguished an implication of even greater conspicuousness for excellence or other outstanding qualities; it is applicable therefore chiefly to those persons or things that are recognized as topping all others of their kind; as, the age produced no eminent writers; "many eminent men of science have been bad mathematicians" (B. Russell). "Eminent manifestations of this magical power of poetry are very rare and very precious" (Arnold). Illustrious carries a far stronger implication of renown than eminent; it also imputes to the thing so described a gloriousness or splendor that increases its prestige or influence; as, the illustrious deeds of great heroes; "his right noble mind, illustrious virtue" (Shak.); "Boast the pure blood of an illustrious race" (Pope).

Ant. Obscure.

fan, n. Devotee, votary, *addict, habitué, fiend.

fanatic, n. Bigot, *enthusiast, zealot.

fanciful. *Imaginary, visionary, fantastic, chimerical, quixotic.

Ana. *Fictitious, fabulous, mythical, apocryphal, legendary: bizarre, grotesque, *fantastic: preposterous, absurd (see FOOLISH): *false, wrong.

Ant. Realistic. — Con. Matter-of-fact, *prosaic: truthful, veracious (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH).

fancy, n. 1 *Imagination, fantasy, phantasy.

Ant. Experience.

2 Fancy, fantasy, phantasy, phantasm, vision, dream, daydream, nightmare come into comparison when they denote a vivid idea or image, or a series of such ideas or images, present in the mind but having no concrete or objective reality. Fancy (see also IMAGINATION) is applicable to anything which is conceived by the imagination, whether it recombines the elements of reality or is pure invention. "Let us sit quiet, and hear the echoes about which you have your theory." "Not a theory; it was a fancy." (Dickens). "Surely this great Chamber . . . did not exist at all but as a gigantic fancy of his own" (Galsworthy). Fantasy applies to a fancy (often to an organized series of fancies presented in writing, painting, or other form of art) that is the product of an unrestrained, and often unlicensed, imagination having no ties with actuality; as, Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" is a pure fantasy. "A thousand fantasies Begin to throng into my memory, Of calling shapes, and beckoning shadows dire, And airy tongues that syllable men's names" (Milton). Phantasy, though often used (especially in the past) in place of fantasy, both as the power of free inventive imagination and as a product of that power, now in very precise use, is preferred in the psychological sense of the image-making power in general (whether the image is the result of sense perception or of the imagination) or of a product of that power. "It [the writing of love poems by the impotent and of sagas of the chase and war by the physically deficient] is the well-attested psychological law of compensation in phantasy" (Day Lewis); the phantasies created by the reading of Kubla Khan. Phantasm may be applied either to a phantasy, the mental image (as, "Figures . . . of which the description had produced in you no phantasm" — Jer. Taylor), or to a fantasy, especially to one that is hallucinatory; as, the phantasms of a disordered mind. Vision often implies an imagining but it as frequently implies a seeing or a revelation. Specifically, however, the term is applied to that which the mind sees clearly or concretely, as if revealed to it by a supernatural or mysterious power (see REVELATION), or as if by a kind of spiritual sight or intuition, or as if seen in a dream, and therefore often suggests a sight of something that is actually spiritual in essence or is beyond the range or power of the eyes (or mind) to grasp as a whole; as, "A whole life . . . devoted to the patient pursuit of a single vision seen in youth" (C. W. Eliot); "She tried to dismiss the vision" (Hardy); "Each word's . . . power of touching springs in the mind and of initiating visions" (C. E. Montague); "He [Rousseau] then asserts [his conception] to be a true vision of the life of primitive man" (Babbitt). Dream is the general term for the ideas or images present to the mind in sleep; as, "Thus have I had thee, as a dream doth flatter, In sleep a king, but waking no such matter" (Shak.); "Your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions" (Joel ii. 28). Figuratively, dream (then often specifically called a daydream) suggests vague or idle, commonly happy, imaginings of future events or of nonexistent things; as, "childhood's sunny dream" (Shelley); "The chymist's golden dream" (Cowper); "dreams of the ideal" (Whitman); a busy person has no time for daydreams. Nightmare applies to any frightful and oppressive dream which occurs in sleep or, by extension, to any vision (or, sometimes, actual experience) which inspires terror or which cannot easily be shaken off. "How many of our daydreams would darken into nightmares, were there a danger of their coming true!" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Fictitious, fabrication, fable, *fiction: notion, conception, *idea, concept.

Ant. Reality (in concrete sense).

fancy, v. 1 Dote on or upon, *like, love, enjoy, relish.

Ana. *Approve, endorse, sanction.

Con. *Disapprove, deprecate.

2 Imagine, conceive, envisage, envision, realize, *think.

Ana. *Conjecture, surmise, guess.

fang. *Tooth, tusk.

fantastic or fantastical. 1 Chimerical, visionary, fanciful, *imaginary, quixotic.

Ana. Extravagant, extreme (see EXCESSIVE): incredible, unbelievable, implausible (see affirmative adjectives at PLAUSIBLE): preposterous, absurd (see FOOLISH): *irrational, unreasonable: delusory, delusive, deceptive, *misleading.

Con. Familiar, ordinary, *common: *usual, customary.

2 Fantastic (or fantastical), bizarre, grotesque, antic come into comparison when they are used to describe works of art, effects produced by nature or art, ideas, and the like, and mean conceived or made, or as if conceived or made, without reference to reality, truth, or common sense. Fantastic stresses the exercise of unrestrained imagination or unlicensed fancy. It therefore variously connotes absurd extravagance in conception, remoteness from reality, or merely ingenuity in devising. "This theory [of God as the soul of the universe] . . . will to many seem fantastic. There is something absurd in the idea that a vast aggregation of incandescent gas must have a soul of a dignity proportioned to its bulk" (Inge). "To the child, they [Bluebeard and Jack the Giant Killer] are purely fantastic, and he never connects them with the real world in any way" (B. Russell). "He wove fantastic stories of the hunting-bridle" (Kipling). Bizarre is applied to that which is unduly, often sensationally, strange or queer; it suggests the use of violent contrasts as in color, in sound, in emotional effects, or of strikingly incongruous combinations, such as the tragic and the comic, the horrible and the tender, and the like. "The love of energy and beauty, of distinction in passion [in the work of the romanticists], tended naturally to become a little bizarre. . . . Are we in the Inferno?—we are tempted to ask, wondering at something malign in so much beauty" (Pater). "The spectacle [of New York City from shipboard] enthralled him by its convincing vigor for all its bizarreness" (R. Grant). Grotesque emphasizes the distortion of the natural to the point either of comic absurdity or of aesthetically effective ugliness. Originally, and still technically, the word is applied to a type of painting or sculpture, of ancient Roman origin, which serves a decorative rather than a pictorial purpose and which employs natural details (animals, men, flowers, foliage, etc.) and conventional designs and figures (scrolls, garlands, satyrs, etc.) in unnatural combinations. Later, the word was used also to describe the comic exaggerations or distortions of human and animal figures in the sculptured decorations of Gothic architecture.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

especially of gargoyles; it is from this association that the adjective in general use derives its leading implications of ridiculous ugliness or ludicrous caricature. "[The camel's] grotesque head waving about in dumb protest to the blows which often fell on his neck" (M. Hoffman). "She differed from other comedians. There was nothing about her of the grotesque; none of her comic appeal was due to exaggeration" (T. S. Eliot). Sometimes, however, the word suggests an absurdly irrational combination of incompatibles. "The attempts... to dress up the Labour movement as a return to the Palestinian Gospel, are little short of grotesque" (Inge). Antic, which is now rare in other than literary use, was originally indistinguishable from grotesque; later, it came to stress ludicrousness or buffoonery more than unnaturalness or irrationality. "He came running to me... making a many antic gesture" (Defoe). "There was something in him [Maecenas] of the antic and the grotesque. He had all the foibles of the aesthete and the foppishness of the petit maître" (Buchan).

Ana. Imagined, fancied, conceived (see THINK): externalized, objectified (see REALIZE): ingenious, adroit, *clever: eccentric, erratic, singular, *strange, odd, queer.

fantasy. 1 Fancy, *imagination, phantasy.

Ana. Imagining, fancying, conceiving, envisioning (see THINK): externalizing, objectifying (see REALIZE).

2 *Fancy, phantasy, phantasm, vision, dream, day-dream, nightmare.

Ana. *Delusion, illusion, hallucination: vagary, *caprice, whimsey, whim, freak: grotesquerie, bizarrerie (see corresponding adjectives at FANTASTIC).

far, faraway, or far-off. *Distant, remote, removed.

Ant. Near, nigh, near-by.

farcical. Comical, comic, ludicrous, *laughable, ridiculous, risible, droll, funny.

Ana. Burden, *load.

farewell. *Good-by, Godspeed, adieu, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, bon voyage, adios.

farming. *Agriculture, husbandry.

farther. Farther, further are often used without distinction, even by good writers. Etymologically they are different words, farther being the comparative of far, and further, in its adverbial form (as an adjective, it is without a positive), being the comparative of fore or forth. At any rate, farther etymologically implies a greater distance from a given point in space (sometimes, in time); further etymologically implies onwardness or an advance or an addition, as in movement or progression, not only in space, but in time, quantity, degree, or the like; thus, the farther (rather than the further) tree; Germany is farther (not further) from the United States than England; to move farther (better than further) away from the city; no further (better than farther) steps are necessary; the incident happened farther (better than further) back than I can remember; "circumstances such as the present... render further [not farther] reserve unnecessary" (Shaw). In spite of this fundamental distinction in meaning, there are many occasions where it is difficult to make a choice, since the ideas of distance from a given point and of advance in movement are both implied. In such cases, either word may be used; as, "To go further and fare worse" (Old Proverb); "My ponies are tired, and I have further [or farther] to go" (Hardy); "as we climb higher, we can see further [or farther]" (Inge); "What!... was Pat ever in France?" "Indeed he was," cries mine host; and Pat adds, "Ay, and farther [or further]" (Lover).

Con. *Repugnant, repellent, distasteful, obnoxious, abhorrent.

fashion, n. 1 Manner, way, *method, mode, system.

Ana. Practice, *habit, custom, usage, wont.

2 Fashion, style, mode, vogue, fad, rage, craze, dernier cri, cry, come into comparison as denoting a way of dressing, of furnishing and decorating rooms, of dancing, of behaving, or the like, that is generally accepted at a given time by those who wish to follow the trend or to be regarded as up-to-date. Fashion (etymologically, a making) is thought of in general as the current conventional usage or custom which is determined by polite society or by those who are regarded as the leaders in their world (not only the social, but the intellectual, the literary, the artistic, or similar world); as, the dictates of fashion; to follow the fashion; "Nowhere... is fashion so exacting, not only in dress and demeanor, but in plastic art itself" (Brownell); "[Augustus] took the view... that externals count for much, since they sway opinion, and opinion sways fashion, and fashion is reflected in conduct" (Buchan). Fashion is also applicable to the particular thing (type of dress, furniture, behavior, subject in literature or art, etc.) which is dictated by fashions; as, "this poem [T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land]... provided... the fake-progressive with a new fashion" (Day Lewis); it is the latest fashion in hats. Style, in this as in its other senses (see LANGUAGE, 2; NAME; cf. STYLISH), implies a manner or way that is distinctive; it therefore, as here compared, suggests the elegant or distinguished manner or way of dressing, furnishing, living, and the like, characteristic of those who have wealth and taste, rather than, as fashion, the manner or way of dressing, etc., which they determine for themselves and others; as, to live in style; judging from the style they keep, they are both wealthy and cultivated; their clothes, their homes, their tables, their cars have that mysterious quality called "style." However, style is often used in place of fashion; as, this year's styles in automobile bodies; the dress is in the latest style; his coat is out of style. Mode, especially in the phrase "the mode" and partly as a result of its connection with the French term la mode, suggests the peak of fashion or the fashion of the moment among those who cultivate elegance in dress, behavior, interests, and the like; as, "The easy, apathetic graces of the man of the mode" (Macaulay); "That summer Russian refugees were greatly the mode" (R. Macaulay). Vogue stresses the prevalence or wide acceptance of the fashion and its obvious popularity; as, "the slender, undeveloped figure then very much in vogue" (Cather); "The word morale, in italics, had a great vogue at the time of the War" (C. E. Montague); "Yet I am told that the vogue of the sermon is passing" (Quiller-Couch). Fad, rage, craze, dernier cri all apply to an extremely short-lived fashion. Fad stresses caprice in acceptance and in dropping; as, "Many people are inclined to see in the popularity of this new subject a mere university fad" (Babbitt); "A fashion is not in France the mere 'fad' it is in England and with us" (Brownell). Rage and craze imply short-lived and often senseless enthusiasm; as, "Mr. Prufrock fitted in very well with his wife's social circle, and was quite the rage" (Day Lewis); "Why this craze for transmitting ideas by means of marks on paper?" (R. Macaulay). Dernier cri (a French phrase meaning the latest cry) or its English equivalent cry (especially in "all the cry") applies to that which is the very latest thing in fashion; as, a woman whose clothes are always the dernier cri; "The spirit of the times is an indiscriminate passion for the dernier cri" (J. W. Beach); open-toed shoes were all the cry at the moment.

Ana. Trend, current, drift, *tendency: convention, *form, usage.

fashion, v. Form, shape, *make, fabricate, manufacture, forge.

Ana. Devise, contrive (see corresponding nouns at DEVICE): design, plan, plot (see under PLAN, n.): produce, turn out (see BEAR).

fashionable. *Stylish, modish, smart, chic, dapper, dashing, spruce, natty, nifty, nobby, posh, toffish, brave, braw.

Ant. Unfashionable: old-fashioned.

fast. Fast, rapid, swift, fleet, quick, speedy, hasty, expeditious come into comparison as meaning moving, proceeding, or acting with great celerity. Fast and rapid are often used without distinction; but fast frequently applies to the moving object, and emphasizes the way in which it covers ground, whereas rapid is apt to characterize the movement itself and often to suggest its astonishing rate of speed; as, a fast horse; a fast train; a fast boat; a rapid current; a rapid gait; rapid progress; a fast worker; rapid work. Swift suggests great rapidity, frequently coupled with ease, or facility of movement; fleet (commonly poetical or journalistic) connotes lightness or nimbleness as well as extreme fastness or rapidity; as, fleet-footed, or fleet of foot; "Fleeter than arrows, bullets, wind, thought, swifter things" (Shak.); "more swift than swallow shears the liquid sky" (Spenser). "How fleet is a glance of the mind! Compared with the speed of its flight, The tempest itself lags behind, And the swift-winged arrows of light" (Cowper). Quick, as here compared (see QUICK, 3; LIVING), applies especially to that which happens promptly or which occupies but little time; it suggests alacrity or celerity, especially in action, rather than velocity of movement; as, quick thinking saved him from the trap; "Thy drugs are quick". Thus with a kiss I die" (Shak.); "slow to resolve, but in performance quick" (Dryden). Speedy, when applied to persons or their motions or activities, implies extreme quickness and often hurry or haste; when applied to things and their motion or movement, it also often suggests velocity; in general, it is opposed to dilatory; hasty, as here compared, suggests hurry or precipitation rather than speed and often connotes carelessness, inattention, nervousness, or the like; as, "No mode sufficiently speedy of obtaining money had ever occurred to me" (De Quincey); to hope for their speedy return; "Be speedy, darkness" (Keats); "Make speediest preparation for the journey!" (Shelley); a hasty departure; to snatch a hasty meal; work that was too hasty to be satisfactory. Expeditious adds to quick or speedy the implication of efficiency; it therefore implies the absence of waste, bungling, and undue haste; as, expeditious movements of troops; an expeditious means of accomplishing an end. "There is no expeditious road To pack and label men for God, And save them by the barrel-load" (F. Thompson). Ant. Slow.

fasten. Fasten, fix, attach, affix agree in meaning to make something stay firmly in place or in an assigned place. All but fix (and that sometimes) imply a uniting or joining of one thing to another or of two things together. Fasten commonly implies an attempt to keep a thing from moving, as by tying, binding, nailing, or cementing it to something else, or by means of some mechanical device such as a lock, a screw, a hook and eye; as, to fasten a horse to a post; to fasten down the lid of a box; to fasten a calendar to a wall; to fasten a door; to fasten a dress. Fix implies an attempt to keep something from falling down or from losing hold; it suggests operations such as driving in or implanting deeply; as, to fix a stake in the ground; unless their roots are deeply fixed, plants will not be strong. It is now more common in its extended than in its literal sense, but the implications remain the same; as, to fix a face in one's memory; to fix certain facts in one's mind; to fix a color in a fabric by use of a mordant. In some phrases where fasten and fix are used interchangeably, there is a distinction in meaning which is subtle but justified by discriminating use. To fix one's affections on someone connotes concentration and fidelity; to fasten one's affections on someone may, and often does, suggest covetousness or an attempt to hold in thrall. To fix the blame upon a person implies solid grounds for the accusation; to fasten the blame upon someone often suggests factitious grounds or selfish motives. "His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord" (Psalms cxii. 7). "Society wanted to do what it pleased; all disliked the laws which Church and State were trying to fasten on them" (H. Adams). Attach stresses connection or union in order to keep things together or to prevent their separation; it usually implies therefore a bond, link, or tie (literally or figuratively); as, the lid is attached to the box by hinges; to attach loose sheets by means of a staple; the collar bone is attached to the shoulder blade at one end and to the breastbone at the other; he attached himself to the cause in his youth; odium was attached to his name; to attach a condition to a promise. Affix usually implies imposition of one thing upon another. Originally it connoted any of several means, as nailing, impressing, or the like, as, to affix a seal to a document. "Felton affixed this bull to the gates of the bishop of London's palace" (Hallam). Now, however, it usually suggests either attachment, as by paste, gum, or mucilage (as, to affix a stamp to an envelope) or subscription, as of a name to a document. "He's old enough to affix his signature to an instrument" (McCreidh).

Ana. *Secure, rivet, moor, anchor: *join, connect, link, unite: adhere, cleave, cling, *stick, cohere: bind, *tie.

Ant. Unfasten: loosen, loose. — Con. *Separate, part, sever, sunder, divorce, divide.

fastidious. Finical, particular, fussy, *nice, dainty, squeamish, pernickety.

Ana. Exacting, demanding (see DEMAND, v.): *critical, hypercritical, captious: *careful, meticulous, punctilious, scrupulous.

Con. *Negligent, remiss, neglectful, slack, lax: uncritical, cursory (see SUPERFICIAL).

fastness. Stronghold, *fort, fortress, citadel, acropolis.

fat, adj. *Fleshy, stout, portly, plump, corpulent, obese, rotund, chubby.

Ant. Lean. — Con. Spare, lank, lanky, skinny, gaunt, scrawny, rawboned, angular (see LEAN): *thin, slender, slim, slight.

fat, n. Grease, *oil, wax.

fatal. Mortal, *deadly, lethal.

Ana. Killing, slaying (see KILL, v.): destroying or destructive (see corresponding verb DESTROY): baneful, *pernicious.

fate, n. Fate, destiny, lot, portion, doom come into comparison when they denote the state, condition, or end which is decreed for one by a higher power. Fate presupposes a determining agent or agency such as one of the ancient goddesses (called Fates), the Supreme Being, the law of necessity, or the like; the term, therefore, usually suggests inevitability and, sometimes, immutability (except in its increasingly frequent weakened use; as, to decide a bill's fate today). "He either fears his fate too much, Or his deserts are small. That dares not put it to the touch To gain or lose it all" (Montrose). "Let us, then, be up and doing, With a heart for any fate" (Longfellow). Destiny, in precise use, implies an irrevocable determination or appointment, as by the will of the gods or of God; even in this sense, however, it carries little or no suggestion of something to be feared; on the contrary, it may even imply a great or noble state or end; as, "the conception of a lordly splendid destiny for the human race" (B. Russell); "Lawrence was... unescapably an artist... there were moments when he wanted to escape from his destiny" (A. Huxley). Often, destiny is more loosely applied to that which one envisions as his end or goal; sometimes, however, with the implication (often slight) that it is the will of God. "I see them [an extinct Indian tribe] here, isolated, cut off from other tribes, working out their destiny" (Cather). Lot and portion carry a stronger implication of distribution in the decreeing of one's fate; lot, however, stressing blind chance, by or as if by determination through the casting of lots, and portion, the more or less fair apportioning of good and evil; as, "It was her unhappy lot to be made more wretched by the only affection which she could not suspect" (Conrad); "With whom would she be willing to exchange lots?" (Bennett); "So has my portion been meted out to me; and... I have... been able to comprehend some of the lessons hidden in the heart of pain" (Wilde). Doom, more than any of these words, implies a final, usually an unhappy or calamitous, award or fate; as, "With the sea approaches lost, her [La Rochelle's] doom was certain" (Belloc). "Involution is as much a law of nature as evolution. There is no escape from this doom" (Inge).

Ana. Issue, outcome, upshot, consequence, result, *effect; *end, ending, termination.

fateful. *Ominous, portentous, inauspicious, unpropitious.

Ana. Momentous, significant, important (see corresponding nouns at IMPORTANCE): decisive, determinative, *conclusive: crucial, critical, *acute.

fatherly. Paternal, *parental.

fatigue. v. Exhaust, jade, *tire, weary, fag, tucker.

Ana. *Deplete, drain: debilitate, disable, *weaken.

Ant. Rest. — Con. Refresh, restore, rejuvenate, *renew: *relieve, assuage.

fatuous. Asinine, silly, foolish, *simple.

Ana. Idiotic, imbecile, moronic (see corresponding nouns at FOOL): *fond, infatuated, besotted, insensate.

Ant. Sensible. — Con. Sane, prudent, judicious, *wise, sage, sapient.

fault, n. 1 Fault, failing, frailty, foible, vice come into comparison when they mean an imperfection in character or an ingrained moral weakness. Fault implies failure, but not necessarily serious or even culpable failure, to attain the standard of moral perfection in disposition, deed, habit, or the like; as, to have many virtues and few faults; "He is all fault who hath no fault at all" (Tennyson); "Our modern appreciativeness is often only the amiable aspect of a fault—an undue tolerance for indeterminate enthusiasms and vapid emotionalism" (Babbitt). Failing is even less censorious than fault, for it usually implies a shortcoming, often a weakness of character for which one is not entirely responsible or of which one may not be aware; as, "Pride... is a very common failing, I believe" (Austen); "A knowledge of his family failings will help one man in economising his estate" (Quiller-Couch). Frailty often implies a weakness in character which makes one prone to fall when tempted; as, "God knows our frailty, pities our weakness" (Locke). The term therefore often denotes a pardonable or a petty fault; as, "a purely human frailty, like a fondness for detective stories" (Loves). Foible denotes a harmless, sometimes an amiable, sometimes a temperamental, weakness or failing; as, "I can bear very well to hear my foibles exposed, though not my faults" (Shenstone); "He [Maecenas] had all the foibles of the aesthete" (Buchan). Vice (opposed to virtue) is stronger than fault and failing in its suggestion of violation of the moral law or of giving offense to the moral senses of others, but, as here compared (see also OFFENSE, 3), it does not necessarily imply corruptness or deliberate defiance of the law but is rather a general term attributable to any imperfection or weakness of character. "Knowledge... of all the virtues and vices, tastes and dislikes of all the people" (Galsworthy). "She had been proud. She was criminally proud. That was her vice" (Bennett). "As Professor Whitehead has lately said, the intolerant use of abstractions is the major vice of the intellect" (Inge).

Ana. Weakness, infirmity (see corresponding adjectives at WEAK): flaw, defect, *blemish.

Ant. Merit. — Con. *Excellence, virtue, perfection.

2 *Blame, culpability, guilt.

Ana. Responsibility, answerability, accountability (see corresponding adjectives at RESPONSIBLE): sin, *offense, crime.

faultfinding, adj. Captious, caviling, carping, censorious, hypercritical, *critical.

Ana. Exacting, demanding, requiring (see DEMAND, v.): fussy, particular, finical, pickiness (see NICE).

Con. Appreciating or appreciative, valuing, prizing, cherishing (see corresponding verbs at APPRECIATE): approving, endorsing (see APPROVE).

faultless. *Impeccable, flawless, errorless.

Ana. *Correct, right, nice, accurate, exact, precise: *perfect, intact, entire, whole.

Ant. Faulty.

faux pas. Blunder, slip, *error, mistake, lapse, bull, howler, boner, bloomer, floater.

favor or favour, n. 1 Favor (or favour), good will, countenance come into comparison when they denote the attitude of mind of one who is disposed to be friendly and helpful. Favor not only implies the absence of all hostility or opposition but it definitely suggests either an active interest and a willingness to give assistance or support (as, "the new... ecclesiastic... woos the favor of the Labour party"—Inge), or an approval or sanction (as, "The conception of morality as an art... seems now again to be finding favour in men's eyes"—H. Ellis), or obvious partiality (as, "[the phenomena of life and character] set down without fear, favour, or prejudice"—Galsworthy). Good will (see also FRIENDSHIP) is more positive in its implication of deep and abiding friendliness, but except in its legal and business sense (that is, as denoting the salable asset of a business whose custom or patronage depends on one's reputation for, or on favor won by, the quality of one's merchandise or product, the promptitude with which one fills orders, and the like) the term stresses heartiness of affection for, or zeal for the welfare of, another more than an attitude of interest, approval, or partiality toward him or his projects; as, "Thou art not ignorant what dear good will I bear unto the banish'd Valentine" (Shak.); "We often made feasts for each other, where good will outweighed the frugal luxury" (Shelley). Nevertheless, the term is often used without clear distinction from favor. "Though his looks did not please her, his name was a passport to her goodwill, and she thought with sincere compassion of his approaching disappointment" (Austen). Countenance emphasizes an attitude of approval or a willingness to favor, but it does not necessarily involve reference to more than the appearance of friendliness; as, "Is there one sentence in the constitution which gives countenance to this rule?" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "to lend no countenance to such adulation" (Macaulay); "Else I withdraw favour and countenance From you" (Tennyson).

Ana. *Predilection, partiality, prepossession, bias, prejudice: *regard, respect, esteem, admiration: approving or approval, sanctioning or sanction, endorsement (see corresponding verbs at APPROVE).

Ant. Animus. — Con. Ill will, *malice, malevolence, malignity: antipathy, animosity, *enmity, hostility, rancor.

2 Boon, largess, *gift, present, gratuity, fairing.

Ana. Token, *pledge, earnest: concession, *allowance: *honor, homage, deference: benefaction, *donation, contribution.

favor, v. Accommodate, *oblige.

Ana. *Help, aid, assist: *indulge, pamper, humor: *benefit, profit.

Con. Foil, thwart, baffle, circumvent, *frustrate: *inconvenience, incommode, discommode.

favorable or favourable. Favorable (or favourable), benign, auspicious, propitious, as here compared, agree in meaning of good omen, or presaging a happy or successful outcome. Favorable implies that the persons or circumstances involved tend to assist one in attaining one's ends—persons, by being kindly disposed or actually helpful, and circumstances, by being distinctly advantageous or encouraging; as, to lend a favorable ear to a request; it was feared that many of the small countries were favorable to the enemy; a favorable breeze; "a hot dry summer, favourable to contemplative life out of doors" (Conrad). Benign (see also KIND) derives its connotations largely, but not entirely, from its application in astrology to the aspect of the stars at a given moment, such as the time of a person's birth or of his beginning a project. It is applicable chiefly to someone or to something that has power to make or mar one's fortunes by his or its aspect, and that is thought of as looking down with favor on one, or of presenting a favorable countenance to one. "So shall the World go on, To good malignant, to bad men benign" (Milton). "Thy form benign, O Goddess [Adversity], wear, Thy milder influence impart" (Gray). "On whose birth benign planets have certainly smiled" (C. Brontë). "They [my poems] will co-operate with the benign tendencies in human nature and society...in making men wiser, better, and happier" (Wordsworth). Auspicious, from its etymological reference to the auspices, the signs observed by an augur (see under FORETELL), is applicable to anything that is marked by favorable signs or is in itself regarded as a good omen; as, an auspicious beginning of what proved to be a great career. "For sure the milder planets did combine on thy auspicious horoscope to shine" (Dryden). "Pay the boy...he brought auspicious news" (Kipling). Propitious, although it carries no etymological reference to any of the occult sciences, does suggest such an allusion far more strongly than favorable, but not quite so explicitly as benign or auspicious; it is therefore preferred to favorable when such a connotation is desired; as, if the fates are propitious, there is no doubt of his success; they looked upon the present moment as propitious for starting their project.

Ana. Advantageous, *beneficial, profitable: salutary, wholesome, *healthful: benignant, kindly, *kind: conducting or conducive, contributing or contributory (see corresponding verbs at CONDUCE).

Ant. Unfavorable: antagonistic.

favorite or favourite, n. Sycophant, toady, lickspit, *parasite, hanger-on, leech, sponge.

fawn, v. Fawn, toady, truckle, cringe, cower are synonyms when they mean to act or behave with abjectness in the presence of a superior. Fawn (literally, of a dog, to show delight and affection by crouching and wagging its tail) in its extended sense implies a courting of favor by servile flattery, exaggerated deference, or other acts of a sycophant. "They fawn on the proud feet that spurn them lying low" (Shelley). "Courtiers who fawn on a master while they betray him" (Macaulay). Toady (literally, to play the toady, or toadeater, a mountebank's boy who allegedly ate toads so that his master might show his skill in expelling their [supposed] poison) carries a strong implication of a menial as well as of a fawning attitude in an attempt to ingratiate oneself; often also it suggests the close following as of a parasite; as, toadying to the rich boys in his school; her generosity encouraged toadying among her neighbors. Truckle (literally, to take a subordinate or inferior position reminiscent of a truckle bed, which is pushed under a large bed when not in use) always implies subordination of self or submission of one's desires, judgments, or the like, to those of a superior. "Everybody must defer.... A nation must wait upon her decision, a Dean and Chapter truckle to her wishes" (V. Sackville-West). "She must not expect to be allowed to dictate.... There are people who will always truckle to those who have money" (Arch. Marshall). Cringe (literally, to shrink in fear) implies obsequious bowing or crouching as if in awe or fear; it usually connotes abject abasement; as, "We are sneaking and bowing and cringing on the one hand, or bullying and scorning on the other" (Thackeray); "She [Jenny Lind] is very humble and careless of self. 'My poor, humble self'...is often on her lips; but she never cringes or loses dignity" (Symonds). Cower always implies abject fear, often cowardly fear, especially in the presence of those who tyrannize or domineer. "The whole family cowered under Lady Kew's eyes and nose, and she ruled by force of them" (Thackeray). "Having found...every incentive to cower and cringe and hedge, and no incentive...to stand upright as a man" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. Blandish, cajole, wheedle, *coax: defer, bow, cave in, *yield, submit: court, woo, *invite.

Ant. Domineer.

fay. *Fairy, faery, elf, sprite, pixy, gnome, dwarf, goblin, brownie, puck, nix, shee, leprechaun, banshee.

faze or phase, fease, feeze. Disconcert, discomfit, rattle, *embarrass, abash.

Ana. Nonplus, confound, dumfound, perplex, mystify, *puzzle: *confuse, muddle: fluster, flurry, perturb, *discompose.

fealty. 1 *Allegiance, homage.

2 *Fidelity, loyalty, devotion, allegiance, piety.

Ana. Faithfulness or faith, lealty, trueneess or truth, constancy, stanchness, steadfastness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHFUL): *obligation, duty.

Ant. Perfidy. — Con. Perfidiousness, treacherousness or treachery, traitoroussness, faithlessness, disloyalty, falseness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHLESS).

fear, n. 1 Fear, dread, fright, alarm, dismay, consternation, panic, terror, horror, trepidation denote the painful agitation which overcomes one in the anticipation or in the presence of danger. Fear is the most general term; like dread, it implies apprehension and anxiety, but it also frequently suggests a loss of courage amounting to cowardice. "Fear came upon me, and trembling" (Job iv. 14). "He [Dr. Johnson] had, indeed, an awful dread of death, or rather 'of something after death' " (Boswell). "Do you know what fear is? Not ordinary fear of insult, injury or death, but abject, quivering dread of something that you cannot see" (Kipling). Fright implies the shock of sudden, startling, and commonly short-lived fear; alarm suggests the fright which is awakened by sudden awareness of imminent danger. "She had taken fright at our behaviour and turned to the captain pitifully" (Conrad). "Thou wast born amid the din of arms, And sucked a breast that panted with alarms" (Cowper). Dismay implies deprivation of spirit, courage, or initiative, esp. by an alarming or disconcerting prospect. "The storm prevails, the rampart yields a way, Bursts the wild cry of horror and dismay!" (Campbell). Consternation heightens the implication of prostration or confusion of the faculties. "'Tis easy to believe, though not to describe, the consternation they were all in" (Defoe). Panic is overmastering and unreasoning, often groundless, fear or fright. "A blockhead, who was in a perpetual panic lest I should expose his ignorance" (De Quincey). Terror suggests the extremity of consternation or (often violent) dread. "The terror by night" (Psalms xci. 5). "Frozen with terror" (Beckford). "Soul-chilling terror" (Shelley). Horror adds the implication of shuddering abhorrence or aversion, for it usually connotes a sight, rather than a premonition, which causes fear. "The horror of supernatural darkness" (Pater). "Fierce thrills of delighted horror" (F. W. Farrar). "What is terror in poetry is horror in prose" (Landor). Trepidation adds to dread the implication of timidity, especially timidity as manifested by trembling or by marked hesitation. "The Stubland aunts were not the ladies to receive a solicitor's letter calmly. They were thrown into a state of extreme trepidation" (H. G. Wells). "I take up with some trepidation the subject of programme music" (Babbitt).

Ana. *Apprehension, foreboding, misgiving, presentiment: anxiety, worry, concern (see CARE): cowardliness, pusillanimity, cravenness (see corresponding adjectives at COWARDLY).

Ant. Fearlessness. — Con. Boldness, bravery, intrepidity, valiancy (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): *courage, mettle, spirit, resolution: *confidence, assurance, aplomb.

2 Awe, reverence.

Ana. Veneration, worship, adoration (see under REVERE): admiration, *wonder, amazement: respect, esteem (see REGARD, n.).

Ant. Contempt.

fearful. 1 Fearful, apprehensive, afraid are synonymous when they are followed by of, that, lest, or the like, and mean inspired or moved by fear or fears. Afraid is never, fearful and apprehensive are infrequently, used attributively in this sense. Fearful carries no suggestion of a formidable cause of fear; it often connotes timorousness, a predisposition to worry, or an active imagination; as, the child is fearful of loud noises; they were fearful that a storm would prevent their excursion. "It [the American intelligentsia] is timorous and fearful of challenge" (Mencken). Apprehensive suggests a state of mind rather than a temperament and, usually, genuine grounds for fear. It always implies a presentiment or anticipation of evil, of danger, or the like; as, in July 1914, all civilized peoples were apprehensive of war. "[The invaders] had driven before them into Italy whole troops of... provincials, less apprehensive of servitude than of famine" (Gibbon). Afraid may or may not imply sufficient motivation of fears, but it usually connotes weakness or cowardice. As here compared, it always implies inhibition of action or utterance. "The trained reason is disinterested and fearless. It is not afraid of public opinion" (Inge).

Ana. *Timid, timorous: anxious, worried, concerned (see under CARE, n.): hesitant, reluctant, *disinclined.

Ant. Fearless: intrepid. — Con. Bold, audacious, *brave, courageous, dauntless, valiant.

2 Fearful, awful, dreadful, frightful, terrible, terrific, horrible, horrific, shocking, appalling are not here stressed as synonyms, for in loose use they are frequently employed as if they were nearly equivalent in meaning or as if they were more frequently interchangeable than good use permits. All of these words, and especially their adverbs, are found in colloquial use as intensives, meaning little more than extreme(ly). Among writers who use words with precision, however, each one has a definite and distinct value when applied to a thing that stimulates an emotion in which fear or horror is in some degree an element. That is fearful which makes one afraid or alarmed. In literary use and in precise speech, the word usually implies a deep and painful emotion and a loss of courage in the face of possible or imminent danger. "All torment, trouble, wonder and amazement inhabits here: some heavenly power guide us Out of this fearful country!" (Shak.). "A sight too fearful for the feel of fear" (Keats). In less precise English, fearful may not imply apprehension of danger, but if its use is acceptable it should at least imply that the thing so qualified is a cause of disquiet; as, the fearful tenacity of a memory; a fearfully distressing (not a fearfully interesting) situation. That is awful which impresses one so profoundly that one acts or feels as if under a spell or in the grip of its influence. In richest use, it often implies an emotion such as reverential fear or an overpowering awareness of might, majesty, sublimity, or the like. "And wring the awful sceptre from his fist" (Shak.). "God of our fathers... Beneath whose awful Hand we hold Dominion over palm and pine" (Kipling). "Men living among the glooms and broken lights of the primeval forest, hearing strange noises in the tree-tops when the thunder crashed, and awful voices in the wind" (Buchan). "She entered... the drawing-room in which New York's most chosen company was somewhat awfully assembled" (E. Wharton). In somewhat weakened but still correct use, awful may be applied to qualities, conditions, and the like, which are unduly weighted with significance or which strike one forcibly as far above or beyond the normal; as, "No tribunal can approach such a question without a deep sense... of the awful responsibility involved in its decision" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "a moment of awful silence before the questions began" (Deland); "suddenly, with the awful clarity and singleness of purpose of the innocent and intelligent, she believed in Captain Remson" (Wm. McFee). That is dreadful from which one shrinks in shuddering fear, or in loathing; as, the dreadful prospect of another world war; cancer is a dreadful disease. "She felt her two hands taken, and heard a kind voice. Could it be possible it belonged to the dreadful father of her husband?" (Meredith). "Dreadful things should not be known to young people until they are old enough to face them with a certain poise" (B. Russell). In looser, but still good, use dreadful is applicable to something from which one shrinks as disagreeable or as unpleasant to contemplate or endure; as, a dreadful necessity. "Wouldn't it be dreadful to produce that effect on people!" (L. P. Smith). That is frightful which, for the moment at least, paralyzes one with fear or throws one into great alarm or consternation; as, a frightful sound broke the quiet of the night; a frightful tornado. "The Ghost of a Lady... a scar on her forehead, and a bloody handkerchief at her breast, frightful to behold!" (Mere- dith). Frighful is now often employed even by good writers without any implication of fright; however, in discriminating use, it imputes to the thing so qualified a capacity for startling the observer by its enormity, its outrageousness, or the like; as, a frighful disregard of decency; a frighful scandal; "This frighful condition of internal strain and instability" (Shaw). "The labour of sifting, combining, constructing, expunging, correcting, testing: this frighful toil is as much critical as creative" (T. S. Eliot). That is terrible which causes or is capable of causing extreme and agitating fear or which both induces fright or alarm and prolongs and intensifies it. "Millions of voices arose. The clamor became terrible, and confused the minds of all men" (S. Anderson). "One of those terrible women produced now and then by the Roman stock, unsexed, implacable, filled with an insane lust of power" (Buchan). "I have never read a more terrible exposure of human weakness—of universal human weakness—than the last great speech of Othello" (T. S. Eliot). "A human being devoid of hope is the most terrible object in the world" (V. Heiser). When the word carries no implication of terrifying, or of capacity for terrifying, it usually, in discriminating use, suggests that the thing so described is almost unendurable in its excess of force, power, or similar potency, or too painful to be borne without alleviation or mitigation. "Knowledge . . . is no longer thought to be a secret, precious, rather terrible possession" (A. C. Benson). "An evil passion may give great physical and intellectual powers a terrible efficiency" (C. W. Eliot). "Sainte-Beuve believed that the truth is always terrible" (L. P. Smith). That is terrific which is by its size, appearance, potency, or the like, fitted or intended to inspire terror; as, "eyes And hairy mane terrific" (Milton); to assume a terrific expression. "One little tool . . . transforms the spark [of electricity] from a form too brief and bright and terrific to be intelligible into one of the most tractable and lucid of the phenomena . . . of Nature" (Karl K. Darrow). In more recent use, terrific is preferred to terrible when there is an implication of release of stored-up energy, physical, emotional, or intellectual, and of its stunning effect; as, a terrific (better than terrible) explosion; a terrific outburst of rage. "The most admired single phrase that Shakespeare ever wrote—Ripeness is all . . . derives a terrific and pure dramatic impact from its context" (Day Lewis). That is horrible the sight of which induces not only fear or terror but also loathing and aversion; thus, a fearful precipice may not be horrible; in the practice of the ancient Greek dramatists, murder on the stage was avoided as horrible. "Now that wars are between nations, no longer between governments or armies, they have become far more horrible" (Inge). Horrible, like the other words, may be used in a weaker sense; in such cases it seldom suggests horror, but it does suggest hatefulness or hideousness; as, a horrible suspicion arose in his mind; a horribly shrill voice; a horrible taste. Horrible emphasizes the effect produced on a person, horrific the possession of qualities or properties fitted or intended to produce that effect; as, "that horrific yarn 'The Body-Snatcher'" (C. E. Montague). "His yearning for the horrific, the revolting, the transcendent mystery of whatever is not 'nice'" (Times Lit. Sup.). That is shocking which startles or is capable of startling because it is contrary to one's expectations, one's standards of good taste, one's moral sense, or the like; as, to like to tell shocking stories; to find a shocking change in a person's appearance. "The treatment should begin by encouraging him to utter freely even his most shocking thoughts" (B. Russell). Oftentimes in extended use, shocking does not imply a capacity for startling so much as a blamable or reprehensible character. "It is shocking of me, but I have to laugh when people are pompous and absurd" (R. Macaulay). "A solecism of this kind . . . would have seemed a shocking thing to . . . so accurate a scholar" (L. P. Smith). That is appalling which strikes one with dismay as well as with terror or horror. "Her overthrow would have been the most appalling disaster the Western world had ever known" (H. Adams). "The defectives are appallingly prolific" (Shaw). In looser but correct use, appalling often comes close to amazing but carries a stronger suggestion of dumfounding than of surprising; as, his appalling quickness of mind; an ap-palling suggestion.

Ana. Frightening, terrifying, alarming (see FRIGHTEN): *formidable, redoubtable: *ghastly, gruesome, grisly, grim, macabre, lurid: *sinister, baleful, malign: sublime (see SPLENDID).

fease. Variant of FAZE.

feasible. *Possible, practicable.

Ana. Practical, *practicable: advisable, *expedient, politic: advantageous, *beneficial, profitable: suitable, appropriate, fitting, *fit.

Ant. Unfeasible, infeasible: chimerical (schemes, projects, suggestions, etc.). — Con. Fantastic, visionary, quixotic (see IMAGINARY): utopian, *ambitious, pretentious.

feast, n. Feast, festival, fete (or fête), fiesta come into comparison in more than one sense, but especially in those of a day or period set apart as a time of rejoicing, or a celebration or observance characteristic of such an occasion. Feast bore both of these senses in early English use and continues to bear them. But feast as denoting a day or period set apart (universally or nationally or locally) for rejoicing refers commonly to one set apart for religious ceremonies of a solemn and joyful character, commemorating some important event (thus, the Jewish feast of Passover commemorates the sparing of the first-born of the Israelites in Egypt [Exodus xii]; Easter, or the feast of the Resurrection, commemorates the rising of Christ from the dead), or to one set apart for celebrating the day in the church calendar assigned to a saint under whose patronage a country or parish is placed (as, "To keep our great St. George's feast withal" —Shak.). Since feast in this sense is opposed to fast (which properly applies to a day or period of abstinence from food and from gaieties; thus, Yom Kippur is a strict fast day among Jews) the term often implies celebration not only by pomp and ceremony, but by popular sports and revels, such as games, pageants, plays, bonfires, dances, eating and drinking, and the like; as, "Corpus Christi Day, the greatest feast in the year" (Gray). Feast in the other of its earliest and still common senses denotes an unusually abundant or sumptuous meal, especially one that is provided for the enjoyment of those celebrating an occasion, not only a religious feast, but a marriage, a betrothal, a victory, an assumption of a crown or title, an anniversary, or the like; as, "To share our marriage feast and nuptial mirth" (Keats). Often, the word in this sense loses all suggestion of the celebration of an occasion and stresses, in figurative as well as in literal use, the delight or gratification induced by the food (or other pleasure) provided; as, she has so excellent a cook that every one of her dinners is a feast; "The feast of reason and the flow of soul" (Pope). Festival in early use was the adjective corresponding to the noun feast, rather than a substantive (thus, "a festival day" was a feast in the religious sense; "a high-festival day" was an important feast, such as Christmas or Easter, celebrated with special pomp and ceremony). After the Reformation, however, the word festival was accepted as a substantive, often equivalent to feast in its implications, but tending more and more to denote a time of civil or popular rather than of religious rejoicing and to impute a carnival rather than a religious character to its celebration; thus, in religious use, Christmas is called "the Feast of the Nativity," but in popular use is more commonly called "the Christmas festival"; so, the great national festival in the United States is Independence Day and in France, Bastille Day; a harvest festival. In the other sense of feast, festival is not used. But it has another common use of its own, to denote a series of concerts (or of other entertainments) provided at regularly recurring periods for the enjoyment of those interested; as, the city's annual music festival. Fete, or its French form fête, though the French equivalent of feast, came into English use in the eighteenth century to denote an entertainment of a sumptuous character, usually, but not necessarily, one provided for one's social equals, given out of doors (then sometimes specifically called fête champêtre) or on a body of water, and involving pageantry or other spectacular performances; as, a lawn fete or garden fete for charitable purposes; "the most splendid and elegant fête that was perhaps ever given" (Gibbon); "anxious to give the ladies of the imperial Harem a fete on the Black Sea" (T. Hope); "a gorgeous night fête" (Manchester Guardian). Fiesta, the Spanish word for feast, is much used in the states adjacent to Mexico, not only for any religious feast but especially for a saint's day, and the popular celebrating of it. The term is also used in English to designate a characteristic Spanish celebration of a feast day in Spain or any Spanish-speaking country.

Ana. Celebration, commemoration, observance, solemnization (see corresponding verbs at KEEP): rejoicing, regaling or regalement (see corresponding verbs at PLEASE): entertainment, diversion, amusement, recreation (see under AMUSE): dinner, *banquet.

Ant. Fast (in religious use).

feat, n. Feat, exploit, achievement agree in denoting a remarkable deed or performance. Feat, in modern usage, commonly suggests an act of strength or dexterity; an exploit is an adventurous, heroic, or brilliant feat; achievement emphasizes the idea of distinguished endeavor, commonly in the face of difficulty or opposition; all are occasionally used humorously or ironically; as, "Sleights of art and feats of strength went round" (Goldsmith); feats of daring; "I must retreat into the inviolable corps and tell them of my former exploits, which may very likely pass for lies" (Scott); "Great is the rumor of this dreadful knight, and his achievements of no less account" (Shak.); achievements of science.

Ana. Deed, act, *action: triumph, conquest, *victory: emprise, enterprise, *adventure, quest.

feat, adj. Deft, adroit, *dexterous, handy.

Ana. *Agile, nimble, brisk, spry: skillful, skilled, *proficient, adept, expert: *easy, effortless, facile, smooth.

Con. *Awkward, clumsy, maladroit, inept, gauche.

fecund. Fruitful, prolific, *fertile.

Ana. Bearing, producing, yielding (see BEAR): breeding, propagating, reproducing, generating (see GENERATE).

Ant. Barren. — Con. *Sterile, unfruitful, infertile, impotent.

fecundity. Fruitfulness, prolificacy, fertility. See under FERTILE.

Ana. Producing or productiveness (see corresponding verb at BEAR): profuseness or profusion, luxuriance, lavishness, prodigality, lushness, exuberance (see corresponding adjectives at PROFUSE).

Ant. Barrenness.

federation. Confederacy, confederation, coalition, fusion, *alliance.

fee. Stipend, emolument, salary, *wage, pay, hire, screw.

Ana. Remuneration, compensation, requital (see corresponding verbs at PAY): charge, *price, cost, expense.

feeble. *Weak, infirm, decrepit, frail, fragile.

Ana. Unnerved, enervated, emasculated, unmanned (see UNNERVE): debilitated, weakened, enfeebled, disabled, crippled (see WEAKEN): doddering, *senile, anile, doting: *powerless, impotent, impuissant.

Ant. Robust. — Con. *Strong, sturdy, stout, stalwart: *vigorous, lusty, energetic: hale, *healthy.

feed, v. Feed, nourish, pasture, graze, come into comparison when they mean to provide the food that one needs or desires. Feed is the comprehensive term applicable not only to persons and animals, but also to plants and, by extension, to anything (such as a furnace) that consumes something (such as fuel), or requires something external for its sustenance; as, to feed the baby; to feed a family of ten on fifty dollars a week; to feed the cattle; to use bone meal to feed the chrysanthemums; to feed a furnace with coal. "Hugh's growing vanity was fed by the thought that Clara was interested in him" (S. Anderson). "The press exploits for its benefit human silliness and ignorance and vulgarity and sensationalism, and, in exploiting it, feeds it" (R. Macaulay). In American but not in British use, feed sometimes takes for its object the thing that is fed; as, to feed oats to the horses; to feed coal to the furnace; "He has been feeding bread and butter to the dog" (Kate D. Wiggin). Nourish implies feeding with food that is essential to a person's, or by extension a thing's, growth, health, well-being, or the like. Etymologically, it implies the giving of mother's milk to the suckling child or offspring, but this use is now very rare, nurse now being the preferred word. "I do so wish she would not see fit to sit down and nourish her baby in my poor old bachelor drawing-room" (H. G. Wells). In idiomatic English, nourish more often takes as its subject the thing that serves as a sustaining or a building-up food than the person who provides such food; as, milk, eggs, and meat nourish the bodies of fast-growing boys and girls; "the humid prairie heat, so nourishing to wheat and corn, so exhausting to human beings" (Cather); "Freedom nourishes self-respect" (W. E. Channing); "His zeal seemed nourished by failure and by fall" (Whittier). Pasture (etymologically, to feed) was, in very early use, applied chiefly to animals but very rarely to human beings. Somewhat later it was restricted, except in humorous use, to cattle, sheep, or other domestic animals fed on grass; as, "Unwont with heads to watch, or pasture sheep" (Spenser). *Graz*e is often preferred specifically to pasture when the emphasis is on the use of growing grass for food; as, "a field or two to graze his cows" (Swift); to graze one's cow on the common.

Ana. *Nurse, nurture, foster, cherish: support, sustain, maintain (see corresponding nouns at LIVING).

Ant. Starve.

feel, n. Feeling, *atmosphere, savor, tone, aura.

Ana. See those at FEELING, 3.

feeling, n. 1 Sensibility, *sensation, sense.

Ana. Reacting or reaction, behaving or behavior (see corresponding verbs at ACT): responsiveness (see corresponding adjective at TENDER): sensitiveness, susceptibility (see corresponding adjectives at LIABLE).

2 Feeling, affection, emotion, sentiment, passion. Feeling, the general term, denotes any partly mental and partly physical, but not sensory, response (or the state that results) that is characterized by pleasure or pain, attraction or repulsion, or the like. Unless it is qualified or a clue is given in the context, feeling gives no indication of the nature, the quality, or the intensity of the response. "Whatever feelings were in Sophia's heart, tenderness was not among them" (Bennett). "A feeling of sadness and longing" (Longfellow). Often, feeling implies a contrast with judgment and connotes lack of thought. "Her humanity was a feeling, not a principle" (H. Mackenzie). Affection, once used technically for feeling, is now applied mainly to such feelings as are also inclinations or likings; the word therefore sometimes suggests desire or striving. "The heart...we are, by foolish custom...impelled to call the seat of the affections" (R. Macaulay). "That serene and blessed mood, In which the affections gently lead us on" (Wordsworth). Emotion, the preferred term in modern psychology because it suggests the physical as well as the mental reaction, usually carries in nontechnical use a stronger implication of excitement or agitation than does feeling. "Eagerness for emotion and adventure" (Sydney Smith). "Means of exciting religious emotion" (Ruskin). "A sensation of strength, inspired by mighty emotion" (G. Eliot). Sentiment connotes a larger intellectual element in the feeling than any of the others; it often is applied specifically to an emotion inspired by an idea. "Filling the soul with sentiments august — The beautiful, the brave, the holy, and the just!" (Wordsworth). Commonly the word suggests refined, sometimes romantic, occasionally affected or artificial, feeling; as, "that moral sentiment which exists in every human breast" (G. Bancroft); "His opinions are more the result of conviction than of sentiment" (J. R. Lowell); Sterne has been called a man overflowing with sentiment on paper, but devoid of real feeling. Passion suggests powerful or controlling emotion; it, far more than affection, implies urgency of desire for possession, revenge, or the like. "Hark! how the sacred calm, that breathes about, bids every fierce tumultuous passion cease" (Gray). "The ruling passion, be it what it will, the ruling passion conquers reason still" (Pope).

Ana. Impressing or impression, touching, affecting or affection (see corresponding verbs at AFFECT, v., 1): *mood, humor, temper, vein.

3 Feel, *atmosphere, savor, tone, aura.

Ana. *Impression, impress, imprint: peculiarity, individuality, characteristic (see corresponding adjectives at CHARACTERISTIC): *quality, property, character, attribute.

feeze. Variant of FAZE.

feign. Simulate, counterfeit, sham, pretend, affect, *assume.

Ana. Fabricate, manufacture, forge (see MAKE): dissemble, *disguise, cloak, mask.

feint, n. Artifice, wile, ruse, stratagem, maneuver, *trick.

Ana. *Pretense, pretension, make-believe, make-belief: hoaxing or hoax, hoodwinking, befooling (see corresponding verbs at DUPE): resort, expedient, shift (see RESOURCE).

felicitate. Felicitate, congratulate agree in meaning to express one's pleasure in the joy, success, elevation, or prospects of another. Felicitate is not only the more formal term, but it carries a stronger implication that the person who felicitates regards the other as very happy or wishes him happiness; as, to felicitate the parents upon the birth of a child; to felicitate His Majesty upon his coronation. Congratulate is the more common and often more intimate term; it usually implies that the congratulator regards the other as a person to whom good fortune has come or on whom fortune smiles; thus, it is "good form" to congratulate a bridegroom and to felicitate a bride; so, to congratulate a friend on his promotion; to congratulate oneself that one has escaped a trying situation. felicitous. Happy, apt, fitting, appropriate, *fit, suitable, meet, proper.

Ana. Telling, convincing (see VALID): pat, timely, opportune, *seasonable, well-timed: apposite, pertinent, *relevant.

Ant. Infelicitous: inept, maladroit. — Con. *Awkward, clumsy, gauche: unfortunate, unhappy, unlucky (see affirmative adjectives at LUCKY).

felicity. *Happiness, bliss, beatitude, blessedness.

Ana. Rapture, transport, *ecstasy: joy, delight, delectation, *pleasure, fruition.

Ant. Misery.

fell, n. Pelt, hide, *skin, rind, bark, peel.

fell, adj. Cruel, inhuman, savage, barbarous, ferocious, *fierce, truculent.

Ana. Baleful, malign, malefic, *sinister: pitiless, ruthless (see corresponding nouns at PIRY): relentless, unrelenting, merciless, *grim, implacable.

female, n. Female, woman, lady are here compared as meaning a person (especially an adult) who belongs to the sex that is the counterpart of man, or the male of the human species. Female (the correlative of male) emphasizes the idea of sex; it applies not only to human beings but also to animals and plants. Its employment as a synonym for woman was once frequent among good writers (as, "three smart-looking females"—Austen; "to please the females of our modest age"—Byron), but this use is now frowned upon as derogatory or contemptuous, except in strictly scientific or statistical use. The term, in such use, may be employed to designate any person of the female sex, whether infant, child, adolescent, or adult; as, the city's population included 12,115 males and 15,386 females. As compared with woman (the correlative of man), which emphasizes the essential qualities of the adult female, lady (the correlative of gentleman) connotes rather the externals of social position or refinement. Woman is now preferred by many persons of fastidious taste whenever the reference is to the person merely as a person (as, the country expects the help of its women; the following women assisted in receiving the guests; a woman of culture; a saleswoman; workingwomen; society women). Lady, on the other hand, is preferred when exalted social position, gentle breeding, or refinement and delicacy are definitely implied; as, "Alfonso XI at his death left one legitimate son...and five bastards by a lady of Seville, Doña Leonor de Guzmán" (Cambridge Medieval History); "Miss Nancy...had the essential attributes of a lady—high veracity, delicate honor in her dealings, deference to others, and refined personal habits" (G. Eliot). The term, nevertheless, is frequently used as a mere courteous synonym for woman (as, Please allow these ladies to pass; may I speak to the lady of the house?), but its indiscriminate substitution for woman (as in washlady, saleslady) is disapproved both in America and in Great Britain; as, "I admit that our abuse of the word is villainous. I know of an orator who once said...that 'The ladies were last at the cross and first at the tomb!'"—J. R. Lowell; we once had "seminaries for young ladies" but now we have "women's colleges."

female, adj. Female, feminine, womanly, womanlike, womanish, effeminate, ladylike come into comparison as meaning of, characteristic of, or like a female of the species (especially the human species). Female (opposed to male) applies to animals and plants as well as to human beings, and always suggests sex; as, "the female bee" (Milton); "the female ivy" (Shak.); female children. Feminine (opposed to masculine) alone of these words may imply grammatical gender (as, feminine nouns and pronouns), but it characteristically applies to features, lines, qualities, and the like, which belong to women rather than to men; it has now practically displaced all except the more strictly physiological senses of female; as, "Her heavenly form Angelic, but more soft and feminine" (Millon); "the domestic virtues, which are especially feminine" (Lecky). Womanly (often opposed to girlish or, from another point of view, to manly) is used to qualify anything which evidences the qualities of a fully and usually roundly developed woman (as, womanly virtues); it often specifically suggests qualities which especially befit a woman by reason of her sex or her functions as a wife and mother, such as tenderness, sympathy, moral strength, fortitude, and the like, or the absence of mannish qualities such as aggressiveness; as, "'Twas just a womanly presence, an influence unexpressed" (J. R. Lowell); "All will spy in thy face A blushing, womanly, discovering grace" (Donne). Womanlike (opposed to manlike) is more apt to suggest characteristically feminine faults or foibles; as, "Womanlike, taking revenge too deep for a transient wrong Done but in thought to your beauty" (Tennyson). Womanish (compare mannish, childish) is a term of contempt, especially when applied to that which should be virile or masculine; as, "Art thou a man? thy form cries out thou art: Thy tears are womanish" (Shak.); "womanish or wailing grief" (Cowper). Effeminate emphasizes the idea of unmanly delicacy, luxuriousness, or enervation; as, "A woman impudent and mannish grown Is not more loathed than an effeminate man In time of action" (Shak.); "an effeminate and unmanly foppery" (R. Hurd); "Something feminine—not effeminate, mind—is discoverable in the countenances of all men of genius" (Coleridge). Ladylike is frequently used sarcastically, especially of men, to imply a dainty and finical affectation of the proprieties (as, "fops at all corners, ladylike in mien"—Cowper). The term is also applicable to girls and to women or to their conduct, habits, or manners, in such use suggesting conformity to any standard implied by the term lady; as, "Your daughter may be better paid, better dressed, more gently spoken, more ladylike than you were in the old mill" (Shaw).

Ant. Male. — Con. Masculine, manly, manlike, manful, mannish, virile (see MALE).

feminine. *Female, womanly, womanish, ladylike, womanlike, effeminate.

Ant. Masculine. — Con. *Male, manly, mannish, virile, manlike, manful.

ferment, n. Fermentation, *ebullition, effervescence.

Ana. Leavening or leaven (see corresponding verb at INFUSE): transformation, metamorphosis (see under TRANSFORM): *change, mutation, vicissitude: change, alteration, modification, variation (see under CHANGE, v.).

fermentation. Ferment, *ebullition, effervescence.

Ana. Leavening or leaven (see corresponding verb at INFUSE): agitation, disturbance, perturbation (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE): excitement, stimulation, quickening (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE).

ferocious. *Fierce, truculent, barbarous, savage, inhuman, cruel, fell.

Ana. Infuriated, maddened, enraged (see corresponding verbs at ANGER): rapacious, *voracious, ravening, ravenous: relentless, implacable, merciless, *grim.

Con. *Tame, subdued, submissive.

fertile, fertile, fecund, fruitful, prolific agree in meaning having or manifesting (literally or figuratively) the power to produce fruit (that is, grains, vegetables, cotton, flax, the so-called fruits, etc.) or offspring. The same distinctions in implications and connotations are observable in their corresponding nouns fertility, fecundity, fruitfulness, prolificacy (also prolificity or prolificness—all three being comparatively rare terms in general use). Fertile (opposed to sterile, infertile) applies particularly to that in which seeds take root and grow or may take root and grow because it contains the elements essential to their life and development; as, fertile soil; the fertility of alluvial land. Consequently, the term often applies to that which is exceedingly productive in that it serves as a soil in which ideas take root and thrive; as, a fertile mind; "In the heath's barrenness to the farmer lay its fertility to the historian" (Hardy). "In him [Dr. Johnson] were united a most logical head with a most fertile imagination" (Boswell). The term is also applicable to anything which has in itself the elements essential to its growth and development into a living thing (as, a fertile egg; a fertile seed; hence, a fertile idea or conception) or (especially in scientific use) to any person, any animal, or any pair, that is able to produce normal living young (as, a fertile husband; a fertile couple). Fecund (opposed to barren) applies especially to that which actually yields in abundance or with rapidity fruits, offspring, or by extension, projects, inventions, works of art, or the like; thus, one speaks of the fecundity of a mother if one wishes to imply that she has a large family, but of her fertility if the intent is to indicate that she is not sterile; so, by extension, a fecund (rather than a fertile) inventive genius; a fecund printing press. "If you had been born a Dumas—I am speaking of fecundity...and of nothing else...and could rattle off a romance in a fortnight" (Quiller-Couch). Fruitful may be used in place of fecund (preferably in the case of trees, plants, and the like) and in the place of fertile (in reference to soil or land), but it may also be applied to anything that promotes fertility or fecundity; as, a fruitful tree; soil made fruitful by cultivation; a fruitful rain. Consequently, in its extended sense, it is applicable to anything that bears results, especially useful or profitable results, of almost any kind; as, "the time has always come, and the season is never unripe, for the announcement of the fruitful idea" (J. Morley); "the enormously fruitful discovery [of Pythagoras] that pitch of sound depends upon the length of the vibrating chord" (H. Ellis); "Darwinism...is a fruitful theory of the means by which nature works" (Inge); "The poet...is apt to lack the detachment which alone makes fruitful criticism possible" (Lowes). Prolific is often interchangeable with fecund, especially in the literal senses of both words, but it often suggests even greater rapidity in reproduction and is therefore more frequently used than the latter term in disparagement or derogation, especially when applied to types, races, species, or the like; as, guinea pigs are prolific; "the starling is so prolific that the flocks become immense" (Jefferies); "uncultivated, defective people...are appallingly prolific" (Shaw); "the flabby pseudo-religions in which the modern world is so prolific" (J. W. Kruith). Ana. Producing, bearing, yielding (see BEAR): inventing or inventive, creating or creative (see corresponding verbs at INVENT): quickening, stimulating, provoking, exciting, galvanizing (see PROVOKE).

Ant. Infertile, sterile. — Con. Barren, impotent, unfruitful (see STERILE).

fertility. Fruitfulness, fecundity, prolificacy. See under FERTILE.

Ant. Infertility, sterility. — Con. Impotence or impotency, barrenness, unfruitfulness (see corresponding adjectives at STERILE).

fervor or fervour. Ardor, enthusiasm, *passion, zeal.

Ana. Devoutness, piousness or piety (see corresponding adjectives at DEVOUT): earnestness, seriousness, solemnity (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS): sincerity, heartiness, wholeheartedness (see corresponding adjectives at SINCERE).

festival. *Feast, fete, fiesta.

fetch, v. *Bring, take.

Ana. *Get, obtain, procure: transfer, shift, *move, remove: convey, transport, transmit, *carry, bear.

fetch, n. Wraith, ghost, spirit, specter, shade, revenant, *apparition, phantasm, phantom, spook, haunt.

fete or fête, n. *Feast, festival, fiesta.

fetid or foetid. Noisome, *malodorous, stinking, putrid, rank, rancid, fusty, musty.

Ana. Foul, nasty (see DIRTY): *offensive, loathsome, repulsive, repugnant, revolting.

Ant. Fragrant. — Con. *Odorous, aromatic, redolent, balmy.

fetish. Fetish, talisman, charm, amulet, periapt come into comparison when they designate an object believed to be endowed with the virtue of averting evil or of bringing good fortune. Fetish is applied to any object, either natural (as a snake, an animal's tooth or claw) or artificial (as a piece of carved wood or bone) which is held sacred in the belief that a supernatural spirit has entered into it and invested it with the power to bring success, luck, and freedom from evil to its owner or worshiper. In its literal sense, the word is always connected with the religion of savage or barbarous peoples. Figuratively, it is applied to anything which is unreasonably or irrationally regarded as sacred or sacrosanct; as, to make a fetish of the Constitution. "The mediocre was repellent to them; cant and sentiment made them sick; they made a fetish of hard truth" (R. Macaulay). Talisman, unlike fetish, presupposes a degree of enlightenment, a knowledge of astrology and other occult sciences, and a belief in magical powers. Strictly, it is applied to a cut, incised, or engraved figure or image of a heavenly constellation or planet or to its sign, or to a gem, a piece of metal, or the like, so cut, incised, or engraved. By virtue of this representation it is supposed to be endowed with the same occult influence as that which it represents. "He had stolen from Henry... a Talisman, which rendered its wearer invulnerable" (Stubbs). Figuratively, it is applied to any object that exerts a magical, extraordinary, and usually happy, influence. "The little circle of the schoolboy's copper coin... had proven a talisman, fragrant with good, and deserving to be set in gold and worn next her heart" (N. Hawthorne). "The mere touch of a leaf was a talisman to bring me under the enchantment" (Jefferies). "There is no talisman in the word 'parent' which can generate miracles of affection" (S. Butler). Charm, in its precise use, applies to anything that works a spell repelling evil spirits or influence or attracting favorable ones. It may be used in reference to an incantation, a word, or a form of words, as well as to an object that possesses this power; thus, fetishes and talismans were often carried as charms. "The gallant little Abruzzi cob was decorated with... a panoply of charms against the evil eye" (C. Mackenzie). In its figurative application to a quality in persons or in things it connotes a power to attract or allure that is suggestive of spell-working; as, she has great charm; did you not feel the charm of the painting? Amulet is usually applied to anything worn or carried on the person because of its magical power to preserve one in danger or to protect one from evil, especially from disease. "The French traveller Coudreau... expressly states that 'collars made of jaguars' or bush-hogs' teeth, worn round the neck by small children, are amulets intended to protect them, when they grow bigger, against the attack of ferocious beasts'" (Karsten). In its rare figurative use, it still implies protection. "Righteousness will give you love... but it will not give you an invincible amulet against misfortune" (F. W. Farrar). Periapt, a learned term, is a comprehensive designation, including not only amulets worn because of their reputed magical influence, but any similar objects, such as asafetida bags, carried on the person and credited with physical influences or effects that are not borne out by science.

fetter, v. Shackle, *hamper, trammel, clog, manacle, hog-tie.

Ana. *Hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar, dam: *restrain, curb, snaffle, check: baffle, balk, thwart, foil, *frustrate: bind, *tie.

Con. *Free, liberate, release: *extricate, disencumber, disembarass, disentangle, untangle: disengage, *detach.

feverish. Nervous, restless, restive, uneasy, fidgety, *impatient, skittish, jumpy, jittery, unquiet.

Ana. Agitated, perturbed, disturbed, flustered, flurried (see DISCOMPOSE): excited, stimulated, quickened, galvanized (see PROVOKE).

Con. Nonchalant, unruffled, collected, composed, *cool: *calm, serene, tranquil.

fewer. *Less, lesser, smaller.

fib, n. Untruth, falsehood, *lie, misrepresentation, story.

fib, v. Equivocate, palter, *lie, prevaricate.

fickle. *Inconstant, unstable, capricious, mercurial.

Ana. *Changeable, changeful, variable, protean: *fitful, spasmodic: light, light-minded, frivolous, flighty, volatile (see corresponding nouns at LIGHTNESS).

Ant. Constant, true. — Con. *Faithful, leal, loyal, stanch, steadfast.

fiction. Fiction, figment, fabrication, fable are here compared as meaning a story, an account, an explanation, a conception, or the like, which is an invention of the human mind. Fiction so strongly implies the use of the imagination that it serves as the class name for all prose or poetic writings which deal with imagined characters and situations (or with actual characters or situations with less concern for the historicity of the details than for the telling of an interesting, coherent story). In the sense here particularly considered, a fiction is something that is made up without reference to (often in some defiance of) fact, or reality, or truth, for any one of several motives, such as to avoid telling an unpleasant or inconvenient truth (as, "Adrian... was at a loss what to invent to detain him, beyond the stale fiction that his father was coming tomorrow"—Meredith), or to describe or explain someone or something about whom or which practically nothing is known (as, "Karl Joël... spent fifteen of the best years of his life over the Xenophonic Socrates, to discover that the figure was just as much a fiction as the Platonic Socrates"—H. Ellis), or to impose upon others an interpretation or an assumption that serves one's own ends or that satisfies the unthinking because of its accord with outward appearances (as, "the notion that a business is clothed with a public interest and has been devoted to the public use is little more than a fiction intended to beautify what is disagreeable to the sufferers"—Justice Holmes; "Few of the usual fictions on which society rested had ever required such defiance of facts"—H. Adams), or, especially in legal or scientific use, to provide a convenient assumption or method whereby one can deal with that which is beyond the range of rational or objective proof (as, "The Linnaean and similar classificatory systems are fictions . . . having their value simply as pictures, as forms of representation"—H. Ellis). Fiction may apply to something which appears to be true, or is believed to be in accordance with a higher form of truth (such as "poetic truth," "philosophical truth," "spiritual truth"), or with the demands of reason when they come into conflict with fact, or the world as apprehended by the senses: figment and fabrication, on the other hand, carry no implication of justification and usually suggest a defiance of truth of any kind or degree. Figment usually suggests the operation of fancy or of unlicensed imagination and neglect of fact; as, "The rude, unvarnished gibes with which he demolished every figment of defence" (Stevenson); "This is all a figment of your imagination" (Stevenson). "A sense of unreality was creeping over him. Surely this great Chamber [the House of Commons] . . . did not exist at all but as a gigantic fancy of his own! And all these figures were figments of his brain!" (Galsworthy). Fabrication, in the specific sense here considered, applies to something that is made up with artifice and, usually though not invariably, with the intent to deceive; consequently, it is often used of a fiction that is a deliberate and complete falsehood; as, the common account of his disappearance is a fabrication; the legend, though some of its details are obviously fictitious, cannot be dismissed as a pure fabrication. Fable (as here compared: see also ALLEGORY, 2) applies to a fictitious narrative that is obviously unconcerned with fact, usually because it deals with events or situations that are marvelous, impossible, preposterous, or otherwise incredible; as, "if we may take the story of Job for a history, not a fable" (Defoe); "nothing but whispered suspicions, old wives' tales, fables invented by men who had nothing to do but loaf in the drug-store and make up stories" (S. Anderson). Ana. *Narrative, story, tale, anecdote, yarn: *novel, romance.

fictitious. Fictitious, fabulous, legendary, mythical, apocryphal agree in meaning having the character of that which is invented or imagined as opposed to that which is true or genuine. Although all these words are more or less affected by the nouns derived from the same root (fiction, fable, legend, myth, apocrypha), their fundamental implications come, as a rule, from the root and not from the denotation of the noun. Fictitious commonly implies fabrication and, therefore, more often suggests artificiality or contrivance than intent to deceive or deliberate falsification; as, fictitious characters and events belong in a novel or romance, but not in a history; many authors prefer to assume a fictitious name. In an extended sense fictitious definitely connotes falseness when applied to value, worth, significance, or the like, and suggests its determination by other than the right standards; as, the furore created by this incident gives it a fictitious importance; in booms and in panics the market value of a sound security is often fictitious. Fabulous stresses the marvelousness or incredibility of that which is so described; only at times, however, does the adjective imply a thing's impossibility or nonexistence; as, for a year the company paid fabulous dividends; his letters gave accounts of fabulous exploits; fabulous sea monsters. Legendary usually suggests popular tradition and popular susceptibility to elaboration of details or distortion of historical facts as the basis for a thing's fictitious or fabulous character; as, the legendary deeds of William Tell; the legendary wealth of the Aztecs; the Tarquins, legendary kings of ancient Rome. Mythical, like legendary, usually presupposes the working of the popular imagination, but it distinctively implies a purely fanciful explanation of facts, or the creation of purely imaginary beings, events, etc. Therefore, mythical in its wider modern use is nearly equivalent to imaginary, and implies nonexistence; as, the mythical beings called nymphs; Mrs. Harris, Sairey Gamp's friend in Dickens's "Martin Chuzzlewit," is a mythical character. Apocryphal implies a mysterious or extremely dubious source or origin; in modern use it sometimes suggests merely the lack of authenticity, sometimes spuriousness. "We know them [some of the Elizabethans] unmistakably through their own writings. . . and by a few anecdotes of the kind which, even when apocryphal, remain as evidence of the personal impression that such men must have made upon their contemporaries" (T. S. Eliot). "It is not possible to attach much weight to the Sanson memoirs—they are so plainly apocryphal" (A. Repplier).

See Do not confuse fictitious with factitious.

Ana. Invented, created (see INVENT); *imaginary, fanciful, fantastic: fabricated, fashioned (see MAKE).

Ant. Historical. — Con. *Real, true, actual: *authentic, veritable: veracious, truthful, verisimilitudinous or verisimilar (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH).

fidelity. Fidelity, allegiance, fealty, loyalty, devotion, piety agree in denoting faithfulness to that to which one is bound by a pledge or duty. Fidelity implies strict adherence to that which is a matter of faith or of keeping faith; it presupposes an obligation, sometimes natural, sometimes imposed as a trust, sometimes voluntarily accepted or chosen; as, fidelity to one's word; fidelity in the performance of one's duties; fidelity to one's friends. Sometimes, even when unqualified, it implies marital faithfulness. "With close fidelity and love unfeigned To keep the matrimonial bond unstained" (Cowper). Sometimes it implies faithfulness to the original as in representation, portrayal, quotation, etc. "The Russian . . . finds relief to his sensitiveness in letting his perceptions have perfectly free play, and in recording their reports with perfect fidelity" (Arnold). Allegiance implies adherence to something objective which one serves or follows as a vassal his lord and which demands unswerving fidelity when conflicting obligations dispute its pre-eminence; as, secret societies that exact the allegiance of every member. "But he [the critic] owes no allegiance to anything but to Truth; all other fidelities he must disregard when that is in question" (L. P. Smith). Fealty, like allegiance, implies a supreme obligation to be faithful, but unlike the latter, it stresses the compelling power of one's sense of duty or of consciousness of one's pledged word. "When I do forget The least of these unspeakable deserts, Romans, forget your fealty to me" (Shak.). "The extent to which we are accurate in our thoughts, words, and deeds is a rough measure of our fealty to truth" (P. B. Ballard). Loyalty implies more emotion and closer personal attachment than either fidelity or fealty; it usually connotes steadfastness, sometimes in the face of attempts to alienate one's affections or of a temptation to ignore or renounce one's obligation. "I will follow thee, To the last gasp, with truth and loyalty" (Shak.). Unlike fidelity, loyalty is not invariably regarded as a virtue, especially when personal feeling rather than principle determines it. "[Oxford] home of lost causes, and forsaken beliefs, and unpopular names, and impossible loyalties!" (Arnold). "Indeed, in public life it is generally considered a kind of treachery to change, because people value what they call loyalty above truth" (A. C. Benson). Devotion stresses zeal in service often amounting to self-dedication; it usually also implies ardent attachment. "He set out to prove the loyalty of his nature by devotion to the Queen who had advanced him (Belloc). "There is... something outside of the artist to which he owes allegiance, a devotion to which he must surrender and sacrifice himself" (T. S. Eliot). Piety emphasizes fidelity to obligations regarded as natural or fundamental, such as reverence for one's parents (filial piety), one's race, one's traditions, one's country, or one's God, and observance of all the duties which such reverence requires; thus, filial piety inspires respect for the wishes of parents; religious piety (usually, just "piety") is manifest in faithful and reverent worship. "Having matured in the surroundings and under the special conditions of sea life, I have a special piety toward that form of my past... I have tried with an almost filial regard to render the vibration of life in the great world of waters" (Conrad).

Ana. Faithfulness, constancy, lealty, stanchness, steadfastness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHFUL).

Ant. Faithlessness: perfidy. — Con. Falseness or falsity, disloyalty, treacherness or treachery, traitorousness, perfidiousness (see corresponding adjectives at FAITHLESS).

fidgety. Restless, restive, uneasy, skittish, jumpy, jittery, *impatient, nervous, unquiet, feverish, hectic.

field. 1 Gridiron, diamond, *arena, circus, lists, ring, cockpit, court, rink.

2 Field, domain, province, sphere, territory, bailiwick come into comparison in their extended senses when they denote the limits in which a person, an institution, a department of knowledge, of art, or of human endeavor appropriately or necessarily confines his or its activity or influence and outside of which by implication he or it may not or should not go. Field implies restriction by choice or by necessity but it seldom suggests permanent limitation; thus, a European war narrows the field of commerce for neutral American nations; he chose the development of industries in the South as his field of investigation; "The philosopher and the practical man... each is in his own field, supreme" (Buckle). Domain is used chiefly, but not exclusively, in reference to departments of knowledge, of art, and of human endeavor viewed abstractly; it implies exclusive possession and control of a clearly defined field, and a title to regard all outside interference or all intrusion into that field as trespass or invasion; as, the domain of science; the domain of the spiritual. "What is the difference between the legitimate music of verse and the music it attains by trespassing on the domain of a sister art?" (Babbitt). "Those who believe in the reality of a world of the spirit—the poet, the artist, the mystic—are at one in believing that there are other domains than that of physics" (Jeans). Province is used in reference not only to the sciences, arts, etc., each of which may be said to have its own domain, but also to any person or institution that because of his or its office, aims, special character, or the like, can be said to have jurisdiction, competence, power, or influence within clearly defined limits; as, it is within the province of a parent rather than of a teacher to discipline a pupil for misconduct out of school; it is often stated that art goes beyond its province when it attempts to teach morals. "From Tokyo I went to Peiping, where the China Medical Board was already at work. Its activities did not fall within my province [as an expert on sanitation], but I was frequently consulted" (V. Heiser).

Province is also used figuratively in the sense of function (see also FUNCTION, n., 1) and in the sense of a part of a larger domain. "I should like the reader to accept engineering as a province of physics: so that the feats of the one may serve as credentials for the discoveries of the other" (Karl K. Darrow). Sphere, even more than domain, throws emphasis on clear circumscription of limits; it therefore suggests apartness rather than fundamental differences, and carries no hint of danger of trespass or interference. "The aesthetic and ethical spheres... were never sharply distinguished by the Greeks" (G. L. Dickinson). "In the sphere of morals we must often be content to wait until our activity is completed to appreciate its beauty or its ugliness" (H. Ellis). "In the life of a man whose circumstances and talents are not very exceptional there should be a large sphere where what is vaguely termed 'herd instinct' dominates, and a small sphere into which it does not penetrate" (B. Russell). Territory comes very close to domain in implying a field possessed and controlled and regarded as one's own; it does not, however, carry the implications so strong in domain of rightful ownership, of sovereignty, and of the title to inviolability; it may even suggest that the field has been usurped or taken over by the science, art, activity, etc., in question. "Prose has pre-empted a lion's share of the territory once held, either in sovereignty or on equal terms, by poetry" (Lowes). "If passage-ways connect the domain of physics with the domains of life or of spirit, physics ought in time to discover these passage-ways, for they start from her own territory" (Jeans). Bailiwick, literally the jurisdiction of a bailiff (see POLICEMAN), is increasingly used during recent years in an extended and humorous sense in reference to an individual and the special and limited province or domain in which he may or does exercise authority. It often also carries a connotation of petty yet despotic display of power; as, a politician whose influence does not extend beyond his own bailiwick; he will not get along with others until he learns to keep within his own bailiwick. "We may neither be angry nor gay in the presence of the moon, nor may we dare to think in her bailiwick" (J. Stephens).

Ana. Limits, bounds, confines (see singular nouns at LIMIT): extent, area, *size, magnitude.

fiend. 1 *Demon, devil, daemon.

2 *Addict, votary, devotee, habitué, fan.

fiendish. Fiendish, devilish, diabolical, diabolic, demoniacal, demonic come into comparison when they mean having or manifesting the qualities associated with infernal or hellish beings called devils, demons, and fiends. Fiendish commonly implies excessive cruelty or malignity; as, fiendish tortures; "the fiendish joy that illumined his usually stolid countenance sent a sudden disgust and horror through me" (Hudson). Devilish frequently suggests abnormal wickedness of whatever sort (as, devilish orgies; devilish treachery), but it often also suggests superhuman or Satanic ingenuity or craft, capacity for destruction, or the like (as, "[Leonardo da Vinci] showed no compunction in planning devilish engines of military destruction"—H. Ellis). The term is often loosely used as an intensive with a coarsely humorous connotation; as, "devilish good dinner" (Dickens). Diabolical often (and sometimes devilish) connotes colder and more calculating malevolence than fiendish; as, diabolical cruelty; diabolical ingenuity; a diabolical sneer; "People suffering from the paranoia of persecution often imagine that they are the victims of a diabolical secret society" (A. Huxley). Diabolic is often used interchangeably with diabolical, and vice versa, but the former term is preferred by careful writers when the reference is to devils as individuals of a given character or origin rather than to their malign qualities; as, "the difference between the angelic and the diabolic temperament" (Shaw); "[The heroic age's] heroes were doughty men to whom diabolic visitors were no more unusual than angelic ones" (J. W. Krutch). Demoniacal frequently suggests frenzy or excesses, as of one "possessed"; as, demoniacal strength; demoniacal laughter. Demoniac and demonic, though sometimes synonymous with demoniacal, more frequently suggest in recent usage (chiefly under the influence of Goethe) the inexplicable or superhuman element in life, or especially, in genius (in this sense the preferred word and spelling is now daemonic [see daemon under DEMON]); as, "In the solidest kingdom of routine and the senses, he [Goethe] showed the lurking demonic power" (Emerson); "the rapt, demonic features of the Magic Muse" (Hewlett).

Ana. Hellish, *infernal: malign, malefic, baleful, *sinister: malignant, malevolent, *malicious.

fierce. Fierce, truculent, ferocious, barbarous, savage, inhuman, cruel, fell come into comparison when they mean displaying fury or malignity in looks or in actions. Fierce, as here compared, is applied largely to men or to beasts that inspire terror because of their menacing aspect or their unrestrained fury in attack. "The other Shape...black it stood as night, Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as Hell, And shook a dreadful dart" (Milton). "No bandit fierce, no tyrant mad with pride" (Pope). Truculent, though it implies fierceness, especially of aspect, suggests the intent to inspire terror or to threaten rather than the achievement of that intention. Consequently, it often implies a bullying attitude or pose. It is applied chiefly, but not exclusively, to persons, groups of persons, and nations; as, a group of truculent schoolboys. "He [Carlyle's 'Hero'] must...worry them toward the fold like a truculent sheep dog" (J. R. Lowell). "The America that [Theodore] Roosevelt dreamed of was always a sort of swollen Prussia, truculent without and regimented within" (Mencken). Ferocious not only connotes extreme fierceness but it implies actions suggestive of a wild beast on a rampage or in an attack on its prey; it therefore usually implies unrestrained violence, extreme fury, and wanton brutality; as, a ferocious attack on the enemy; to take a ferocious revenge; a particularly ferocious dog. Barbarous (see also BARBARIAN) in its extended sense applies only to civilized persons or their actions; it implies a harshness, a brutality, and often, a ferocity possible among primitive or uncivilized men but unworthy of human beings in an advanced state of culture; as, "the barbarous pleasures of the chase" (J. Morley); barbarous treatment of prisoners; barbarous methods of warfare. Savage (see also BARBARIAN) implies an absence of the restraints imposed by civilization or of the inhibitions characteristic of civilized man when dealing with those whom he hates or fears or when filled with rage, lust, or other violent passion; as, a savage desire for revenge; savage punishment of a disobedient child; a savage criticism of a book; "the savage wars of religion" (Inge). Inhuman is even stronger than savage, for it suggests not so much undue violence or lack of restraint as absence of all feeling that normally characterizes a human being: on the one hand it may suggest bestiality or wanton brutality, or on the other hand it may imply absence of all capacity for love, kindness, or pity; as, an inhuman mother; "Thy deed, inhuman and unnatural" (Shak.). "Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless thousands mourn!" (Burns). Cruel implies an inhuman indifference to the suffering of others and even a positive pleasure in witnessing it or in inflicting it. "Her mouth crueler than a tiger's, colder than a snake's, and beautiful beyond a woman's" (Swinburne). "As cruel as a schoolboy ere he grows To pity" (Tennyson). Fell, now rhetorical or poetic, connotes dire or baleful cruelty. "Unsex me here, And fill me from the crown to the toe top-full Of direst cruelty! ... Stop up the access and passage to remorse, That no compunctious visitings of nature Shake my fell purpose" (Shak.).

Ana. Menacing, threatening (see THREATEN): infuriated, maddened, enraged (see corresponding verbs at ANGER): ravening, ravenous, rapacious, *voracious: *fearful, terrible, horrible, horrific.

Ant. Tame; mild.

fiery. *Spirited, high-spirited, peppery, gingery, mettlesome, spunky.

Ana. Impetuous, *precipitate, headlong: passionate, pervid, ardent, *impassioned, fervid: vehement, *intense.

fiesta. Fete, *feast, festival.

fight, n. Combat, fray, affray, conflict, *contest.

Ana. Struggle, striving (see under ATTEMPT, v.): strife, contention, conflict, dissension, *discord, variance.

fight, v. Battle, war, *contend, cope.

Ana. Struggle, strive (see ATTEMPT): dispute, debate (see DISCUSS): wrangle, squabble, quarrel, altercation (see under QUARREL, n.).

figment. Fabrication, fable, *fiction.

Ana. Fancy, fantasy, dream, daydream, nightmare: invention, creation (see corresponding verbs at INVENT).

Ana. *Outline, contour, profile, silhouette: *character, symbol, sign, mark.

2 Figure, pattern, design, motif, device come into comparison when they mean a unit in a decorative composition, in an ornamented textile or fabric, or the like, consisting of a representation of a natural, conventionalized, or imaginary shape or a combination of such representations. Figure commonly refers to a small, simple unit which is repeated or is one of those repeated over an entire surface. A figure may be either one of the outlines commonly associated with geometry (geometrical figures) such as triangles, diamonds, pentagons, circles, and the like, or such an outline filled in with color, lines, or a representation of another kind: it may, however, be a natural or conventionalized leaf, flower, animal, or the like; as, an Oriental rug with geometrical figures in blue and red; a silk print with a small figure; the wallpaper has a well-spaced figure of a spray of rosebuds; "Carved with figures strange and sweet, All made out of the carver's brain" (Coleridge). Pattern may be used in place of figure (as, "arranged in a series of simple and pleasing patterns—diamonds, quincunxes, hexagons"—A. Huxley) but figure is not interchangeable with the more inclusive senses of pattern. The latter term is applicable not only to the simplest repeated unit, or figure, or to a larger repeated unit involving several related figures, but also to the whole plan of decoration or adornment (as, the pattern of a lace tablecloth; the pattern of a rug). Also, pattern may be used of other things than those which are visible, objective works of art and craftsmanship, but which nevertheless can be viewed or studied as having diverse parts or elements brought together so as to present an intelligible and distinctive whole; as, the true pattern of the campaign revealed itself after the first week; "when he said pattern, he did not mean the pattern on a wall paper; he meant the pattern of life" (V. Sackville-West); "as skepticism grows, the pattern of human conduct inevitably changes" (J. W. Krutch); "The nearness of friends in those days, the familiar, unchanging streets, the convivial clubs, the constant companionship helped to knit the strands of life into a close and well-defined pattern" (A. Repplier). Design (as here considered: see also PLAN, INTENTION) is not always clearly distinguishable from the sense in which it is considered at PLAN, for both stress the disposition of details with the result that a pattern is produced: as here considered, however, design emphasizes drawing and arrangement and attention to line and the handling of figures and colors: it often specifically denotes a single unit (figure or pattern) which reveals these qualities; as, "Branches and leaves were disposed, not as combinations of colour in mass, but as designs in line" (Binyon); "Your golden filaments in fair design Across my duller fibre" (Millay). Motif (for fuller consideration, see SUBJECT, 2) is frequently used in the decorative arts for a figure or a design which stands out not necessarily as the only one, but as the leading one which gives the distinctive character of the whole; as, in lace for ecclesiastical use a sheaf of wheat is often the motif of the pattern. Device applies usually to a figure that bears no likeness to anything in nature but is the result of imagination or fancy. Unlike the other terms (as here considered), it does not exclusively apply to a decorative unit, though it occurs frequently in that application; as, "Set in the close-grained wood Were quaint devices; Patterns in ambers, And in the clouded green of jades" (Amy Lowell).

Ana. Compute, *calculate, reckon, estimate: *count, enumerate, number.

filch, v. Purloin, lift, pilfer, *steal, pinch, snitch, swipe, cop.

Ana. Snatch, grab, *take, seize, grasp: *rob, plunder, loot, rifle, thief.

fillet, n. *Strip, band, ribbon, stripe.

filthy. *Dirty, foul, squalid, nasty.

Ana. Slovenly, unkempt, sloppy, *slipshod: *offensive, loathsome, repulsive, revolting.

Ant. Neat, spick-and-span. — Con. Cleaned, cleansed (see CLEAN, v.): *clean, cleanly: tidy, trim, trig, shipshape (see NEAT).

final. Terminal, concluding, *last, latest, ultimate, extreme, eventual.

Ana. Closing, ending, terminating (see CLOSE, v.): decisive, determinative, *conclusive, definitive.

financial. Financial, monetary, pecuniary, fiscal, bursal come into comparison as meaning of or relating to the possession, the making, or the expenditure of money. Financial implies a relation to money matters in general, especially as conducted on a large scale; as, the financial concerns of the company are attended to by the treasurer; the financial position of the bank is sound; the financial interests of the country; the city is in financial difficulties. Monetary implies a much more direct reference to money as such, and therefore often connotes the coinage, distribution, circulation, or the like, of money; as, the monetary unit; the monetary systems of Europe; the monetary standard; monetary gifts. Pecuniary suggests a reference to the practical uses of money; it is often, but not exclusively, employed in preference to financial when money matters that are personal or on a small scale are being considered; as, to ask for pecuniary aid; he is always in pecuniary difficulties; he works only for pecuniary motives. Both fiscal and the less frequent bursal imply reference to the financial affairs of a state, a sovereign, a corporation, an institution, or the like, whose concerns with revenue and expenditures are managed by a treasurer (or bursar) or treasury department; as, the fiscal year in the United States ends on June 30;

a fiscal officer of the crown; the bursal year of a college. fine, n. Amercement (see under PENALIZE).

fine, v. *Penalize, amerce, mulct, scone.

finger man. Gunman, trigger man, *assassin, cutthroat, bravo.

finical or finicking or finicky. Particular, fussy, fastidious, *nice, dainty, squeamish, pernickety.

Ana. Exacting, demanding (see DEMAND, v.): captious, carping, hypercritical, *critical: dapper, spruce, natty (see STYLISH): meticulous, punctilious, *careful: conscientious, scrupulous (see UPRIGHT).

Con. *Slipshod, sloppy, slovenly: *slatternly, dowdy, blowzy, frowzy.

finish, v. Complete, conclude, *close, end, terminate.

Ana. Achieve, accomplish, effect, fulfill (see PERFORM): *polish, burnish, furbish, shine.

finished. *Consummate, accomplished.

Ana. *Perfect, entire, intact, whole: refined, cultivated, cultured (see corresponding nouns at CULTURE): *suave, urbane, smooth: elegant, exquisite (see CHOICE).

Ant. Crude. — Con. *Rude, rough, raw, callow, green.

fire, v. 1. Kindle, enkindle, ignite, inflame, *light.

Ana. *Burn, scorch, char: *blaze, flame, flare, glare, glow: *illuminate, lighten.

2. Animate, inspire, *inform.

Ana. Excite, *provoke, stimulate, galvanize: *thrill, electrify: *stir, rouse, arouse: enliven, *quicken, vivify.

Ant. Daunt. — Con. *Dismay, appall.

3. Discharge, *dismiss, cashier, sack, bounce, drop.

Ana. *Eject, oust, expel: *discard.

firearms. See under WEAPON.

firm, adj. Firm, hard, solid are here compared chiefly as meaning having a texture or consistency that markedly resists deformation by external force. Firm (opposed to loose, flabby) suggests such closeness or compactness of texture, or a consistency so heavy or substantial, that the substance or material quickly returns to shape or is difficult to pull, distort, cut, or the like; as, a firm cloth; firm muscles or flesh; firm jellies; firm ground. Hard (opposed to soft; see HARD, 3) implies impenetrability or relatively complete resistance to pressure, tension, or the like; but unlike firm, hard rarely implies elasticity; as, hard as adamant; hard as steel; hard ice. Solid, as opposed to fluid, implies such density and coherence in the mass as enable a thing to maintain a fixed form in spite of external deforming forces (as, solid substances; solid mineral matter); as opposed to flimsy, the term implies a structure or construction that renders a thing sound, strong, or stable (as, solid furniture; a solid foundation; "the bungalow was a very solid one"—Kipling); as opposed to hollow, it implies the absence of empty spaces within the structure or mass and, usually, the same or similar density and hardness of material throughout; as, a solid rubber tire; a solid wall.

Figuratively, firm implies stability, fixedness, or resolution (as, a firm purpose; a firm belief; to guide with a firm hand); hard implies obduracy or lack of feeling (as, a hard master; a hard bargain; "She was firm, but she was not hard"—Arch. Marshall); solid usually implies substantiality or genuineness (as, a solid meal; solid facts; solid virtues; solid attainments) but it may imply absolute reliability or seriousness of purpose (as, solid bankers or banks; a solid character; a solid book) or unbroken continuity as in time, group feeling or opinion, or the like (as, to put in a solid week on a piece of work; the solid vote of the members).

Ana. Compact, *close, dense, thick: tough, tenacious, *strong: *stiff, rigid, inflexible.

Ant. Loose, flabby. — Con. Flaccid, *limp, lippy, flimsy, sleazy.

firm, v. *Set, settle, fix, establish.

Ana. *Implant, infix, inculcate: *secure, anchor, moor, rivet.

fiscal. *Financial, bursal, monetary, pecuniary.

fish, v. Fish, angle agree in meaning to attempt to catch fish; in the case of fish, with any kind of apparatus, and as a sport or an occupation; in the case of angle (chiefly literary, except in the derivative angler), with hook, bait, line, and (usually) rod, and as a sport. Both words are used, without perceptible distinction, in the figurative sense to seek to obtain or win by artifice; as, to fish for a compliment. "Modesty is the only sure bait, when you angle for praise" (Chesterfield). "The first woman who fishes for him, hooks him" (Thackeray). "She knew her distance and did angle for me, Madding my eagerness with her restraint" (Shak.).

fit, adj. Fit, suitable, meet, proper, appropriate, fitting, apt, happy, felicitous are comparable when they mean right with respect to the nature, condition, circumstances, or use of the thing qualified. That is fit which is adapted or adaptable to the end in view, the use proposed, or the work to be done; as, food fit for a king. "But when to mischief mortals bend their will, How soon they find fit instruments of ill!" (Pope). "Never even in the most perfect days of my development as an artist could I have found words fit to bear so august a burden" (Wilde). Sometimes, in addition, fit connotes competence or the possession of the required qualifications; as, men fit to command; he is not a fit father for his children; they do not know what the boy is fit for. "And fit audience find, though few" (Milton). Other times it suggests readiness, as in condition, state of health, mood, inclination, or the like; as, the vessel is now fit for service; he played tennis to keep fit; "he... keeps you standing till you are fit to sink" (Newman). That is suitable which answers the requirements or demands of the occasion, the circumstances, the conditions, and the like, or suggests no incongruity with them; as, that is not a suitable costume for this season of the year; behavior suitable to one's age and station in life. "A Cambridge don pronounced a suitable epitaph [on Paley's Evidences] when he said that Paley had the merit of reducing Christianity to a form eminently fitted for examination purposes" (Inge). In discriminating use, that is meet which is not only suitable but nicely adapted to the particular situation, need, circumstances, or the like; the word usually suggests rightness or justness rather than an absence of incongruity; thus, a punishment of a childish offense may be suitable if it is in accord with the years and mentality of the child, but it may not be described as meet unless it suggests due proportion between the offense and its penalty. "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord" (Bk. of Com. Prayer). "Those common phrases which it is peculiarly meet to call counters... have become so common to use because so fit to use" (H. Ellis). That is proper (see also DECOROUS) which belongs to a thing by nature, by custom, by right reason, or on any justifiable grounds; as, water is the proper element for fish; the proper observance of Memorial Day; the article brought but half its proper price. When, as often happens, fitness or suitability is stressed rather than natural or rightful association, proper then implies determination of fitness or suitability by right reason or good judgment. "The proper study of mankind is man" (Pope). "[According to Aristotle] the thing to aim at is to be angry 'on the proper occasions and with the proper people in the proper manner and for the proper length of time'" (G. L. Dickinson). That is appropriate which is so eminently fit or suitable that it seems to belong peculiarly or distinctively to the person or thing with which it is associated, sometimes giving him or it a distinguishing grace or charm through its very congruity. "An excitement in which we can discriminate two sorts of elements, the passions appropriate to the subject and the passion proper to the artist" (S. Alexander). "The eighteenth-century gentleman spoke with a refined accent, quoted the classics on appropriate occasions" (B. Russell). "We have agreed that our writing should be appropriate... that it should rise and fall with the subject, be grave where that is serious, where it is light not afraid of what Stevenson... calls 'a little judicious levity'" (Quiller-Couch). That is fitting which is in harmony with the spirit, the tone, the mood, the purpose, or the like; "news fitting to the night, Black, fearful, comfortless and horrible" (Shak.). "And made a fitting song, of words but few, Somewhat his woeful heart to make more light" (Wordsworth). That is apt (as here considered: see also APT, 2; QUICK, 3) which is nicely fitted by its nature or construction to attain the end desired, to accomplish the purpose in view, or to achieve the results contemplated. "It was recognized that while one style was suited to one set of themes, another was apt for another set" (Binyon). "Fourier... invented a mathematical process which was not only suitable for handling his problem, but proved to be so universally apt that there is hardly a field of science or of engineering which it has not penetrated" (Karl K. Darrow). "Before we can consider the aptness of political ideas or the adequacy of political machinery" (Frankfurter). That is happy (as here compared: see also GLAD, LUCKY) which is singularly appropriate and apt, and therefore brilliantly successful or effective considered in its relation to the situation, the conditions, or other important factors; as, a happy choice of words, nicely expressing the subtlety of his thought; "I never saw such happy manners!—so much ease, with such perfect good-breeding!" (Austen); "whether a composite language like the English is not a happier instrument of expression than a homogeneous one like the German" (Coleridge). That is felicitous which is most opportunely, tellingly, or gracefully happy; as, "I do not like mottoes but where they are singularly felicitous" (Lamb); "some of the most felicitous turns of thought and phrase in poetry are the result of a flash of inspiration under the happy [i.e., fortunate] guidance of a rhyme" (Lowes); "let us inquire... whether the relation of the figures to each other and of groups to the space they occupy is a felicitous one" (Binyon).

Ana. Adapted or adaptable, adjusted or adjustable, conformed or conformable (see corresponding verbs at ADAPT): qualified, capable, *able, competent.

Ant. Unfit.

fit, n. Fit, attack, access, accession, paroxysm, spasm, convulsion come into comparison when they denote a sudden seizure or spell resulting from an abnormal condition of body or mind. The last three are too specific in their technical medical senses to be synonyms of the others (except of fit in its narrower significations), but in their extended senses they are frequently closely parallel. Fit is often used narrowly: sometimes to designate a sudden stroke which manifests a disease such as epilepsy and apoplexy and which is characterized by conditions such as violent muscular contractions and unconsciousness; as, to fall in a fit; sometimes to designate a period in which there is a marked increase of a physical disturbance characteristic of a disease; as, hysteria often reveals itself in fits of alternate laughing and weeping. In its wider application, fit still may imply suddenness and violence, but it emphasizes temporariness; as, a fit of "the blues"; he works only by fits and starts. Occasionally, it suggests nothing more than the unusual and passing character of the condition, and is applied to things as well as to persons; as, to enjoy a fit of laziness; a fit of bad weather. Attack always implies a sudden and often violent onslaught, but carries no suggestion of length of duration; as, frequent attacks of pain; an attack of melancholy; a prolonged attack of bronchitis. Access and accession, though often interchangeable with attack, distinctively imply the initiation of an attack or fit and often come close in meaning to outbreak or outburst. "Now and then an access of . . . sudden fury . . . would lay hold on a man" (Kipling). "One of his sudden sharp accessions of impatience at the leisurely motions of the Trujillo boy" (M. Austin). Occasionally, they also connote intensification, as of a mood or state of mind, to the point where control is lost or nearly lost. "Her evident, but inexplicable, access of misery" (G. Meredith). In their technical medical senses, paroxysm, spasm, and convulsion are sudden and usually short attacks, especially characteristic of certain diseases. The distinguishing marks of a paroxysm are intensification of a symptom, such as coughing, and recurrence of attacks; those of spasm are sudden involuntary muscular contraction, in some cases producing rigidity of the body or constriction of a passage and in others producing alternate contractions and relaxations of the muscles; those of convulsion are of repeated spasms of the latter kind affecting the whole or a large part of the body and producing violent contortions of the muscles and distortion of features. The implications of these technical senses are usually carried over into the figurative senses. Paroxysm commonly occurs in the plural and suggests recurrent, violent attacks; as, the girls went into paroxysms of laughter; throughout the night, he suffered paroxysms of fear. Spasm, especially when used of emotional disturbances, often implies possession by something that for a moment grips and paralyzes. "She could scarcely even look at the wall without a spasm of fear" (Bennett). When used in the plural, it usually suggests the more or less rapid alternation of contrasting moods or states of mind; as, he worked only by spasms (or, spasmodically). Convulsion implies definite physical effects accompanying the mood or state of mind, and closely resembling those symptomatic of disease. "The ragged crew actually laughed at me . . . some of them literally throwing themselves down on the ground in convulsions of unholy mirth" (Kipling).

Ana. Stroke, shock (see PARALYSIS).

fitful. Fitful, spasmodic, convulsive come into comparison only when they mean lacking steadiness or regularity as in course, movement, succession of acts or efforts, or the like. Fitful stresses variability and intermittency: it implies an irregular succession characterized by fits and starts; as, "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well" (Shak.); "the fitful gloom and sudden lambencies of the room by firelight" (De Quincey); "a fitful, undecided rain" (Kipling); "a fitful wind swept the cheerless waste" (Conrad). Spasmodic implies fitfulness, but it further suggests marked alternations, as of violent activity and inactivity, or of great effort and of negligible effort, or of zeal or enthusiasm and lack of interest: it therefore implies, even more than fitful, an opposition to that which is sustained at a high pitch; as, spasmodic efforts to reform municipal government; spasmodic energy; spasmodic industry; "I think Beethoven is rather spasmodically, than sustainedly, grand" (FitzGerald). A school of nineteenth-century English authors (notably Bailey, the author of "Festus," and Sydney Dobell) has been called the "spasmodic school" in allusion to frequent attempts to reach heights of expression that show by contrast the banality of other passages. Convulsive differs from the preceding terms in not implying intermittency, and in stressing unsteadiness, strain (often overstrain), and the lack of regular rhythm which is the sign of control, especially of muscular, mental, or spiritual control; as, a convulsive rise and fall of the breast; the convulsive movement of the earth characteristic of an earthquake.

Ana. *Intermittent, periodic, recurrent: desultory, hit-or-miss, *random, haphazard.

Ant. Constant (sense 2). — Con. *Steady, uniform, even, equable: regular, methodical, systematic, *orderly.

fitting, adj. Appropriate, proper, meet, suitable, *fit, apt, happy, felicitous.

Ana. *Relevant, pertinent, germane, apposite, apropos: seemly, *decorous, decent, proper, comme il faut: congruous, *consonant: harmonious, concordant, accordant (see corresponding nouns at HARMONY).

Ant. Unfitting.

fix, v. 1 *Set, settle, establish, firm.

Ana. *Stabilize, steady: determine, *decide, rule, settle: *prescribe, define.

Ant. Alter: abrogate (a custom, rule, law, etc.). — Con. Modify, *change, vary: supplant, supersede, displace, *replace.

2 *Fasten, attach, affix.

Ana. *Implant, infix, instill, inculcate: *secure, rivet, anchor, moor.

Con. Eradicate, uproot, extirpate (see EXTERMINATE): upset, *overturn, overthrow, subvert.

3 *Adjust, regulate.

Ana. Repair, *mend, patch, rebuild, remodel: *correct, rectify, revise, amend, emend.

Con. Derange, disarrange, disorganize, unsettle, *disorder.

fix, n. *Predicament, plight, dilemma, quandary, scrape, jam, pickle.

flabbergast. Amaze, astound, astonish, *surprise.

Ana. Dumfound, confound, bewilder, nonplus, perplex (see PUZZLE): disconcert, rattle, faze, discomfit (see EMBARRASS).

flabby. Flaccid, lippy, *limp, flimsy, sleazy.

Ana. *Loose, relaxed, slack, lax: *soft: yielding, caving in (see YIELD, v.): *powerless, impotent: spiritless, listless, enervated, *languid.

Ant. Firm. — Con. Hard, solid (see FIRM): *tight, taut, tense: tough, tenacious, sturdy, *strong: plucky, gritty (see corresponding nouns at FORTITUDE).

flaccid. Flabby, lippy, *limp, flimsy, sleazy.

Ana. Slack, relaxed, lax, *loose: unnerved, enervated, emasculated (see UNNERVE): weakened, debilitated, enfeebled, sapped (see WEAKEN).

Ant. Resilient. — Con. *Elastic, springy, flexible, supple: limber, lithe (see SUPPLE): *vigorous, energetic, lusty, nervous.

flag, n. Flag, ensign, standard, banner, color (or colour), streamer, pennant (or pendant), pennon, jack are not always clearly distinguished. Flag, the comprehensive term, is applied to any piece of cloth that typically, but not invariably, is rectangular, is attached to a staff, halyard, or line, and carries an arrangement of colors, an emblematic figure or figures, or a motto. The purpose of a flag is primarily to serve as a sign or symbol of a nation, a branch of the service, an organization, an office, or the like, but it may also serve as a signal, as in military or naval operations, or in giving information, as of a weather change or the approach of a train; as, the flag of England; the admiral's flag; a flag of truce; a trainman's flag. Ensign is applied chiefly to a flag that indicates nationality, and specifically to one flown by ships at sea; as, the Stars and Stripes is the national ensign of the United States; of the three ensigns of Great Britain, the white ensign is flown by ships of the Royal Navy, by naval barracks, etc., the red ensign by British merchant vessels, and the blue ensign by certain vessels commanded by officers of the Royal Naval Reserve and by certain classes of government vessels not part of the navy. Standard and banner are now more or less literary terms for the flag of a country, a party, a religious, civic, or patriotic organization, or the like, thought of as a rallying point or as something to be followed. Standard especially suggests the former because the term originally designated and still often designates a flag or a sculptured figure raised on a pole so as to be a gathering point for all who belong under it. "As armies at the call Of trumpet . . . Troop to the standard" (Milton). Banner was earliest applied to a flag (often hung downward from a crosspiece instead of flying from a staff) of an emperor, king, lord, or the like. Banners were flown from windows or doors, or carried aloft at the head of a procession, such as of troops marching to war. "Hang out our banners on the outward walls; The cry is still 'They come'" (Shak.). "Terrible as an army with banners" (Song of Solomon vi. 4). Color (most frequently found in the plural colors) applies generally to any national flag or ensign but specifically to the flag of a particular regiment or battalion of infantry, artillery, or engineers (that of the cavalry being called a standard); the word commonly suggests military, sometimes naval, activity, as in mobilization (as, to call to the colors), in ceremonial exercises (as, to hoist the colors, to troop the colors), or in capture or conquest (as, "The British colors were planted on the summit of the breach"—Wellington). The last four terms here discriminated are even more specific and definite in their implications than those already considered. Streamer applies to any flag that floats in the wind but it usually suggests a long, ribbonlike flag carried at the masthead of a government vessel in commission; penant, and in British naval use, pendant (pronounced like pennant), apply to a streamer that is long, narrow, and tapering. Pennant, however, is even more often used to denote a narrow flag, typically triangular, which is flown by ships, which is used in signaling and in decorating, or which is exhibited, as by a baseball club, as a sign of championship. Pennon, the earliest spelling for a flag that suggests a wing, was applied originally to a small streamer attached to a lance or to the top of a helmet, especially of a knight bachelor in the Middle Ages. It is now used instead of color in designating the flag of a lancer regiment. Jack denotes a small oblong flag which is hoisted on a staff at the bow or bowsprit cap of a ship or is used in signaling. In Great Britain and in the United States, the jack carries the same design as that carried by the upper left-hand section of the national ensign; thus, the British jack (specifically the union jack) displays three crosses, the cross of St. George, the cross of St. Andrew, the cross of St. Patrick, and symbolizes the union of England, Scotland, and Ireland; the American jack has a blue field with white stars equal in number to the states comprising the United States.

flagitious. Nefarious, infamous, iniquitous, villainous, *vicious, corrupt, degenerate.

Ana. Scandalous, criminal, sinful (see corresponding nouns at OFFENSE): shameful, disgraceful (see corresponding nouns at DISGRACE): *flagrant, gross, glaring.

flagrant. Flagrant, glaring, gross, rank come into comparison as intensives, often derogatory intensives, meaning conspicuously or outstandingly bad, unpleasant, or the like. Flagrant (etymologically, flaming) now usually applies to offenses, transgressions, or errors which are so bad that they cannot escape notice or be condoned; as, his treatise is marked by several flagrant errors; a flagrant abuse of the executive power; flagrant injustice; "open and flagrant mutiny" (Kipling); "in flagrant violation of all the New York proprieties" (E. Wharton). Glaring carries an even stronger implication of obtrusiveness than flagrant: the term is often applied to that which is so evident or so conspicuous that it inflicts pain upon the observer, such as too vivid a color, too harsh a light, an error which stares one in the face, or the like; as, a glaring fault in a design; a glaring inconsistency in his argument; his second novel is in glaring contrast to his first novel; "This evil is so glaring, so inexcusable" (Shaw). Gross (as here compared: see also COARSE; WHOLE, 2) is even more derogatory than flagrant or glaring because it suggests a magnitude or degree of badness that is beyond all bounds and wholly inexcusable or unpardonable: however, the term is not so often referred to evil acts or serious offenses as it is to human attitudes, qualities, or faults that merit severe condemnation; as, gross carelessness; gross stupidity; gross superstition; "Elizabethan and Jacobean poetry . . . had serious defects, even gross faults" (T. S. Eliot); "The hero is as gross an imposture as the heroine" (Shaw). Rank (as here compared: see also RANK, 1) applies chiefly, though far from exclusively, to nouns that are terms of reproach: it implies that the person or thing described by such a term is extremely, utterly, or violently that which he (or it) is declared to be; as, "O, my offence is rank, it smells to heaven" (Shak.); "till she looked less of a rank lunatic" (Meredith); "A powerfully prayerful Highland regiment, officered by rank Presbyterians" (Kipling); rank heresy; rank nonsense; it would be rank madness to attempt such a journey in this weather.

Ana. Heinous, *outrageous, atrocious, monstrous: conspicuous, outstanding, *noticeable: notorious (see FAMOUS): nefarious, flagitious, infamous (see VICIOUS).

flamboyant. *Ornate, florid, rococo, baroque.

Ana. Luxuriant, exuberant (see PROFUSE): resplendent, gorgeous, glorious, *splendid: dashing, brave (see STYLISH): ostentatious, *showy, pretentious: flashy, *gaudy.

flame, n. Blaze, flare, glare, glow. See under BLAZE, v.

Ana. Effulgence, radiance, brilliance or brilliancy, refulgence, luminosity, brightness (see corresponding adjectives at BRIGHT): ardor, fervor, *passion: flashing, coruscation, gleaming, scintillation (see corresponding verbs at FLASH).

flame, v. *Blaze, flare, glare, glow.

Ana. *Flash, gleam, glance, glint, coruscate: *burn: fire, ignite, kindle, *light.

flare, v. Glare, flame, *blaze, glow.

Ana. Dart, shoot (see FLY): flutter, flicker (see FLIT): rise, arise, *spring: *flash, glance, glint, coruscate, scintillate: kindle, *light, fire.

Ant. Gutter out.

flare, n. Glare, flame, blaze, glow. See under BLAZE, v.

Ana. Rising or rise, surging or surge, towering (see corresponding verbs at RISE): darting or dart, shooting (see corresponding verbs at FLY): flashing or flash, coruscation, scintillation (see corresponding verbs at FLASH).

flash, v. Flash, gleam, glance, glint, sparkle, glitter, glisten, scintillate, coruscate, glimmer, shimmer, twinkle, glister, spark agree in meaning to shoot forth light in rays, sparks, or the like. Flash implies a sudden and transient outburst of light or a sudden display of something that brilliantly reflects light or seems lighted up; as, "The headlights . . . flashed into barnyards where fowls slept" (S. Anderson); "Flash'd all their sabres bare" (Tennyson); "his flashing eyes, his floating hair" (Coleridge). Gleam commonly implies a ray which shines through an intervening medium, or against a background of relative darkness; as, "I see the lights of the village Gleam through the rain and mist" (Longfellow); "a light gleamed through the chinks in the wall" (Dickens); "His dislike of me gleamed in his blue eyes and in his supercilious, cold smile" (R. Macaulay). Glance implies darting or obliquely reflected light; glint implies quickly glancing or gleaming light; as, "Besides the glancing tears... some diamonds... glanced on the bride's hand" (Dickens); "An insane light glanced in her heavy black eyes" (H. B. Stowe); "Specks of sail that glinted in the sunlight far at sea" (Dickens); "when the first sunshine through their dewdrops glints" (J. R. Lowell); "the large brass scales near the flour-bins glinted" (Bennett). Sparkle suggests quick, bright, brief, and innumerable small flashes of light; glitter connotes greater brilliancy or showiness than sparkle, sometimes with the implication of something sinister; as, "The fireflies... sparkled most vividly in the darkest places" (Irving); "the sparkling waves" (Wordsworth); "everything sparkled like a garden after a shower" (Cather); eyes sparkling with amusement; eyes glittering with greed; "He holds him with his glittering eye" (Coleridge); "little black eyes which glittered like jet" (Scott); "glittering rings" (Irving); "the yellow flower... caught it [the ray of sunshine], and glittered like a topaz" (Deland). Glisten implies a more or less subdued sparkle, glitter, or gleaming that suggests a lustrous shining quality; as, dew glistening in the soft morning light; "anowy mountains glistening through a summer atmosphere" (Irving); "eyes glistening with heavenly tears" (Carlyle). Scintillate, in strict use, implies the emission of sparks in a constant steady stream; coruscate the emission of a brilliant flash or succession of flashes; both words are used figuratively as well as literally; as, a night so clear that the stars seem to scintillate; "the others [poetic verses] coruscate like brilliant pyrotechnics—and go out" (Louise); "scintillations of...genius" (V. Knox); "coruscating wit" (Carlyle). Glimmer suggests faint and wavering sparkling or flashing; shimmer suggests soft, tremulous, and lustrous sparkling or flashing; as, "Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight" (Gray); "Whiles all the night, through fog smoke white, Glimmered the white moon-shine" (Coleridge); "The young leafage shimmered like a veil of golden gauze" (Hewlett); "Everything about her shimmered and glimmered softly, as if her dress had been woven out of candle-beams" (E. Wharton). Twinkle suggests a soft and intermittent glimmering; as, "Twinkle, twinkle, little star... like a diamond in the sky" (J. & A. Taylor); "[sunbeams] twinkled on the glass and silver of the sideboard" (Cather); "he looked at her and his eyes twinkled" (S. Anderson). Glisten, now found only in archaic or dialectal use, was once a common and very close synonym of sparkle and glisten. In modern use, however, its place is often taken by glitter; as, "All that glisters is not gold" (Shak.). Spark, meaning to emit a spark or sparks, sometimes of light, more often of fire (as, some woods spark in burning; to make a flint spark), is now chiefly in technical electrical use with reference to the emission of the spark or sparks which produce light, induce fuel combustion, or the like; as, in spite of the pouring rain, the plugs of the motor sparked at once and the plane soared away.

Con. Deliberate, leisurely, laggard, dilatory, *slow.

fleet, n. Fleet, squadron, armada, flotilla are here compared chiefly with reference to their naval and nautical use, where they name a body of ships operating under a single command. Fleet and squadron are technical terms in naval use. Fleet is applied either to all the ships or vessels of any type that comprise the navy of a country and are under the control of the chief naval officer (as, The United States Fleet) or to one of its largest units (such as the battle fleet of the United States Navy), which is provided with battleships and attendant vessels such as destroyers, submarines, aircraft and aircraft carriers, and the like, necessary for warfare. A squadron is a smaller unit of a fleet, consisting of one or more divisions, or groups of four or more vessels, usually of the same type; it is used especially of such a unit detached from a fleet, under the command of a flag officer, and assigned for special duty. In general nautical and extended use, fleet suggests a large group of ships, boats, airplanes, trucks, or the like, moving together or belonging to the same owner or company; squadron, an organized body, such as of airplanes, moving in formation, or as of persons, operating according to the direction of a commanding officer. Armada is not a technical term, but one with historical (the Spanish Armada) and literary associations. It is a close synonym of fleet, especially of battle fleet, for it usually suggests equipment for fighting. It is also applied to a fleet or a squadron of airplanes. Flotilla, in current use, is applied most commonly to a fleet of small vessels; as, the flotilla of the Yacht Club; a flotilla of destroyers. "On the road to Mandalay, Where the old Flotilla lay" (Kipling). However, it sometimes occurs in its etymological sense of a small fleet, with reference to the number, and not to the size, of the vessels that comprise it, and as such has some naval use as a near equivalent of squadron.

fleetings. Evanescent, fugitive, passing, transitory, *transient, ephemeral, momentary, short-lived.

Ant. Lasting.

fleshy. *Carnal, sensual, animal, animalistic.

Ana. Physical, *bodily, corporeal, corporal, somatic: *sensuous, sensual, voluptuous, luxurious, sybaritic, epicurean.

Con. *Moral, ethical, noble, virtuous: spiritual, divine, religious (see HOLY): intellectual, psychic, *mental.

fleshy. Fleshy, fat, stout, portly, plump, rotund, chubby, corpulent, obese agree in meaning thick in body because of the presence of superfluous flesh or adipose tissue. Fleshy and fat are not clearly discriminated in use, although, strictly, fleshy implies overabundance of flesh, or muscular tissue; fat, of adipose tissue; when, however, a derogatory connotation is intended, fat is usually preferred; as, a fleshy, jolly man; a dowdy fat woman. Stout implies a thickset, bulky figure or build; portly adds to stout the implication of a more or less dignified and imposing appearance; as, "a very stout, puffy man, in buckskins and Hessian boots" (Thackeray); "one very stout gentleman, whose body and legs looked like half a gigantic roll of flannel, elevated on a couple of inflated pillowcases" (Dickens); "a large portly figure. . . the very beau ideal of an old abbot" (Jane W. Carlyle); "an elderly gentleman, large and portly, and of remarkably dignified demeanor" (N. Hawthorne). Plump implies a more or less pleasing fullness of figure, and well-rounded curves; as, the plump goddesses of Renaissance paintings; she became plump at forty. Rotund suggests the shape of a sphere; it often, in addition, connotes shortness or squatness. "This pink-faced rotund specimen of prosperity" (G. Eliot). Chubby applies chiefly to children or to very short persons who are otherwise describable as rotund; as, a chubby cherub of a baby. Corpulent and obese imply a disfiguring excess of flesh or of fat. "Mrs. Byron. . . was a short and corpulent person and rolled considerably in her gait" (T. Moore). "A woman of robust frame, square shouldered. . . and though stout, not obese" (C. Bronz).

Ana. *Muscular, brawny, burly, husky.

Ant. Skinny, scrawny. — Con. *Lean, lank, lanky, gaunt, rawboned, angular, spare: *thin, slim, slender, slight.

flexible. *Elastic, supple, resilient, springy.

Ana. Pliable, pliant, malleable, ductile, *plastic: tractable (see OBEY): limber, lithe, *supple.

Ant. Inflexible. — Con. *Stiff, rigid, wooden: tough, tenacious (see STRONG): brittle, crisp, frangible, *fragile: *hardened, indurated, callous.

flexuous. *Winding, sinuous, serpentine, tortuous, anfractuous.

flicker, v. Flutter, *flit, flitter, hover.

Ana. Waver, vibrate, oscillate, fluctuate, *swing: flare, flame, glare, *blaze: *flash, gleam, glance, glint, coruscate, shimmer: quiver, quaver, tremble (see SHAKE).

flight. *Flock, herd, drove, pack, bevy, covey, gaggle, swarm, shoal, school.

flightiness. Light-mindedness, volatility, levity, *lightness, frivolity, flippancy.

Ana. Capriciousness, unsteadiness or instability, fickleness, mercurialness, inconstancy (see corresponding adjectives at INCONSTANT): effervescence, buoyancy, elasticity (see corresponding adjectives at ELASTIC): liveliness, gaiety, sprightliness (see corresponding adjectives at LIVELY).

Ant. Steadiness: steadfastness. — Con. Constancy, equableness (see corresponding adjectives at STEADY): seriousness, staidness, sedateness, earnestness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

fimsy, adj. Sleazy, *limp, lippy, flaccid, flabby.

Ana. *Thin, slight, tenuous: *loose, slack: *weak, feeble.

Con. Stout, sturdy, *strong: *heavy, weighty.

flinch. *Recoil, shrink, wince, blench, quail.

Ana. Falter, *hesitate, vacillate: evade, elude, shun, eschew, avoid, *escape: withdraw, retire (see GO): retreat, *recede.

fling, v. Hurl, *throw, sling, toss, cast, pitch.

Ana. Thrust, shove, propel, *push: impel, drive, *move.

flippancy. Levity, *lightness, light-mindedness, frivolity, volatility, flightiness.

Ana. Sauciness, pertness, archness (see corresponding adjectives at SAUCY): impishness, waggishness, roguishness, mischievousness, playfulness (see corresponding adjectives at PLAYFUL).

Ant. Seriousness. — Con. Earnestness, gravity, solemnity, soberness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

flirt, v. Coquet, dally, *trifle, toy.

Ana. *Play, sport, disport: *caress, fondle, pet.

flit, v. Flit, flutter, flitter, flicker, hover, in their current use (but not always for etymological reasons), suggest the movements of a bird or other flying or floating thing and so carry in common the meaning to move in a manner like or reminiscent of such movements. Flit implies a light and swift passing from place to place or point to point; as, the birds flitted from tree to tree; "the talk flitting from one subject to another and never dropping so long as the meal lasts" (Arnold); "[he] seemed to pass the whole of his life flitting in and out of bedrooms" (Bennett); "Clare Potter, flushed and gallantly gay, flitting about from person to person" (R. Macaulay). Flutter implies the movement of a bird rapidly flapping its wings, the restless flitting of a moth about a light, or the like; it commonly implies unsteadiness and agitation; as, "Till she felt the heart within her fall and flutter tremuously" (Tennyson); "always the rarest [thoughts], those freaked with azure and the deepest crimson, flutter away beyond my reach" (L. P. Smith); "a little dark shadow fluttered from the wall across the floor. . . it was a bunch of woman's hair" (Cather); "her eyes . . . timidly fluttering over the depths of his" (Meredith). Flitter implies the lightness and quickness of movement suggested by flit but usually also suggests the uneasiness or uncertainty connoted by flutter; as, the poor silly flittering woman; children flittering here and there. Flicker (once common of birds, now chiefly of light flame) implies a light fluttering or, more often, a fitfully wavering movement; as, "translucent flickering wings between the sun and me" (Stevenson); "Thou small flame, Which, as a dying pulse rises and falls, Still flickerest up and down" (Shelley); "Fireflies flicker in the tops of trees" (Amy Lowell). Hover implies a hanging suspended over something like a bird maintaining its position in the air by an even, usually slow, movement of the wings; the word frequently connotes irresolution, sometimes menace, sometimes solicitude; as, vultures hovering over a battlefield; "Behold him perched in ecstasies, Yet seeming still to hover" (Wordsworth); "Your servant . . . has been hovering about us and looking at you anxiously for some minutes" (Shaw).

Ana. *Fly, dart, skim, float, scud.

flitter, v. *Flit, flutter, flicker, hover.

Ana. *Fly, dart, skim: quiver, quaver, teeter (see SHAKE).

float, v. *Fly, skim, sail, dart, scud, shoot.

Ana. Glide, *slide, slip: *flit, hover, flitter.

floater. Bloomer, *error, mistake, blunder, slip, lapse, bull, howler, boner.

flock, n. Flock, herd, drove, pack, bevy, covey, gaggle, flight, swarm, shoal, school are here compared as meaning a number of persons (sometimes things) assembled together or moving together. Their applications and their implications are derived from their literal reference to particular animals. Flock (literally chiefly of birds, wild or domestic, sheep, and goats) suggests a large company or crowd, or in religious use, a congregation; it often connotes care or guidance but sometimes, merely large numbers; as, "Feed the flock of God" (1 Peter v. 2); "flocks of friends" (Shak.). Herd (literally chiefly of sheep, cattle, or other hoofed animals massed together, or of whales, seals, etc.), drove (literally chiefly of sheep, cattle, or swine driven in a body), and pack (literally chiefly of hounds and wolves, especially when they are hunting game or food), are terms of derogation or contempt. Herd is applied to the masses of people; as, "the common herd" (Shak.); "the vulgar herd" (Pope); "What the people but a herd confused, A miscellaneous rabble" (Milton). Drove often connotes a threatening approach; as, "Not one of all the drove should touch me: swine!" (Tennyson). Pack often carries a hint of craft or rapacity and may be applied to a group pursuing its ends relentlessly; as, "Thou . . . art confederate with a damned pack" (Shak.); "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you" (Shak.). Bevy (literally of quails, roes, larks) and less frequently covey (literally of partridges) are applied especially to a group of girls or women; as, "a bevy of fair women" (Milton). Gaggle (literally of geese when on the water), now chiefly a dialectal term, is sometimes used as an uncomplimentary term for a group of women. Flight (literally of any birds that fly together in large numbers, as when migrating) applies to any group thought of as flying or flitting together in close formation; as, a flight of airplanes (a military formation of from 3 to 6 airplanes). "Good night, sweet prince; And flights of Angels sing thee to thy rest!" (Shak.). "A flight of purchasable fair women always at command" (Pater). Swarm (literally of insects, especially in motion) and shoal (literally of fish and aquatic animals) connote thronging numbers; as, "this swarm of fair advantages" (Shak.); "the swarm of female whisperers" (Tennyson); "thin airy shoals of visionary ghosts" (Pope); "crowds that stream from yawning doors, and shoals of pucker'd faces" (Tennyson). School, interchangeable with shoal in its literal application (to fish and aquatic animals) and often also applied to other animals, is less frequently applied to persons.

Ana. *Crowd, throng, press, horde, mob.

flood, n. *Flow, stream, current, tide, flux.

Ana. *Excess, superfluity, surplus: irruption, incursion, *invasion: *wave, surge.

florid. *Ornate, flamboyant, rococo, baroque.

Ana. Aureate, flowery, euphuistic, grandiloquent, magniloquent, *rhetorical, bombastic: sumptuous, *luxurious, opulent: *showy, ostentatious, pompous, pretentious.

Ant. Chaste (in style, decoration, etc.). — Con. Bald, barren, *bare: matter-of-fact, *prosaic.

florilegium. Garland, *anthology, treasury, thesaurus, corpus, chrestomathy, chapbook.

flotilla. *Fleet, squadron, armada.

founder, v. *Wallow, welter, grovel.

Ana. Struggle, strive (see ATTEMPT): toil, labor, travail (see corresponding nouns at WORK): muddle, addle, *confuse.

flourish, v. Brandish, *swing, wave, thrash.

Ana. Wield, manipulate, ply, *handle: flaunt, display; exhibit, *show.

flout, v. *Scoff, jeer, gibe, fleer, gird, sneer.

Ana. Scout, scorn, *despise, contempt, disdain: spurn, repudiate (see DECLINE): deride, *ridicule, mock.

Ant. Revere. — Con. Regard, respect, esteem, admire (see under REGARD, n.).

flow, v. Issue, emanate, proceed, stem, derive, *spring, arise, rise, originate.

Ana. Emerge, *appear, loom: start, *begin, commence flow, n. Flow, stream, current, flood, tide, flux are here compared as meaning anything issuing or moving in a manner like or suggestive of running water. Flow may apply to the issuing or moving mass or to the kind of motion which characterizes it, but in either case, it implies the type of motion characteristic of the movement of a fluid, such as a liquid or gas: the term may suggest either a gentle or a rapid pace, and either a copious or a meager supply, but it always implies an unbroken continuity of the particles or parts; as, the flow of his ideas exceeded his capacity for setting them down in writing; she expressed herself in a flow of words; there is no great flow of gas into the pipes today; "the thought of never ceasing life as it expresses itself in the flow of the seasons" (S. Anderson); "She would tell you what she thought about the world and its ways in a flow of racy comment" (R. Macaulay). Stream implies a flow characteristic of a body of water such as a river, or of a quantity of water pouring forth from a source or outlet (such as a fountain, a faucet, a spigot, a tap), either of which maintains the same direction throughout its entire length. The term places emphasis more upon the quantity or the volume, the extent or the duration, and the constant succession and change of its particles, than upon the type of motion which characterizes it; as, "they [people going about their business] passed us . . . in an unsmiling sombre stream" (Conrad); for weeks after the surrender a stream of refugees crossed the country's border; "Music, acting, poetry proceed in the one mighty stream; sculpture, painting, all the arts of design, in the other" (H. Ellis); novelists who present their characters not in action, but through the stream of consciousness [i.e., the unbroken succession of thoughts which reflect one's experiences] of each. Current (as here compared: see also TENDENCY) differs from stream in laying greater stress on the direction or course of the movement implied and in carrying stronger suggestions of its force or velocity; thus, streams (not currents) of people passed him in either direction but he was finally caught by the current (not stream) of those moving south; so, he could not maintain his position against the current of opposition; currents of cold air swept in from the north. Flood is often used in place of flow or stream when one wishes to imply extreme copiousness in the supply or to attribute to it an overwhelming or torrential power; as, "Never came reformation in a flood. With such a heady currance [current], scouring faults" (Shak.); "It is not, he then feels with a sudden flood of emotion, that America is home, but that home is America" (Brownell); "This poem called forth floods of abuse" (Day Lewis). Tide applies to something that flows or courses like an ocean tide and suggests either an alternation of directions (as, "swayed by the sweeping of the tides of air"—Bryan) or a power to suck one into its course by the force of its outward or inward pull (as, "Stanley was caught in the tide of war fervour"—R. Macaulay). Flux far more than stream stresses the unceasing change in the parts, particles, or elements and, sometimes, direction of that which flows (as, "For this and that way swings The flux of mortal things. Though moving inly to one far-set goal"—Arnold; "how idle is it to commiserate them [the French] for their instability, when not stability but flux is their ideal"—Brownell): often specifically it applies to the outward aspect or appearance which is constantly changing in contrast to its real and abiding nature (as, "to distinguish between the transient, unsatisfying flux of things, and the permanent, satisfying reality which lies behind it"—Inge).

Ana. *Succession, progression, series, sequence: continuity, *continuation, continuance.

flowery. Aurate, grandiloquent, magniloquent, *rhetorical, euphuistic, bombastic.

Ana. Florid, *ornate, flamboyant: *inflated, tumid, turgid: *wordy, verbose, redundant, prolix, diffuse.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

flutter, v. Flitter, flicker, *flit, hover.

Ana. *Shake, tremble, quiver, quaver, wobble: beat, throb, *pulsate, palpitate: fluctuate, vibrate, oscillate, *swing.

fluvial or fluviatile. *Aquatic, lacustrine, lacuscular, marine, oceanic, thalassic, neritic, pelagic, abyssal, bathysmal, bathybic.

flux. *Flow, current, tide, stream, flood.

Ana. Swinging or swing, fluctuation, oscillation, wavering, swaying or sway (see corresponding verbs at SWING): shifting, moving (see MOVE, v.): *motion, movement, stir.

fly, v. 1 Fly, dart, float, skim, scud, shoot, sail are not synonymous terms in their literal senses, but they come into comparison in their extended senses when they mean to pass, or less often, to cause to pass, lightly or quickly over a surface or above a surface. Fly (as here compared: see also ESCAPE, 1) literally implies the aid of wings and is therefore used strictly of winged insects, of birds, of airplanes, and the like, but figuratively it may be used to imply any movement through or as through the air that suggests similar swift passage, buoyancy, lack of impediments, or the like; as, "Swift fly the years" (Pope); "Saw the snowy whirlwind fly" (Gray); "And kindling murmurs flew" (Shelley); "Thy loose hair in the light wind flying" (Shelley). Dart literally implies the use of a dart, or of a pointed weapon such as a lance or a javelin that is hurled with great speed and directness from the hand, or an aimed arrow propelled from a bow. In its figurative intransitive sense, the term implies any movement that is as suddenly initiated and as straight and as swift in its course; as, "Hawks regularly beat along the furze, darting on a finch now and then" (Jefferies); "He caught her by the arm as she ran past and...without trying to check her, simply darted in with her and up the stairs, causing no end of consternation" (Conrad); "[stars] darting about our galaxy with speeds that range up to 200 miles per second" (P. W. Merrill). Float in its literal sense suggests movement along or upon the surface of water by someone or something that is buoyed up, such as a boat, a swimmer resting, or the like. In its extended use, it implies a similar buoyant and seemingly effortless gliding as through the air or along a liquid surface; as, "I wandered lonely as a cloud That floats on high o'er vales and hills" (Wordsworth); "a bright bird which sings divinely as it floats about from one place to another" (L. P. Smith). Skim, which is used as often transitively as intransitively, derives its implications in its more common extended senses from its earliest sense of to remove a film from the surface of a liquid, such as scum from boiling sirup or cream from milk, by means of a spoon or the like. In its figurative use, it implies a passing lightly and swiftly over the surface of something, sometimes darting into it, sometimes floating above it: often, it suggests a mere touching of the surface; as, "Some lightly o'er the current skim" (Gray); "Down the road skims an eagle swallow, swift as an arrow" (Jefferies); "she had skimmed gracefully over life's surface like a swallow, dipping her pretty wings in the shallows...or like a bee, sipping and tasting each flower" (R. Macaulay); "What I mean by reading is not skimming...but reading again and again, in all sorts of moods" (C. E. Montague). Scud implies light, rapid movement such as that of a hare pursued by hounds, or of a sailboat driven over the surface of the water by a high wind, or of clouds driven by an approaching hurricane: often, also, it connotes swiftness so great that the surface is barely touched by the speeding object; as, the boat scuds before the wind; "the scudding rain which drives in gusts over the...great shining river" (Thackeray); "Crisp foam-flakes scud along the level sand" (Tennyson). Shoot literally suggests the speed and directness of motion characteristic of a bullet or other missile propelled by a gun or the like: it differs from dart, its nearest synonym, in throwing less emphasis upon the suddenness of start and, often, in more definitely suggesting continuous or extended movement; as, "The lambent lightnings shoot Across the sky" (Thomson); the automobile shot around the corner. Sail literally implies the smooth and gliding movement of a sailing vessel: it differs from its nearest synonym float in more frequently implying power, ostentation (as if of spread sails), directness of course, or the like; as, "Hope...set free from earth... On steady wing sails through the immense abyss" (Cowper); "Till over down and over dale All night the shining vapor sail And pass the silent-lighted town" (Tennyson). "But who is this?... Female of sex it seems— That, so bedecked, ornate, and gay, Comes this way sailing" (Milton).

Ana. *Flit, flutter, flitter, flicker, hover: soar, mount, *rise, arise, ascend: glide, *slide, slip.

2 Flee, *escape, decamp, abecond.

flying field. *Airport, airdrome, air field, landing field.
foam, n. Foam, froth, spume, scum, lather, suds, yeast come into comparison when they denote a white or light-colored bubbly substance such as that which gathers on the top of some liquids when they are agitated. Foam is the most comprehensive of these terms but is not interchangeable with all; it always implies an aggregation of small bubbles such as arises on the top of a fermenting liquor or an effervescing or boiling liquid, or on the surface of the sea when agitated by high winds or covered with breaking waves; the term is also applicable to a similar substance formed in the mouth or on the skin of some animals (or persons) in a rage, in great excitement, or suffering from intense heat; as, the foam on beer or on an ice-cream soda; "The rider from the chateau, and the horse in a foam, clattered away through the village" (Dickens). Of all these words, foam commonly has the most pleasant and elevated associations, usually connoting in poetry whiteness, delicacy, and grace; as, "Idalian Aphrodite beautiful, Fresh as the foam" (Tennyson). Froth is applicable to any foam, but it carries a far stronger implication, both in its literal and in its figurative use, of insubstantiality, worthlessness, or (when there is direct or indirect reference to persons or animals) of mad excitement than foam carries; as, your glass of beer is half froth; froth forming at the mouth of a mad dog; his speech had no logical substance, being mostly froth; "in all the froth and ferment between capital and labor" (C. C. Furnas). Spume, etymologically cognate with foam, is still applicable where foam or froth might also be employed; as, "They dart forth polypus-antennae, To blister with their poison spume The wanderer" (Shelley). However, especially since around 1800, the term is chiefly used to denote the foam arising on an agitated body of water; as, "all the billows green Toss'd up the silver spume against the clouds" (Keats); "as when a sand-bar breaks in clotted spume and spray" (Kipling). Scum also, in its earliest sense, equaled foam and froth but it was long ago distinctively applied to the film that rises on boiling liquids, especially those containing meats, vegetables, or fruits (as, the scum on boiling currant juice), or to a similar film which forms on molten metals (as, the scum, or scoria, of iron) or on the surface of a stagnant pool or like body of water (as, the ditch is covered with a green scum). Since scum is usually removed from the broth of meats and the like, or from the molten mass of metal, and is discarded, or is regarded as a sign of foulness in stagnant water, the term, especially in extended use and as applied to a class or body of persons, usually connotes worthlessness, vileness, or the like; as, men and women who are the scum of the earth. Lather and suds both apply in current use to the foam produced by agitating water impregnated with soap. Lather, however, usually suggests a less frothy condition than suds and a heavier aggregation of small soapy bubbles; as, hard water does not produce a good lather for shaving. Suds, on the other hand, often denotes water so covered with a soapy foam that it is usable for laundering clothes; as, the laundress likes the soap because it gives her plenty of suds; soak the cloth in hot suds. Lather, however, rather than suds, is the preferred term when the foam induced by intense sweating or emotional excitement is denoted (as, a hard-ridden horse working up a lather; he was in a lather of rage); suds is the preferred term when the reference is to something that suggests the appearance of suds in a laundry tub or washing machine (as, "another [medicine-man] whips up a mixture of water and meal into frothy suds symbolic of clouds"—J. G. Frazer). Yeast, in its earliest and still common sense, applies to a substance composed of an aggregate of small cells of sac fungi that arises on the top of, or sinks as a sediment in, malt worts, fruit juices, and other saccharine liquids, and that induces fermentation in them. It is this substance that is used as a leavening agent in bread. But because yeast often appears as a froth on liquids and is accompanied by fermentation, the term is, in extended use, applied to a similar froth, foam, or spume, especially that appearing on the surface of an agitated sea; as, "The ship... swallowed with yeast and froth" (Shak.); "They melt into thy yeast of waves" (Byron).

Ana. Discomfit, *embarrass, disconcert, faze, rattle: curb, check, snaffle, *restrain, inhibit.

Con. *Advance, further, forward, promote: abet, foment, *incite, instigate.

follow, v. 1 Follow, succeed, ensue, supervene agree in meaning to come after someone or, more often, something. Although all of these verbs occur as transitives and intransitives, ensue and supervene are most commonly intransitive verbs. Follow is the general term, for it may imply a coming after in time, in sequence, in pursuit (see FOLLOW, 2), in logic, in understanding, or the like; as, the singing of "America" by the audience will follow the introductory prayer; Queen Victoria followed William IV as British sovereign. "The driving force in education should be the pupil's wish to learn, not the master's authority; but it does not follow that education should be soft and easy and pleasant at every stage"

(B. Russell). " 'She converses somewhat rapidly...at times I find it difficult to—' 'To follow her? Oh, well, one would get used to that' " (Deland). Succeed commonly implies an order, by which a certain or given person or thing comes after another, as has been determined by descent, inheritance, election, rank, or the like; as, son succeeded father as head of the business for many generations; the eldest son succeeds to the title; the person who will succeed the late congressman will be appointed by the governor of the state. Succeed is often used when the idea of a fixed order is lost, but it still usually retains the idea of taking the place of someone or something; as, "The link dissolves, each seeks a fresh embrace. Another love succeeds, another race" (Pope); "the anxieties of common life began soon to succeed to the alarms of romance" (Austen). Ensnue usually implies some logical connection or the operation of some principle of sequences such as that of necessity; as, "That such a consequence...should ensue...was far enough from my thoughts" (Austen); "When his [man's] mind fails to stay the pace set by its [civilization's] inventions, madness must ensue" (Day Lewis). But ensue in somewhat archaic transitive use carries a strong implication of seeking after, rather than of coming after because of necessity; as, "Seek peace, and ensue it" (1 Peter iii. 11); "to seek health, and ensue beauty" (Galsworthy). Supervene suggests the following of something added or conjoined, and often unforeseen or unpredictable; as, "Two worlds, two antagonistic ideals, here in evidence before him. Could a third condition supervene, to mend their discord?" (Palmer); "it was not acute rheumatism, but a supervening pericarditis that...killed her" (Bennett); "it is in the philosophy that supervened upon the popular creed...that we shall find the highest...reaches of their thought" (G. L. Dickinson).

2 Follow, pursue, chase, trail, tag, tail come into comparison as meaning to go immediately or shortly after someone or something. Follow is the comprehensive term; it usually implies the lead or, sometimes, guidance of someone or something; as, the detective followed the boys to their hiding place; hangers-on who follow the circus; "the vengeance that follows crime" (G. L. Dickinson); to follow up a clue; to follow a calling or trade. "He should not desire to steer his own course, but follow the line that the talk happens to take" (A. C. Benson). "What was it that made men follow Oliver Cromwell?" (S. M. Crothers). Pursue in its earliest English sense implies a following as an enemy or hunter; as, to pursue a fox; pursuing rebels in flight; to pursue happiness. The term therefore usually suggests an attempt to overtake, to reach, or to attain, and commonly in its extended senses, even when the implications of hostility or of a desire to capture are absent, it connotes eagerness, persistence, or inflexibility of purpose in following one's thoughts, ends, or desires; as, "Ye who...pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope" (Johnson); "Thrice happy man! enabled to pursue What all so wish, but want the pow'r to do!" (Pope); "pursuing the game of high ambition with a masterly coolness" (Buchan); to pursue the career of a diplomat. Chase implies fast pursuit in order to, or as if to, catch a fleeing object or to drive away or turn to flight an oncoming thing; as, to chase the fleeing thieves; the boys chased the intruder out of the school yard; "We were chased by two pirates, who soon overtook us" (Swift). "If to dance all night, and dress all day...chas'd old-age away...who would learn one earthly thing of use?" (Pope). Trail implies a following in one's tracks; as, to trail a fugitive to his hiding place; to trail a lost child to the edge of a creek. Tag (a colloquial term) and tail (a slang term) imply close following, often with the implication of watching or observing every movement; as, she refused to have anyone tagging after her every time she went out for a walk; he employed detectives to tail the suspected man. Ana. Attend, *accompany, convoy: *copy, imitate, ape: *practice, exercise.

Ant. Precede (in order): forsake (a teacher or his teachings). — Con. Lead, *guide, pilot, steer: elude, evade, *escape: desert, *abandon.

follower. Follow, adherent, disciple, sectary, partisan, henchman, satellite. Follower is the inclusive term, denoting a person who attaches himself to the person or opinions of another; as, the followers of Jesus; the followers of Karl Marx. Its synonyms divide themselves into two groups, the first three designating a follower through choice or conviction and the last three a follower in whom personal devotion overshadows or eclipses the critical faculty. Adherent connotes closer and more persistent attachment than follower; it may be used without any implication of the personality of the teacher or leader; as, a doctrine that gained many adherents; the candidate lost many adherents when he announced his views on reform. Disciple always presupposes a master or teacher and implies personal, often devoted, adherence to his views or doctrines. "We go to him [Matthew Arnold] for refreshment and for the companionship of a kindred point of view to our own, but not as disciples" (T. S. Eliot). Sectary etymologically means follower, but is now rare in this sense or is so affected by its more common meaning (see HERETIC) that it usually implies the acceptance of the doctrines of a religious teacher or body; as, sectaries of Mohammed. Partisan invariably suggests such devotion to the person or opinions of another or to a party, a creed, a school of thought, that there is incapacity for seeing from any other point of view. It often, therefore, connotes bigotry or prejudice. "Laura was always a passionate partisan of her young brother" (M. Austin). "A few partisans argued for him [Poe]" (Mencken). Henchman is commonly applied to a subservient follower of a political leader or "boss"; in extended use, it connotes abject submission to the will of a dominating and, usually, unscrupulous leader or group. "The catspaw of corrupt functionaries and the henchmen of ambitious humbugs" (Shaw). Satellite, more than any of the others, suggests devotion to the person of the leader and constant obsequious attendance on him. "Boswell was...made happy by an introduction to Johnson, of whom he became the obsequious satellite" (Irving).

Ana. Devotee, votary, *addict, habitué, fiend, fan: *parasite, sycophant, toady: *scholar, disciple, pupil.

Ant. Leader.

following, n. Following, clientele, clientage, public, audience come into comparison when they denote the body of persons who attach themselves to another as his disciples, patrons, admirers, or the like. Following is the most comprehensive term, applicable to any group that follows either literally, as a train or retinue, or figuratively, and in a collective sense, as the adherents of a leader, the disciples of a philosopher, the customers of a salesman, the admirers of a young woman, or an actor's "fans." "Such a man, with a great name in the country and a strong following in Parliament" (Macaulay). "He [the critic] unconsciously enrolls a following of like-minded persons" (C. E. Montague). Clientele, or more rarely clientage, is now chiefly used of the persons, collectively, who habitually resort for services to a professional man, such as a lawyer or physician, or who give their patronage to a business establishment such as a hotel, a restaurant, or a shop; as, Dr. Doe counts in his clientele all the leading families in the town; summer hotels usually send out circulars to their clientele in the spring. Public is applied chiefly to the following attracted by a person such as an author, a lecturer, or an actor, by interest in his work, or to that of any establishment or institution the success of which is determined by its attracting the support of such a following; as, the actress declared that her aim was to please her public; the author increased his public as each new book appeared. "The public for which masterpieces are intended is not on this earth" (T. Wilder). Audience is applicable to a following that listens (literally or figuratively) with attention to what a person has to say whenever he addresses them in a speech, a book, or the like. "Still govern thou my song, Urania, and fit audience find, though few" (Millon). "The stricken poet of Recanati had no country, for an Italy in his day did not exist, he had no audience, no celebrity" (Arnold). In literal use audience, rather than spectators (see SPECTATOR), is the correct term for designating the body of persons attending a lecture, a play, a concert, or the like, because they are there primarily to hear, only secondarily to see; as, the audience at the opera packed the house.

foment. Abet, *incite, instigate.

Ana. Goad, spur (see corresponding nouns at MOTIVE): stimulate, quicken, excite, galvanize, *provoke: nurture, *nurse, foster, cultivate.

Ant. Quell. — Con. *Suppress, repress: check, curb, *restrain.

fond, adj. 1 Fond, infatuated (or infatuate), besotted, insensate come into comparison when they mean made blindly or stupidly foolish, as by passion, drink, or the like. Fond, in literary use, implies a judgment misled by credulity, undue optimism, excessive affection, or the like; as, Cowper's characterization of the Biographia Britannica: "Oh, fond attempt to give a deathless lot To names ignoble, born to be forgot!"; "Grant I may never prove so fond, To trust man on his oath or bond" (Shak.). Infatuated (and the now archaic infatuate) implies a weakening, rather than the absence, of judgment, especially under the influence of violent passion or unreasoning emotion; it is therefore correctly applied to the acts or qualities of men from whom sagacity or self-control might have been expected. "What the infatuated ministry may do, I know not; but our infatuated House of Commons... have begun a new war in America" (Burke). "Your people are so short-sighted, so jealous and selfish, and so curiously infatuated with things that are not... good" (Jefferies). Besotted adds to infatuated the implications of a stupefying or intoxicating influence that destroys the capacity to think clearly and, sometimes, makes its victim disgusting or repulsive; as, men besotted by drink; "Are these So far besotted that they fail to see This fair wife-worship cloaks a secret shame?" (Tennyson). Insensate conveys the idea of feeling and judgment lost under the influence of passions such as hatred, desire for revenge, greed, and the like; the term is also applicable to the passion; as, insensate rage. "The insensate mob Uttered a cry of triumph" (Shelley). "Projects the most insensate [were] formed" (Sir A. Alison).

Ana. Foolish, silly, fatuous, asinine, *simple: *stupid, dumb.

2 Devoted, affectionate, *loving, doting.

Ana. *Enamored, infatuated: *tender, sympathetic, warm, responsive: ardent, passionate, *impassioned.

Con. *Indifferent, unconcerned, aloof.

fondle. Pet, *caress, cuddle, dandle.

food. 1 Food, actuals, viands, provisions, comestibles, provender, fodder, forage, grub, eats, chow are here compared as meaning raw or cooked substances that are eaten, digested, and assimilated by human beings or animals. Food is the most general of these terms applicable to all substances which satisfy hunger and build up or repair waste in the body of men or animals; it is sometimes distinguished from drink—that is, liquids that satisfy thirst; as, to conserve a nation's supply of food; refrigerators that keep food fresh; there was no lack of food or drink during their sojourn on the island. Victuals and viands (the singular form of the latter still occurs) are both words which came into English during the fourteenth century as designations of food for human beings, especially food that is prepared and ready for eating. Victuals (sometimes, in representing dialect or to obtain a humorous effect, spelled vittles), however, is now largely dialectal and colloquial, being avoided in standard language except where a racy or pungent word is desired for realistic or humorous effect; as, "I worked hard enough to earn my passage and my victuals" (Shaw); "when I bear in mind how elegantly we eat our victuals" (L. P. Smith). Viands, on the other hand, savors of bookishness or affectation and, although common enough in the nineteenth century and earlier, now seldom occurs in good colloquial or written English except where daintiness, rarity, or an especially fine quality is to be suggested; as, "all the dainties and viands that could be wanted for a feast" (Wilde); "He dashed the wine on the earth and scattered about the other viands" (Milman). Provisions applies to food in general, as offered for sale in a market or kept in store as supplies; as, we always go to the Blank Market for our provisions; there were not enough provisions in the hotel to care for the weekend influx of guests. Comestibles, which stresses edibility, is now found chiefly in affected or humorous use for victuals or provisions; as, "He resolved upon having a strong reinforcement of comestibles" (T. Hook). Provender, in earliest English use, and still in straight precise use, applies to food, such as hay, oats, or corn for horses, mules, asses, and the like; as, "they must be dieted like mules And have their provender tied to their mouths" (Shak.). In extended and usually humorous or ironical use, provender may equal provisions, victuals, or food; as, "bread and meat, wine, and hot coffee. Monsieur Defarge put this provender... on the shoemaker's bench" (Dickens); Fodder and forage are both applied to food for domestic animals such as cattle, but fodder (which was originally a close synonym of food) now usually denotes the food such as hay, grains, silage, etc., provided for stall feeding, and forage, the food gained by grazing, browsing, rooting, or the like; as, the fodder is stored and ground in a silo; "A herb like a broad flat thistle supplied the buffaloes... drink as well as forage" (Defoe). But forage is also used in much the same sense as provender. Grub, eats, chow are all low slang terms for food, suggesting hunger or pleasure in eating, but not otherwise easily distinguishable.

2 Food, aliment, pabulum, nutriment, nourishment, sustenance, pap are synonymous only when they denote material which feeds and supports the body or organism or, by extension, the mind or the soul. Food is referable to anything which enters the system, is assimilated by it, and contributes to its life, its growth, or its power for work; as, moisture and substances in the soil provide food for plants; muscle-building foods; mineral oil does not fatten since it is not a food. Aliment and pabulum are now chiefly literary or bookish words, especially in their primary senses; in figurative use they are relatively common. They are not always distinguishable from each other, but aliment is more often applied to that which nourishes, or which promotes growth, and pabulum to that which serves as an article (sometimes as the substance) of one's diet, especially mental diet; as, "For the . . . aliment of the natural body . . . God hath given meat" (Donne); many motion pictures provide poor pabulum for the adolescent mind. "The aliments Nurturing our nobler part, the mind, thought, dreams, Passions, and aims . . . at length are made Our mind itself" (Lytton). "It is notorious that they [detective stories] are the favorite pabulum of college professors, kings, queens, presidents, and 'heavy' intellectuals everywhere" (Michigan Alumnus Quarterly Review). Nutrimment and nourishment are applied to food necessary for one's growth and health or to the effect of such food or foods; however, nutrimment is more often applied to that which is actually assimilated or assimilable; nourishment, to the food itself; as, the infant received very little nutrimment from its mother's milk; he was persuaded to take some nourishment. Sustenance, when it is applied to food, is preferable to nutrimment (of which it is a close synonym) when the maintenance or support of life rather than the upbuilding of the body or mind is stressed; as, the farm barely provided sustenance for the family. "The blossoms of Beaumont and Fletcher's imagination draw no sustenance from the soil, but are cut and slightly withered flowers stuck into sand" (T. S. Eliot). Pap, applied literally to a soft food for infants and invalids, is found chiefly in contemptuous or ironical use, and applies in its extended sense to nourishment for body, or especially for mind, that is as slight, as diluted, and as innocuous as infant pap; as, college courses that are mere intellectual pap; a preacher whose sermons are nothing more than pap.

fool, n. 1 Fool, idiot, imbecile, moron, simpleton, natural are often used interchangeably in the extended sense of one who lacks sense or good judgment, but in precise (in some cases in technical) use they denote one who is mentally deficient in a clearly marked degree. Fool, the most general and probably the oldest of these words, has been applied in the past to anyone who suffers from mental derangement as well as to anyone afflicted with mental deficiency. It implies the lack or the loss of understanding and reason or the absence of signs of the powers which when exercised and developed make for intelligence and wisdom. From its Biblical use, the term still connotes, in elevated style, grave, pitying, or scathing condemnation (as, "The fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no God'"—Psalms xiv. 1; "For ye suffer fools gladly seeing ye yourselves are wise"—2 Corinthians xi. 19; "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread"—Pope); in colloquial usage, as a term of contempt, it is strongly offensive (as, "Who marries one like me but a fool? . . . I could not marry a fool. The man I marry I must respect"—Meredith; "he was simply an irresponsible and thoughtless fool"—Bennett). Idiot, imbecile, moron are technical designations of a person who is mentally deficient (as opposed to one who is mentally deranged). All imply lack of intelligence to such a degree as to disqualify the person for living and working on a parity with others. Idiot designates a mentally deficient person who is incapable of connected speech or of avoiding the common dangers of life and who requires constant care and attention; imbecile designates one who is incapable of earning a living but who can be educated to a point where he is capable of attending to the simplest of his wants or of recognizing and avoiding the most ordinary dangers; moron (a much misused term) applies to one who has sufficient intelligence to learn a simple trade but who requires constant supervision in his work and recreation. "In Massachusetts, which may be taken as typical of the rest of the country, an idiot has only about $\frac{1}{4}$ as much chance of living to be ten years of age as a normal being. Imbeciles are slightly better, for they have $\frac{1}{2}$ as much chance. Morons have about $\frac{1}{4}$ as much chance" (C. C. Furnas). In precise nontechnical use, these terms usually follow the psychiatric classification, idiot implying utter feeble-mindedness (as, "he said you were . . . a senseless, drivelling idiot"—Wycherley; "April Comes like an idiot, babbling and strewn flowers"—Millay), imbecile implying half-wittedness or empty-mindedness (as, "What if suddenly everyone were to . . . discover that she was an imbecile, with a quite vacant, unhinged mind?"—R. Macaulay), moron implying intelligence of the lowest grade and general stupidity (as, "It is possible that while we are governed by high-grade 'morons' there will be no practical recognition of the dangers which threaten us"—Inge). Simpleton (a popular, rather than a technical, term) implies silliness or, sometimes, lack of sophistication; it is often used lightly as a term of indulgent contempt; as, "They look upon persons employing their time in making verses . . . as simpletons easily to be deceived" (V. Knox); poor, innocent little simpleton! Natural, which is now comparatively rare in this sense, came into English use in the sixteenth century as a term designating any congenitally feeble-minded person; as, "the minds of naturals" (Locke); "I own the man is not a natural; he has a very quick sense, though very slow understanding" (Steele).

2 Fool, jester, clown, antic, buffoon, zany, merry-andrew, pantaloon, harlequin, comedian (fem. comedienne), comic, stooge come into comparison when they denote a person or a character whose business it is to make others laugh. Fool in literary use, as in the plays of Shakespeare, is never completely dissociated from another sense of the word in which witlessness or a degree of lunacy is implied. The designation is applied both to a court retainer who amuses his lord or to any person who constantly, often unintentionally, provokes laughter, but in both cases (typically), though the fool by appearance seems a simpleton, his words are evocative not only of laughter but usually also of thought. "Who is with him [King Lear]?" "None but the fool; who labours to out-jest His heart-struck injuries" (Shak.). "Let me play the fool: With mirth and laughter let old wrinkles come" (Shak.). Jester as a designation is chiefly applied to the fool who attends a king, a prince, or other personage. The word suggests his function and dress (motley, cap and bells, bauble) rather than, as fool, his personality, and the emphasis is upon a gift for rillery or, often, repartee. "He is the prince's jester: a very dull fool" (Shak.). Clown was once (especially in Shakespeare's plays) used interchangeably with the preceding words, but in general, its range of application was far more extensive and it carried distinctive connotations. It was a common designation of the character who provides comic relief in a play; sometimes he is a court fool, but more often a servant or a peasant, who by his boorishness, his ignorance, his blunders, and the like, creates amusement among his superiors. "Let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of them that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren spectators to laugh too" (Shak.). In recent use, however, the clown is the stock comic character of the pantomime and the circus, who by his makeup (typically all white—face, sugarloaf hat, loose tunic-breeches—with red spots), movements, and acts creates laughter. Antic was the older designation of this type of character, especially in the Renaissance dumb shows where the fun was dependent purely on the performer's grotesqueness of appearance, postures, and the like. Buffoon implies a more vulgar appeal than fool or clown and resort to tricks, practical jokes, mimicry, and sometimes bawdy behavior or talk. "Falstaff the cheerful companion, the loud buffoon" (Johnson). Zany and merry-andrew are close equivalents of buffoon, but they are properly applied to servants of mountebanks or quacks who provided additional amusement for the crowds their masters gathered about them. In modern literary use, zany often is contemptuous for fool or simpleton (as, "The printers are awful sanies, they print erasures and corrections too"—Tennyson); it is still occasionally applied to one who serves as a laughingstock. "We are the sanies of sorrow. We are clowns whose hearts are broken" (Wilde). Pantaloon and harlequin designate stock characters in the old popular Italian comedy who aided or abetted the clown in his fun-making. They now are found in pantomime and in the puppet show. The pantaloon is an old and often mean dotard who wears spectacles, slippers, and a tight-fitting combination of trousers and stockings; the harlequin is his servant, a droll youth who typically wears a striped parti-colored suit and carries a light sword of lath. The remaining terms are common in current use and suggest reference to the legitimate theater, vaudeville, burlesque, the motion pictures, and the radio. Comedian (or, feminine, comédienne) is the comprehensive term applicable to any actor or entertainer who provides amusement by what he says or does, whether his methods and aims be those of high comedy or of low comedy; as, Ada Rehan was probably greater as a comédienne than as a tragedienne; slapstick comedians. Comic specifically implies buffoonery or clowning, and is especially applied to the jokesters of the radio and the slapstick comedians of the motion pictures; as, Charlie Chaplin was one of the great comics of the silent motion pictures. Stooge, like merry-andrew, implies subordination to another funmaker, and often the character of a laughingstock, but the resemblance ends there. The function of a stooge is either to heckle or bait his principal (usually from a seat in the audience) and so feed him lines, or to provide a second and different kind of amusement by his reactions, usually stupid reactions, to his principal's witticisms.

foolhardy. Temerarious, daring, daredevil, rash, reckless, *adventurous, venturous, venturesome.

Ana. Bold, audacious (see BRAVE): headlong, *precipitate, impetuous.

Ant. Wary. — Con. *Cautious, circumspect, calculating.

foolish. 1 *Simple, silly, fatuous, asinine.

Ana. Idiotic, imbecilic, moronic (see corresponding nouns at FOOL).

Con. *Intelligent, clever, quick-witted, bright, smart.

2 Foolish, silly, absurd, preposterous, as here compared, imply a judgment of a person, his acts, behavior, utterances, and the like, and agree in meaning ridiculous because not exhibiting good sense. That is foolish which does not commend itself to the judgment of others as wise, or sensible, or judicious; as, a foolish investment. "Courageous behaviour is easier for a man who fails to apprehend dangers, but such courage may often be foolish" (B. Russell). That is silly which seems witless, pointless, or futile; as, a silly dispute; a silly sacrifice. "The way she cheats herself [at patience]—it's too silly!" (Bennett). That is absurd which is inconsistent with accepted ideas, common sense, or sound reason; it is applied, therefore, to ideas and projects considered impersonally, as well as to persons and their acts. "The absurd . . . dogma that the king can do no wrong" (Shaw). That is preposterous which, according to its derivation, puts the cart before the horse and is, therefore, glaringly absurd. "If a man cannot see a church, it is preposterous to take his opinion about its altar-piece or painted window" (T. H. Huxley). In somewhat looser use, that is preposterous which is ridiculously out of keeping with character, situation, or the like. "He put on his preposterous old flowered cashmere dressing-gown" (Deland). Ana. Ridiculous, ludicrous, *laughable.

Ant. Sensible. — Con. *Wise, sane, judicious, prudent, sage, sapient.

fop, n. Fop, dandy, beau, coxcomb, exquisite, élégant (or élégante), dude, macaroni, buck, spark, swell, nob, toff come into comparison as denoting a person who is conspicuously fashionable or elegant in dress or manners. Fop (etymologically, a fool) was early applied to a person who made a foolish pretense of wit, learning, skill, or the like, but this sense yielded to one still earlier in its origin, with the result that fop is now applied to a person who is preposterously concerned with fashionableness, elegance, and refinement, not only in respect to dress and manners but in respect to anything, such as literary or artistic taste, that marks the courtier or gentleman of a polite age such as prevailed in England between 1688 and 1750; as, "True fops help nature's work, and go to school To file and finish God Almighty's fool" (Dryden); "Nature made ev'ry fop to plague his brother, Just as one beauty mortifies another" (Pope); "His tightened waist, his stiff stock . . . denoted the military fop" (Disraeli).

Dandy, which had its origin (in the sense here considered) around 1800, carries a weaker implication of affectation and overrefinement than fop and a stronger suggestion of concern for stylish or striking apparel and a spruce or dapper appearance; as, "That he [Thomas Moore] had the tastes of a dandy, we learn from a letter of the time describing his 'smart white hat, kid gloves, brown frock coat, yellow cassimere waistcoat, gray duck trousers, and blue silk handkerchief carelessly secured in front by a silver pin'" (T. Walsh); "I amused myself with being . . . a dandy, a man of fashion" (Wilde). Beau, which in this sense is the counterpart of belle, was often used in the eighteenth century in place of fop, especially when a word without the implication of absurdity or fatuousness was desired. It was usually applied to what came later to be called a ladies' man, and suggests as much attention to details of personal appearance as does fop; as, "Why round our [i.e., the Beauties'] coaches crowd the white-glov'd Beaux?" (Pope); "A beau is one who, with the nicest care, In parted locks divides his curling hair; One who with balm and cinnamon smells sweet" (C. A. Elton). Coxcomb, like fop, in early use designated a pretentious fool and, like it, became applicable to a beau, as a term of contempt. However, coxcomb retains its earlier implications so clearly that it often stresses fatuousness and pretentiousness as much as, if not more than, foppishness; as, "Of all the fools that pride can boast, A coxcomb claims distinction most" (Gay); "the young coxcombs of the Life Guards" (Emerson). Exquisite was much used in the nineteenth century as a designation of a dandy who manifested the extreme delicacy and refinement of taste characteristic of a fop. "The particular styles . . . he affected had their marked influence on the young exquisites of the Mayfair balls and Pall Mall club windows" (Wilde). Élégant or, more often, the feminine élégante (both often written without accents) was frequent around 1800 in the sense of a person of fashion and elegance; as, "Would you . . . know the fashionable dress of a Parisian élegante?" (Edgeworth). Dude is an Americanism applying to a dandy or exquisite: in common use, however, the term applies chiefly to a man who makes himself conspicuously different in dress or manners from the ordinary man: it is therefore the rough man's term for the carefully dressed and groomed man, the quiet gentleman's term for the obvious dandy, a Western American's term for an Easterner or a city-bred man; as, her father told her he would not allow her to marry a dude; the boys jeer at every young man wearing a high hat and call him a "dude"; "They were all mountain-wise, range-broken men, picked...for diplomacy—in handling dudes" (Scribner's). Macaroni (spelled variously) is now a historical term applying to one of a class of fops in the eighteenth century who looked down upon British manners and customs as vulgar, and who affected Continental fashions in dress, manners, diet, and the like; as, "He wore his hair...in the fashion which I remember to have seen in caricatures of what were termed, in my young days, Macaronies" (Lamb). Buck applies usually to a dashing fellow, a dandy in dress, but not conspicuously, or necessarily, a gentleman in manners; as, "The dashing young buck, driving his own equipage" (Irving); "I remember you a buck of bucks when that coat first came out to Calcutta" (Thackeray). Spark, an older term in English than beau, carries much the same implications: it is, however, applicable to a man of any age who manifests interest in parading his good points; as, "These sparks with awkward vanity display What the fine gentleman wore yesterday" (Pope); "Thus Mr. Povey came out in his true colours as a blood, a blade, and a gay spark" (Bennett). Swell, nob, toff are all colloquial or slang terms applying to one who by his dress and bearing makes it evident that he is a person of fashion. Swell originally applied to any fashionably or stylishly clad person, without regard to class or social station, but it is often currently applied to one who belongs to the highest social ranks; as, "I never was a gentleman—only a swell" (Marryat); "though not what they themselves call great swells, they have the manners and appearance and speech and habits of the capitalist class, [and] are described as gentlemen" (Shaw). Nob and toff are British slang terms applied to one who is, as judged by his dress, his manners, or bearing, an aristocrat, or a person of social distinction; as, "The little waiter...began to think Ferdinand was not such a nob as he had imagined" (Disraeli).

for, conj. *Because, since, as, inasmuch as.

forage, n. Fodder, provender, *food, provisions, comestibles, victuals, viands, grub, eats, chow.

forbear. 1 *Forgo, abnegate, eschew, sacrifice.

Ana. *Restrain, curb, bridle, inhibit: avoid, *escape, evade, shun: desist (from), cease (see STOP).

2 *Refrain, abstain.

Ana. Suffer, tolerate, endure, *bear.

forbearance. 1 Long-suffering, *patience, longanimity, resignation.

Ana. & Ant. See those at FORBEARING, 2.

2 Tolerance, clemency, mercifulness, leniency, indulgence. See under FORBEARING, adj.

Ana. *Patience, long-suffering, longanimity: *mercy, lenity, grace, charity.

Ant. Vindictiveness: anger.

forbearing. Forbearing, tolerant, clement, merciful, lenient, indulgent agree in meaning disinclined by nature, disposition, or circumstances to be severe or rigorous. The same differences in implications and connotations are observable in their corresponding nouns forbearance, tolerance, clemency, mercifulness, leniency (or lenience), indulgence. Forbearing and forbearance imply patience under provocation and deliberate abstention from judging harshly, exacting punishment, seeking vengeance or revenge, or the like. "Madame Beck was...forbearing with all the world" (C. Bronz). "He thought of old days: of his father's forbearance, his own wilfulness" (Meredith). Tolerant and tolerance imply both a freedom from bias or bigotry and a liberal attitude to opinions other than one's own (especially to religious, philosophical, and political doctrines) that forbid severity or rigor in judging others who hold such opinions or doctrines or the imposition of any restrictions upon their freedom to think as they will. "[Anatole] France, as usual, professed a very tolerant attitude. One must gratify whatever tastes one has and seek whatever happiness one may be able to find" (J. W. Krutch). "Of all kinds of human energy, Art is surely the most free, the least parochial; and demands of us an essential tolerance of all its forms" (Galsworthy). Clement and clemency (see also MERCY) suggest a temperament or nature that is mild and gentle, especially in judging offenders, and is slow to exact their punishment if a pardon or forgiveness will satisfy the purpose; as, a clement ruler; a judge known far and wide for his clemency. "He [Octavian] was clement whenever he could be clement with safety, and he began to pardon the proscribed" (Buchan). Merciful and mercifulness imply both compassionate and forbearing treatment, especially of those who have offended or of those who merit severity or are defenseless against it. "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness" (Hebrews viii. 12). "Good my lord, be good to me; your honor is accounted a merciful man" (Shak.). Lenient (see also SOFT) and leniency differ from clement in suggesting usually, but not invariably, softness rather than gentleness of temper, and a relaxation of discipline or rigor; as, a lenient teacher (or parent). "I would ask you, dearest, to be...very lenient on his faults when he is not by" (Dickens). "She could not show the slightest leniency towards the romantic impulses of her elder daughter" (Bennett). Indulgent and indulgence usually imply complacency as well as leniency; they therefore often suggest a willingness to pamper or favor (see INDULGE). As here compared, however, they imply, even more strongly than lenient and leniency, concessions made out of charity or the exercise of clemency in the treatment of those who offend or who are under one's government or control. "Neither Fox nor the [early] Christian martyrs [all of whom refused customary marks of courtesy and respect for the laws] made it easy for their judges to be indulgent" (Inge). "Simple-hearted kindly New York, on whose larger charity she [an unhappy wife suspected of adultery] had apparently counted, was precisely the place where she could least hope for indulgence" (E. Wharton).

Ana. Gentle, mild (see SOFT): patient, long-suffering, longanimous (see corresponding nouns at PATIENCE).

Ant. Unrelenting. — Con. Implacable, merciless, relentless, *grim: *impatient, nervous, restive.

forbid. Forbid, prohibit, enjoin, interdict, inhibit, ban agree in meaning to debar a person from using, doing, entering, or the like, or to order something not be used, done, entered, or the like. Forbid (the Saxon term) is the more direct and familiar, prohibit (the Latin term), the more formal or official; they do not widely differ in their essential implications for they both imply the exercise of authority or the existence of conditions which prevent with similar imperativeness. However, forbid carries so strong a connotation of expected obedience that it is preferred when the order is that of a parent, a master, an employer, a physician, or the like; as, to forbid a child to leave the house; smoking is forbidden on these premises. "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not" (Mark x. 14). "The whole attraction of such knowledge consists in the fact that it is forbidden" (B. Russell). When circumstances absolutely debar, forbid is also preferred; as, his health forbade the use of tobacco. Prohibit has been used for so long in reference to laws, statutes, regulations, and the like, that it tends to connote a less despotic exercise of authority and restraints imposed for the good of all or for the sake of orderly procedure; as, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; to prohibit, by international agreement, the bombing of cities; to prohibit the indiscriminate use of fireworks. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States" (U. S. Const.). Enjoin (see also COMMAND) is a legal term implying a judicial order forbidding something under penalty. "By the decision of the Court the defendant should be enjoined from publishing news obtained from the Associated Press for—[a certain number of] hours after publication by the plaintiff" (Justice Holmes). Interdict implies prohibition by authority, usually civil or ecclesiastical authority, commonly for a given time and for a salutary purpose, such as the maintenance of neutrality, the prevention of the spread of disease, or as an exemplary punishment; as, to interdict trade with belligerents; to interdict the importation of certain kinds of barberries in wheat-growing states; to interdict the administration of the sacraments in a rebellious diocese. "Sunday...until two o'clock, was a solemn interval, during which all the usual books and plays were interdicted" (M. Austin). Inhibit, in strict use, implies the imposition of restraints or restrictions that amount to prohibitions, not only by authority but also by the exigencies of the time or situation. "A clause was...inserted which inhibited the Bank from advancing money to the Crown without authority from Parliament" (Macaulay). "The peril that besets a highly gifted poetic nature, when at bad moments thought inhibits imagination" (Lowes). In modern psychological use inhibit suggests the restraints imposed by one's conscience, one's training, or one's philosophy, which cause one to suppress certain thoughts or desires before they can find full expression; as, "Stoicism teaches men...to inhibit the emotion of pity" (Inge). "He is inhibited, he inhibits himself, even from seeking on his own account that vital experience which is the stuff of the creative life" (Van W. Brooks). Ban carries with it an implication not only of civil or ecclesiastical prohibition, but a strong connotation of condemnation or disapproval; as, to ban all obscene magazines; to ban profane language.

Ana. Debar, rule out, *exclude: preclude, obviate, *prevent: *prevent, forestall.

Ant. Permit: bid. — Con. *Let, allow, suffer: *authorize, license: *approve, sanction, endorse: order, *command, enjoin.

force, n. 1 *Power, energy, strength, might, puissance, arm.

Ana. *Stress, strain, pressure, tension, shear, thrust, torsion: *speed, velocity, momentum, impetus, headway.

2 Force, violence, compulsion, coercion, duress, constraint, restraint, as here compared, denote the exercise or the exertion of power in order to impose one's will on a person or to have one's will with a thing. Force and violence regularly but not invariably apply to physical powers used upon either persons or things; compulsion, coercion, duress, constraint, restraint apply to either physical or moral power used upon personal agents only (except in certain figurative uses)—compulsion, coercion, and duress usually implying exercise of such power upon others than oneself, constraint or restraint upon oneself or others. Force (see POWER, 1) applies to any exercise of physical strength or of power comparable to physical strength by means of which an agent imposes his will upon another against that person's will or causes a thing to move as desired in spite of its resistance; as, "Rude fishermen... By force took Dromio" (Shak.); "To work in close design, by fraud or guile, What force effected not" (Milton); to move a huge boulder by main force; "the sceptical criticism that 'justice' is merely another name for force" (G. L. Dickinson). Violence is often used in place of force, then commonly implying an even greater display of power or fury and often connoting the infliction of injury or cruelty; as, "They will by violence tear him from your palace" (Shak.); "the rest of the party kept off the crowd by mingled persuasion and violence" (Shaw). As a result of the meaning of the term in law, and of other senses, violence often implies a violation of another's legal rights or property (thus, to enter a house by violence is to enter it as a burglar by breaking and forcing) or a profanation of someone or something entitled to respect, observance, security, or the like; as, "do violence to no man" (Luke iii. 14); "all these many and varied powers had been acquired without doing violence to republican sentiment" (Buchan); "The phrase 'every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce' may be construed to mean 'while engaged in trade or commerce' without violence to the habits of English speech" (Justice Holmes). Compulsion and, still more, coercion imply the application, usually by some active agent, of physical force or of moral pressure, or the exercise of one's authority in order to control the action of a voluntary agent and to make him obedient to one's will; as, "I would give no man a reason upon compulsion" (Shak.); coercion by threat or intimidation; "masterpieces I read under compulsion without the faintest interest" (B. Russell); "solutions forced upon a most practical mind by the stern compulsion of facts" (Buchan); "In the submissive way of one long accustomed to obey under coercion" (Dickens). Duress, which is chiefly a legal term, implies compulsion to do or forbear some act by means that are illegal, such as by imprisonment, or threats to imprison, or by some other form of violence. In more general use, however, duress implies compulsion or coercion through fear of a penalty that will or may be exacted; as, "Ordinary clergymen subscribe them [the Thirty-nine Articles] under duress because they cannot otherwise obtain ordination" (Shaw). Constraint and restraint may imply the exercise of physical or moral power either by an active agent or by the force of circumstances; constraint sometimes implies an urging or driving to action, but more frequently implies its forcible restriction or confinement, whereas restraint suggests its actual hindrance or curbing; as, "The...lion...roar'd With sharp constraint of hunger" (Shak.); "I will confess...without constraint" (Shak.); "Obligation [to do one's duty] is felt by the good man, whereas the bad one feels constraint" (S. Alexander); "Absolute liberty is absence of restraint; responsibility is restraint; therefore, the ideally free individual is responsible only to himself" (H. Adams); "The absence of exuberance on his part, and the restraint I put upon myself, lend an element of dignity to our intercourse" (A. Repplier); "The emotion...was the deeper and the sweeter for the restraint that he had put upon himself" (Arch. Marshall).

Ana. Intensity, vehemence (see corresponding adjectives at INTENSE): *effort, exertion, pains, trouble.

force, v. Force, compel, coerce, constrain, oblige agree in meaning to make a person or thing yield to the will of a person or to the strength or power of a thing. Force, the ordinary and most general word in this group, in all of its senses implies the exertion of strength, typically physical strength, or the working of something analogous in moving power or effectiveness to such strength, such as natural or logical necessity. Usually, the verb is followed by an infinitive, such as to do, to move, to go, or to act, or by a prepositional phrase introduced by into, to, from, through, out, upon, or the like; as, to force slaves to labor; to force food upon a child; he said hunger forced him to steal the food; his conscience forced him into repaying what he had stolen; to force oneself to smile; the man could not be forced from the position he had taken. Sometimes, however, the term takes a simple object, naming only the person forced or the thing brought about by force: then the verb carries additional implications which are often apparent only to those who know its idiomatic use in the particular phrase; thus, to force a woman is to rape her; to force a door is to break it open; to force laughter (or a smile or tears, etc.) is to make oneself laugh (or smile or cry, etc.) against one's will; to force bulbs is to hasten their development by artificial means; to force a word is to make it carry more significance than it can bear by reason of its accepted meaning; so, forced language; a forced style. Compel differs from force chiefly in typically requiring a personal object: any other type of object such as a reaction or response (as, she always compels admiration; an argument that compels assent) or a concrete thing (as, "such a breeze Compell'd thy canvas"—Tennyson) is possible only in figurative or poetic language when the specific connotations of compel, such as the exertion of irresistible power or force or a victory over resistance, are to be carried by the verb. In its typical use, compel commonly implies the exercise of authority, the exertion of great effort or driving force, or the impossibility for one reason or another of doing anything else; as, "[They] submit because they are compelled; but they would resist, and finally resist effectively, if they were not cowards" (Shaw); "We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forest and our crops are destroyed" (Justice Holmes); "There is no possible method of compelling a child to feel sympathy or affection" (B. Russell); "The westerling sun at length compelled me to quit the wood" (Hudson). Coerce suggests far more severity in the methods employed than compel does: commonly it connotes the exertion of violence or duress, or the use of means such as threats, intimidation, and the like; as, "There are more ways of coercing a man than by pointing a gun at his head" (Inge); "Charles the First signed his own death warrant when he undertook to coerce that stubborn will [of Londoners]" (A. Replier). Constrain (etymologically, to draw tight) stresses far more than does compel, its closest synonym, the force exerted by that which presses or binds: it usually suggests the influence of restrictions, self-imposed or placed upon one by force, by nature, by necessity, by circumstances, or the like, that compel one to do a stated or implied thing, live a stated or implied way, think certain thoughts, or the like; as, "the love of Christ constraineth us" (2 Corinthians v. 14); "I describe everything exactly as it took place, constraining my mind not to wander from the task" (Dickens); "causes which he loathed in his heart but which he was constrained to consider just" (Van W. Brooks); "tied him to the wall, where he was constrained to stay till a kind passer-by released him" (Galsworthy). Oblige usually implies the constraint of necessity, sometimes physical necessity (as, "a sharp pain obliged him to close his eyelids quickly"—Hardy), but equally often moral or intellectual necessity (as, he is obliged, in conscience, to undo the harm he has done to a man's good name; "Even the so-called laws of nature are only instruments to be used . . . we are not obliged to believe them"—Inge). The term also is used with reference to any person or thing which is regarded as authoritative, or as having the right to determine one's course or acts; as, "the discipline of their great School . . . obliges them to bring up a weekly essay to their tutor" (Quiller-Couch); "the convention which obliged a satirist to be scathing" (Inge).

Ana. Impel, drive, *move: *command, order, enjoin: exact, *demand, require.

forceful. *Powerful, potent, forcible, puissant.

Ana. Compelling, constraining (see FORCE, v.): virile, manful (see MALE): cogent, telling, convincing (see VALID): *effective, efficient.

foreknow. Divine, *foresee, anticipate, apprehend.

Ana. *Foretell, predict, forecast, prophesy, prognosticate: *infer, gather, conclude.

foremost. Leading, *chief, principal, main, capital.

forensic, n. Debate, disputation, *argumentation, dialectic.

forerunner. Forerunner, precursor, harbinger, herald are synonymous terms only when they denote someone or something that comes before another person or thing and in some way indicates his (or its) future appearance. Forerunner literally denotes a messenger that runs before a king, prince, lord, or the like, to warn others of his approach; as, "There is a forerunner come from . . . the Prince of Morocco, who brings word the prince his master will be here to-night" (Shak.). In extended use, the term is applicable to anything that serves as a sign, presage, prognostic, or the like, of something to follow; as, a coma is often the forerunner of death; a black sky and a sudden squall are the usual forerunners of a thunderstorm. Precursor (etymologically, forerunner) in its earliest English use was applied to John the Baptist, who preceded Jesus and prepared the way for his teachings. The word therefore in very careful use commonly carries an implication of making ready or of paving the way for the success or accomplishments of another person or thing, rather than, as forerunner, serving as an announcement or prediction of what is to come; as, "the medieval sects which Dr. Rufus Jones describes as precursors of Quakerism" (Inge); "Kepler, more than any man, was the precursor of Newton" (H. Ellis); "it is important to realize that a long period of [scientific analysis]... was an essential precursor of the present period of synthesis which has been so fruitful of good to mankind" (A. C. Morrison). Harbinger literally denotes one who goes before, especially to provide lodgings for his lord or master; as, "I'll be myself the harbinger and make joyful The hearing of my wife with your approach" (Shak.). The term is now used chiefly in a figurative sense, sometimes applying to a person or thing that announces something which is coming and for which one must be prepared (as, "Make all our trumpets speak; give them all breath, Those clamorous harbingers of blood and death"—Shak.), sometimes applying to something which goes before to provide a place of rest (as, "Drawing near her death, she sent most pious thoughts as harbingers to heaven"—Fuller). Herald literally denotes one who makes a solemn and stately proclamation or announcement as of war or peace, the birth of an heir to the throne, or the like; in careful figurative use, it is applied only to something which similarly announces or proclaims; as, "It was the lark, the herald of the morn" (Shak.); "He [the cock] is the sun's brave herald, That, ringing his blithe horn, Calls round a world dew-pearled The heavenly airs of morn" (K. Tynan).

Ana. Anticipator (see corresponding verb at PREVENT): announcer or announcement, advertiser or advertisement (see corresponding verbs at DECLARE): portent, prognostic, omen, *foretoken, presage, augury: forewarning, warning (see WARN).

foresee. Foresee, foreknow, divine, apprehend, anticipate agree in meaning to know something will happen or come into existence in advance of its occurrence or advent or that something exists before it is manifested or expressed. Foresee apart from its context gives no hint of how this knowledge is derived, whether through presentiment, inspiration, one's ability to draw inferences, or the like. "It's certainly unwise to admit any sort of responsibility for our actions, whose consequences we are never able to foresee" (Conrad). "Nobody can foresee how the necessary restriction of the population will be effected" (Shaw). "[Lincoln] the kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man" (J. R. Lowell). Foreknow usually, but not invariably, implies supernatural powers or the assistance of supernatural powers, as through revelation. "If thou [ghost of Hamlet's father] art privy to thy country's fate, Which, happily, foreknowing may avoid, O, speak!" (Shak.). "They themselves decreed, Their own revolt, not I [God]. If I foreknew, Foreknowledge had no influence on their fault" (Milton). Divine, as here compared, is not always clearly distinguishable from foresee, but it often suggests a gift or a special power, or sometimes unusual sagacity or discernment. "To Rima has been given this quickness of mind and power to divine distant things" (Hudson). "In all the years of his traveling to and fro through Europe he [Mark Twain] divined hardly one of the social tendencies that had so spectacular a dénouement within four years of his death" (Van W. Brooks). Apprehend conveys less of a sense of the certainty of that which is foreseen than any of the preceding words, but it carries a far stronger implication of the emotional effects of advance knowledge. In general, where one apprehends an evil, one is filled with fear, anxiety, or dread. "They agree with me in apprehending that this false step in one daughter will be injurious to the fortunes of all the others" (Austen). "Almost every evening he saw Lucy. The inexperienced little wife apprehended no harm in his visits" (Meredith). Anticipate is a far more complex term than any of its synonyms. Thus, a critic may foresee the verdict of posterity on a literary work, but he anticipates it only when he formulates a judgment which is either accepted by posterity or is pronounced by it as though the verdict were new. One may foreknow one's destiny or apprehend a danger, but one anticipates one's destiny or a danger only when, through the appropriate advance enjoyment or suffering, one also has a foretaste of that destiny or that danger. One may divine a friend's wish in advance of its expression, but one anticipates it only when one also gratifies it in advance of its expression. The use of anticipate as an alternative to expect is not generally approved; its use in the sense of to look forward to (something expected) with a foretaste of the pleasure or pain it promises is, on the other hand, generally countenanced. "Pleasure not known beforehand is half wasted; to anticipate it is to double it" (Hardy).

Ana. Forecast, predict, *foretell, prophesy, prognosticate: perceive, discern, descry, espy (see SEE).

foreshore. Beach, strand, *shore, ripa, coast, littoral.

foresight. Forethought, providence, discretion, *prudence.

Ana. Sagacity, perspicacity, shrewdness, astuteness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD): acumen, clairvoyance, *discernment, divination, perception.

Ant. Hindsight.

foresighted. Forethoughted, provident, discreet, prudent. See under PRUDENCE.

Ana. Sagacious, perspicacious, *shrewd, astute: *intelligent, alert, quick-witted, brilliant, knowing: *wise, judicious, sage, sapient.

Ant. Hindsighted.

forestall. *Prevent, anticipate.

Ana. Ward off, avert, *prevent, preclude, obviate: *frustrate, thwart, foil, circumvent.

Con. Court, woo, *invite: further, forward, *advance, promote.

foretaste, n. Anticipation, *prospect, outlook.

Ana. Realization, actualization (see corresponding verbs at REALIZE): token, earnest, *pledge: presentiment, foreboding (see APPREHENSION).

Con. Fruition, enjoyment (see PLEASURE): attainment, achievement (see corresponding verbs at REACH).

foretell. Foretell, predict, forecast, prophesy, prognosticate, augur, presage, portend, forebode agree in meaning to tell something before it happens through special knowledge or occult power. Foretell and predict are frequently interchangeable; but foretell stresses the announcement of coming events and does not, apart from a context, indicate the nature of the agent's power or the source of his information. "Some sorcerer... had foretold, dying, that none of all our blood should know the shadow from the substance" (Tennyson). "The marvelous exactness by which eclipses are foretold" (Karl K. Darrow). Predict now commonly implies inference from facts or accepted laws of nature; it often connotes scientific accuracy in foretelling; as, "Mr. Brooke's conclusions were as difficult to predict as the weather" (G. Eliot); an astronomer predicts the return of a comet. "The infant... has need of reassurance, and it will be happier if everything... seems to happen according to invariable laws, so as to be predictable" (B. Russell). Forecast, in its older and now uncommon sense, implies taking forethought of the future as by anticipation, conjecture of possible eventualities, provision for one's needs, and the like. "Seeking me, who then Safe to the rock of Etham was retired— Not flying, but forecasting in what place To set upon them" (Milton). "A prudent builder should forecast How long the stuff is like to last" (Swift). In current use, it implies prediction, but it still retains the implication of anticipated eventualities; as, to forecast the weather; since hurricanes have been forecast, losses in life and property have dwindled. Prophecy, as here compared, either connotes inspired or mystic knowledge or implies great assurance in prediction; as, "ancestral voices prophesying war" (Coleridge); "Wrinkled benchers often talked of him approvingly, and prophesied his rise" (Tennyson). Prognosticate implies prediction based upon signs or symptoms; as, a skillful physician can prognosticate the course of most diseases. "For the last three hundred years the relation of Church to State has been constantly undergoing change. . . I am not concerned with prognosticating their future relations" (T. S. Eliot). Prognosticate and all the yet undiscriminated words of this group also come into comparison in a second sense, that of to betoken or foreshow future events or conditions. "Everything seems to prognosticate a hard winter" (W. Cobbett). Augur, in its strict sense, implies divination by an augur, an official diviner in ancient Rome, who, by interpreting signs and omens, especially those pertaining to the flight of birds, was able to announce whether conditions were favorable or unfavorable for a given project. In its extended sense, the word implies a divining or a foreshadowing of something pleasant or unpleasant, often but by no means invariably through interpretation of signs. "The morrow brought a very sober-looking morning. . . Catherine augured from it everything most favourable to her wishes" (Austen). "An unloved brother, of whom worse things had been augured" (G. Eliot). "Late had he heard, in prophet's dream, The fatal Ben-Shie's boding scream . . . The thunderbolt had split the pine,— All augured ill to Alpine's line" (Scott). Presage and portend more often imply foreshowing than foretelling, though both senses are found. Both also, in precise use, suggest occult power or an ability to interpret signs and omens as a basis for prediction, but presage may be used of neutral or of favorable as well as unfavorable prognostications, whereas portend always suggests a threat of evil or disaster. "Lands he could measure, terms and tides presage" (Goldsmith). "The yellow and vapoury sunset. . . had presaged change" (Hardy). "Some great misfortune to portend, No enemy can match a friend" (Swift). "Had it not been written. . . that his sign in the high heavens portended war?" (Kipling). Forebode implies unfavorable prognostication based upon premonitions, presentiments, dreams, or the like; as, "His heart forebodes a mystery" (Tennyson); he was oppressed by a foreboding of evil.

Ana. Divine, foreknow, *foresee, anticipate, apprehend: announce, *declare, proclaim: *reveal, divulge, disclose, discover: forewarn, *warn.

forethought. Foresight, providence, discretion, *prudence.

Ana. Premeditatedness or premeditation, deliberateness or deliberation (see corresponding verbs at DELIBERATE): wisdom, judgment, *sense, gumption.

forethoughted. Foresighted, provident, discreet, prudent. See under PRUDENCE.

Ana. *Cautious, circumspect, wary, calculating: *deliberate, premeditated, considered, advised, studied.

foretoken, n. Foretoken, presage, prognostic, omen, augury, portent are here compared as meaning an event, a phenomenon, a condition, or the like, that serves as a sign of future happenings. Foretoken, the general term, is applicable to anything observable which may be the basis of a prediction or forecast; as, the usual foretokens of a thunder storm, intense sultriness, a heavily overcast sky, and suddenly arising winds; in June, 1914, there were few foretokens of war. Presage is applied chiefly to foretokens which inspire emotions such as fear or hope, dread or longing, confidence or despair, or the like, and therefore give rise to presentiments rather than serve as a basis for prediction. "Three times, while crossing the ocean, he sees a lunar rainbow, and each time he takes it as a presage of good fortune" (Van W. Brooks). Prognostic applies to any advance indication or symptom from which a skilled person can infer what is coming; it is now much used in medicine of any symptom useful to a physician in predicting the course or the termination of an illness. "Prognostics do not always prove prophecies, at least the wisest prophets make sure of the event first" (Walpole). "Prognostics are those circumstances on which a prognosis is based" (A. Flint). Omen is applicable chiefly to any extraordinary event or circumstance which one feels, especially under the influence of superstition, to be a promise of something to come. "Nay I have had some omens: I got out of bed backwards too this morning, without premeditation; pretty good that too; but then I stumbled coming down stairs, and met a weasel; bad omens those: some bad, some good, our lives are checquer'd" (Congreve). Consequently, an event of ill omen or of good omen is one that is felt to be a presage of ill or of good. Augury and omen are often interchangeable but augury is applicable to ordinary as well as to phenomenal circumstances, and it usually suggests discernment rather than superstition in determining whether it presages good or evil; as, achievements that he regarded as auguries (not omens) of a successful career for his son; a black cat crossing her path was to her a fearful omen (not augury). "I had felt there was a mysterious meaning in that moment, and in that flight of dim-seen birds an augury of ill-omen for my life" (L. P. Smith). Portent is applicable chiefly to prodigies or marvels such as an eclipse, a comet, an earthquake, or something comparable, which are interpreted as forewarnings or supernatural intimations of evil to come. "What plagues and what portents! what mutiny! What raging of the sea! shaking of earth! Commotion in the winds!" (Shak.). "Why gnaw you [Othello] so your nether lip? Some bloody passion shakes your very frame: These are portents; but yet I [Desdemona] hope, I hope, They do not point on me" (Shak.).

Ana. *Sign, symptom, token, mark, badge, note: *fore-runner, harbinger, precursor, herald.

forever or for ever. Forever (or, Brit., for ever), ever, always, aye, evermore, forevermore (or, Brit., for evermore) agree in meaning for all time. They are often used interchangeably without loss, but when a nice shade of meaning is to be expressed, there is usually a first choice. When one wishes a term that means perpetually or eternally and without intermission, forever is the precise choice; as, I shall think of you forever with affection. "For ever piping songs for ever new" (Keats). Forever also, in ironic use, can imply, as perpetually and eternally often do, incessancy or persistency; as, these children are forever asking questions. When one wishes a word that means invariably and in every instance, past, present, or future, ever, though often regarded as archaic, is the explicit term; as, ostracism is ever the consequence of defiance of the proprieties; traitors are ever without honor in their own country. When one wishes to imply intermission yet perpetual recurrence, always is the proper choice; as, I shall always (not forever or ever) think of you when I return to this place; he is always disappointed when he counts confidently on success. Aye is archaic and dialectal, usually for always, but sometimes for forever. "And ay the ale was growing better" (Burns). When a word, especially an emphatic poetic or literary word, is sought to imply eternity, especially with reference to the future, evermore or forevermore meets one's needs; as, he will evermore regret the course he took; he will be happy forevermore. Evermore is more often found in quasi-substantive use in the phrase for evermore, which equals forevermore. "And, little town, thy streets for evermore Will silent be" (Keats).

forevermore or, Brill., for evermore. Evermore, *forever, ever, always, aye.

forewarn. *Warn, caution.

Ana. Notify, advise, apprise, *inform: admonish (see REPROVE): advise, counsel (see under ADVICE).

foreword. Preface, prolegomenon, proem, exordium, *introduction, prologue, prelude, overture, preamble, prolusion, protasis, avant-propos.

forge, v. Fabricate, fashion, manufacture, form, shape, *make.

Ana. *Beat, pound: produce, turn out (see BEAR): counterfeit, simulate (see ASSUME): *copy, imitate.

forget. Overlook, ignore, disregard, *neglect, omit, slight.

Ant. Remember. — Con. Recollect, recall, bethink, mind (see REMEMBER).

forgetful. Forgetful, oblivious, unmindful come into comparison as meaning losing or letting go from one's mind something once known or learned. Forgetful usually implies a propensity not to remember, or a defective memory; as, "Bear with me, good boy, I am much forgetful" (Shak.); she is growing forgetful. Sometimes, however, it implies a not keeping in mind something which should be remembered: it then connotes negligence or heedlessness rather than a poor memory; as, one should not be forgetful of his social obligations; "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers" (Hebrews xiii. 2). Oblivious in careful use stresses forgetfulness, but it rarely suggests a poor memory. Rather, it suggests a failure to remember, either because one has been robbed of remembrance by conditions beyond one's control (as, the accident rendered him for a few hours oblivious of all that weighed upon his mind), or because one has deliberately put something out of one's mind (as, a government oblivious of the rights of the governed), or because one has considered something too slight or trivial to note and remember it (as, a people so long unused to aggression as to be oblivious of its dangers). In looser use, often regarded as erroneous use, oblivious is employed without a clear connotation of forgetfulness, and in a sense close to unconscious, unaware, insensible, and the like; as, walking along whistling, oblivious of the passing crowds; "oblivious of the laws and conditions of trespass" (Meredith). Oblivious is sometimes used attributively and without a succeeding of or to in the sense of causing oblivion; as, "She lay in deep, oblivious slumber" (Longfellow). Unmindful is a close synonym of forgetful in the sense of not keeping in mind, but it may imply a deliberate consignment to oblivion as well as inattention, heedlessness, or negligence; as, a mother, solicitous of the health of every member of her family, but unmindful of her own; "Every person was willing to save himself, unmindful of others" (Goldsmith); "For at her silver voice came Death and Life, Unmindful each of their accustomed strife" (Shelley).

Ana. Remiss, *negligent, neglectful, lax, slack: heedless, thoughtless, *careless.

Con. Conscious, *aware, cognizant, sensible, alive, awake: *thoughtful, considerate, attentive.

forgive. Pardon, remit, *excuse, condone.

Ana. Absolve, *exculpate, acquit, exonerate, vindicate: *confess, shrive, absolve, remit.

forgo, also forego. Forgo (or forego), forbear, abnegate, eschew, sacrifice come into comparison when they denote to deny oneself something for the sake of an end. One forgoes for the sake of policy, expediency, the welfare of others, or the like, something already enjoyed or indulged in, or within reach. "He agreed...to forgo all remuneration until his apprenticeship was completed" (Van W. Brooks). Often it implies surrender or abandonment. "By substituting rhythm alone for the fusion of rhythm and metre in one, it [free verse] has foregone the great harmonic, orchestral effects of the older verse" (Lowes). One forbears, through motives of prudence, charity, or the like, doing or saying something one wishes to do or say. Forbear usually implies self-restraint. "Although...I do not get much help from general propositions in a case of this sort, I cannot forbear quoting what seems to me applicable here" (Justice Holmes). One abnegates what is intrinsically good but not consistent with one's aims, principles, or limitations. "To treat English poetry [in teaching literature] as though it had died with Tennyson...is to abnegate high hope for the sake of a barren convenience" (Quiller-Couch). In its narrower and more common signification, abnegate implies renunciation or self-effacement, but this distinction is not as commonly maintained in the verb as in the derivative noun abnegation. One eschews (as here compared: see ESCAPE, 2) something tempting, formerly because it was to be avoided on moral or aesthetic grounds, but now, more often, because abstinence or self-restraint is necessary for the achievement of a more significant desire or end. "To work within these strict limits, eschewing all the helps to illusion that modelling and shadow give, was doubtless an exercise of incomparable service to the artist" (Binyon). One sacrifices something highly desirable, or in itself of great value, for the sake of a person, ideal, or end dearer to one than the thing (sometimes person) involved: the term typically, but not invariably, connotes renunciation and self-denial and a religious or ethical motive comparable to that of self-immolation; as, to sacrifice a college education for the sake of supporting one's mother; to sacrifice one's life in defense of one's country. "I do not mean that the well-to-do should...forego educational opportunities which...are not open to all. To do that would be to sacrifice civilization to justice" (B. Russell).

Ana. Waive, *relinquish, surrender, abandon: renounce, resign, *abdicate.

forlorn. 1 Lorn, lone, desolate, lonesome, lonely, *alone, solitary.

Ana. Separated, parted, divorced, severed, sundered (see SEPARATE, v.): forsaken, deserted, abandoned (see ABANDON, v.): wretched, *miserable: depressed, weighed down, oppressed (see DEPRESS).

2 Hopeless, *despondent, despairing, desperate.

Ana. Pessimistic, *cynical: *futile, vain, fruitless.

Con. *Elastic, resilient, buoyant, expansive, volatile: *elated, elate, exultant: optimistic, *hopeful, roseate, rose-colored.

forlornness. Hopelessness, despondency, despair, desperation. See under DESPONDENT.

Ana. Dejection, depression, gloom, melancholy, blues, dumps, *sadness.

form, n. 1 Form, figure, shape, conformation, configuration, Gestalt come into comparison when they denote the disposition or arrangement of content that gives a particular aspect or appearance to a thing as distinguished from the substance of which that thing is made.

Form is not only the most widely applicable of these terms, but it is also the least definitely fixed in its meaning, largely because of its being assigned various denotations in philosophy and aesthetics and because of its frequent use in reference to literature, music, and thought, where more is involved than the disposition or arrangement of content as perceived by the senses. In general, however, form more than any of the other words implies reference to internal structure and disposition of details as well as to boundary lines, and suggests unity in the whole; as, "The earth was without form, and void" (Genesis i. 2); "In a perfect example of either art [painting or poetry] this subject-matter is fused with the form, so that we cannot dissolve them from one another" (Binyon); "You might go in for building. . . you've got a feeling for form" (M. Austin). Figure, as here compared, applies usually to the form as determined by the lines which bound or enclose a thing (as, "Flowers have all exquisite figures"—Bacon; the woman has a beautiful figure); in current use, however, the term usually suggests the lines (sometimes the visible form) characteristic of the kind, type, or species (as, to paint Christ under the figure of a lamb; because of the darkness it was hard to say whether the person had the figure of a man or of a woman) or the lines which follow a more or less conventional pattern rather than represent something actual (as, to cut figures on the ice in skating; to decorate the border with figures of scrolls, circles, crescents, and the like; a rug design in geometrical figures). Shape, like figure, suggests reference to the boundary lines, but it carries a stronger implication of a mass or of a body than does figure and is therefore precisely applicable only to that which is shown in its bulk rather than in its lines; thus, one draws the figure (not shape) of a circle or a triangle, but one forms a mass of clay in the shape (better than figure) of a ball or of a man; "the colour of his beard, the shape of his leg" (Shak). Often, but not invariably, shape applies to the outlines that have been given to a mass as by molding, carving, pressure, or the like; as, "Brooke is a very good fellow, but pulpy; he will run into any mould, but he won't keep shape" (G. Eliot); "It is the business of the sensitive artist in life to accept his own nature as it is, not to try to force it into another shape" (A. Huxley). Form, figure, and shape are also used in reference to the bodies of living creatures, especially of men and women. Form is perhaps the most shadowy of these terms: it is applied chiefly to persons or animals identified but not clearly seen or noted in detail; as, "the reddleman watched his form as it diminished to a speck on the road" (Hardy); "busy forms bent over intolerable tasks, whizzing wheels, dark gleaming machinery" (A. C. Benson). Figure usually suggests closer vision than form and some perception of details, but stresses lines, carriage, posture, or the like; as, "here and there a figure. . . leaned on the rail" (Conrad); "they watched her white figure drifting along the edge of the grove" (Cather). Shape differs little from figure except in its clearer suggestion of flesh and body; as, "Some human shapes appearing mysteriously, as if they had sprung up from the dark ground" (Conrad); "And the shade under the ash-trees became deserted, save by the tall dark figure of a man, and a woman's white shape" (Galsworthy). Conformation stresses the structure of something composed or fashioned of a number of related or carefully adjusted parts: it carries only a slight suggestion of reference to the outer lines or shape; as, the conformation of the vocal organs; the conformation of the engine is most intricate. Configuration emphasizes the disposition or arrangement of parts that are different in size, elevation, shape, and the like, especially over an extent of space or territory; thus, the configuration of a county is represented in a relief map of that county; "the remarkable configuration of the Atlantic sea-bed" (T. H. Huxley); "in every province there was a network of roads following the configuration of the country" (Buchan). Configuration is also used as a translation of the German term Gestalt, literally, a form which derives its significance not from the various and varying parts or elements which comprise it, but from the pattern they assume when combined so as to be interrelated and integrated. The term is used chiefly in psychology, in reference to physical, biological, and psychological phenomena which affect or manifest the psychical life of the individual; thus, a man's personality may be studied as a Gestalt.

Ana. Contour, *outline, profile, silhouette: *structure, anatomy, framework, skeleton: organism, *system, economy, scheme.

2 Form, formality, ceremony, ceremonial, rite, ritual, liturgy come into comparison when they mean an established or fixed method of procedure, especially as enjoined by law, the customs of social intercourse, the church, or the like. Form is the comprehensive term applicable to any recognized way of doing things in accordance with rule or prescription; as, the forms of polite society; in due form; "the occasional exercise of a beautiful form of worship" (Irving). Form often implies show without substance or suggests an outward shell devoid of its life, or spirit; as, "The rest. . . Will deem in. . . specious forms Religion satisfied" (Milton). "For who would keep an ancient form Thro' which the spirit breathes no more?" (Tennyson). Formality applies narrowly only to some procedure required by law, custom, etiquette, or the like, that is more or less conventional or perfunctory in its character. "There was now and then the formality of saying a lesson" (Lamb). "Mr. Citchlow entered without any formalities, as usual" (Bennett). The term often implies endless details or red tape. "Outland was delayed by the formalities of securing his patent" (Cather). Ceremony is more specific than form, and implies certain outward acts, usually of an impressive or dignified character, associated with some religious, public, or state occasion, or, collectively, with a church, a court, or the like; as, the marriage ceremony; the ceremonies attending the coronation of a king. Ceremony also applies to the conventional usages of civility; as, "The appurtenance of welcome is. . . ceremony" (Shak); to stand on ceremony. "The beauty of an inherited courtesy of manners, of a thousand little ceremonies flowering out of the most ordinary relations and observances of life" (Binyon). Ceremonial is occasionally used in place of ceremony in its concrete applications; in very precise use, however, it is a collective noun applied to an entire system of ceremonies prescribed by a court, a church, or the like. "The gorgeous ceremonial of the Burgundian court" (Prescott). The last three terms of this group refer primarily to religious ceremonies, and only secondarily, or in somewhat loose use, to the ceremonies or forms of civil life. Strictly, a rite is the form prescribed by a church or other organization (such as that of Freemasons) for conducting one of its ceremonies or, in the case of a church, for administering one of its sacraments, giving not only the words to be uttered, but the acts to be performed; as, the marriage rite of the Church of England; the rite for the ordination of priests; the rite of initiation; Jewish funeral rites. Strictly, ritual is, in effect, a collective noun applied either to all the rites that make up an elaborate religious service or to all the rites or all the ceremonies of a particular church, religion, or organization; it is, however, applicable to a rite when that represents the one form in use in the specific religion or body; as, the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church is in Latin except in certain Uniat churches; sacrifices, dances, mimetic games, processions, and the like, formed part of the ritual of primitive and polytheistic religions; the ritual of Freemasonry. Consequently, in extended use, rite and ritual both refer to the customary or established order of procedure for conducting not only a ceremony of any sort or a series of ceremonial acts, but formalities or forms of any kind. "On Saturday [he] went conscientiously through all the rites appertaining to a week-end at Highbank" (E. Wharton). "He knew well enough how it would be at the Hondo; the black-shawled women sitting against the wall, the ritual of bereavement, impressive in its poverty" (M. Austin). Liturgy (etymologically, the public worship of God) in historical and still current use applies to the Eucharistic service, especially that of the Orthodox and the Uniat churches (specifically called "Divine Liturgy" in many of these) and of the Roman Catholic Church (specifically called the "Mass" in the Latin Church). In the Anglican Communion, liturgy applies to the Book of Common Prayer, the service book of that church. In looser use, it is applied to any strictly religious rite or ritual, but this is confusing because rite and ritual stress the form to be followed and liturgy the complete service as followed in a given church; thus, the Roman rite is now generally followed in the liturgy of that branch of the Roman Catholic Church called the Latin Church. "He [Henry VIII] insisted on...the maintenance of full ritual in the liturgy" (Belloc).

Ana. Proceeding, procedure, *process: practice, usage, custom, *habit: rule, regulation, precept, *law, canon: *method, mode: *decorum, propriety, etiquette.

3 Form, usage, convention, convenance are here compared in one of their senses. For they are synonyms only when they mean a set or accepted way of doing (sometimes of saying or expressing) something. Form is the most widely applicable of these words. It may be used in reference to a mode of behavior, a method of procedure, or a technique, prescribed or approved as correct; as, to teach form in swimming or dancing. "Mr. Collins made his declaration [of love] in form" (Austen). It is referable to any sphere of activity where correctness or uniformity of method or manner is held essential, as in the arts, in worship, in society, and the like; as, a well-bred person knows the forms of social intercourse. In extended use, form often denotes manner or style as tested by the prescribed or approved form; as, his form in swimming is excellent. "Nothing could be worse 'form'...than any display of temper in a public place" (E. Wharton). Sometimes it implies rigidity or lack of spontaneity; as, given to forms and ceremonies: sometimes it suggests superficiality, insincerity, or emptiness, and is opposed to spirit or essence; as, his apology was a mere form of words. Usage implies the sanction of precedent or tradition rather than authority; it is often used to designate a form preserved because it gives distinction or honor to a class, a profession, or the like; as, to follow the usages of the Church of England. "[He] bowed to social usage, dressed the dress, And decorated to the fit degree His person" (Browning). Convention is often used in place of form, especially in reference to social behavior. The lines of demarcation between these words are not always clear in use, but they can be clearly drawn if attention is centered on the primary implication in convention: namely, agreement, usually tacit agreement. In its most general significance, a convention is any set way of doing or expressing a thing that is accepted generally and without question; as, the plus and minus signs are conventions of arithmetic; the lifting of the hat in greeting to a lady is a modern social convention. Sometimes even principles, rules, or laws are called conventions when the writer wishes to emphasize the point that their sanction lies in their universal acceptance and not in their rational validity. However, in practical affairs, a convention is usually a practice or a device that is universally accepted as an easy, useful, or expedient means to an end. In many cases, conventions may be artificial or absurd, yet pass without question because generally accepted. Thus, the soliloquy was a convention of the drama until its truth to life was questioned; a room with three walls is a convention of the theater. Convenance (still usually regarded as a loan word and given a French pronunciation) is referred only to social conventions, especially to those which are regarded as essential to propriety or decorum; as, to observe the convenances of courtship.

form, v. *Make, shape, fashion, fabricate, manufacture, forge.

Ana. Devise, contrive (see corresponding nouns at DEVICE): *invent, create: produce, turn out (see BEAR): design, project, scheme, plan, plot (see under PLAN, n.): organize, *found, establish.

formal. Conventional, ceremonious, *ceremonial, solemn.

Ana. Systematic, methodical, *orderly, regular: *decorous, proper, comme il faut, seemly.

Ant. Informal.

formality. *Form, ceremony, ceremonial, rite, liturgy, ritual.

Ana. Convention, convenance, usage, *form: practice, custom, *habit, consuetude, use, wont.

former. Prior, previous, *preceding, antecedent, precedent, foregoing, anterior.

Ant. Latter. — Con. Following, succeeding, ensuing, supervening (see FOLLOW).

formidable. Formidable, redoubtable come into comparison as meaning of such a character as to inspire fear or awe. Both words are now often used humorously or ironically. That is formidable which strikes one as exceedingly difficult to meet, attack, resist, overthrow, or the like, and therefore arouses apprehensions of defeat or failure or a sense of helplessness; as, a formidable fortress or battleship; a formidable opponent; a formidable undertaking, requiring experience, skill, and tenacity; "He owed a good deal in the town, but his debts of honour were still more formidable" (Austen); "The naturalist arguments against a spiritualistic interpretation of nature are certainly formidable" (Inge). In lighter use, formidable is applied to persons or things that strike one aghast by their size, elaborateness, power, fixity, or the like; as, a formidable dowager looking at him through her lorgnette; "those formidable editions of the later Renaissance, where a slender rivulet of text is almost lost in the wide expanse of commentary" (Babbitt). That is redoubtable which fills one with fear, dread, awe, deep respect or, by comparison, with a sense of one's own insignificance or powerlessness; as, "Revers'd that spear, redoubtable in war" (Burns); "Master of mine, learned, redoubtable" (Browning). In lighter use, redoubtable usually carries a stronger suggestion of irony than does formidable. "If history belie not this redoubtable Swede, he was a rival worthy of the windy and inflated commander of Fort Casimir...weighing upwards of four hundred pounds, a huge feeder, and bouser in proportion" (Irving).

Ana. *Fearful, awful, terrible, dreadful: threatening, menacing (see THREATEN): indomitable, *invincible, unconquerable: intrepid, dauntless, doughty (see BRAVE).

Ant. Contemptible.

formless. Formless, unformed, shapeless, chaotic, inchoate, amorphous are comparable when they mean having no definite or recognizable form. That is formless which is so fluid or so shifting in its outlines, structure, or character that it does not assume, or is incapable of assuming, a fixed or determinate form; as, "The rising World of waters... Won from the void and formless Infinite" (Milton); "Sprang from the billows of the formless flood" (Shelley); a formless fear. That is unformed which (as here compared) has existence but has not yet attained the form or character proper to it when it has reached the height of its possible growth or development; as, an unformed girl of twelve; an unformed mind; an unformed genius. Oftentimes it suggests crudeness or callousness. "Very clever in some ways—and very unformed—childish almost—in others" (Mrs. H Ward). That is shapeless which lacks the clear-cut outline or contour that is regarded as proper to a thing or essential to its beauty; as, a shapeless old woman; to beat a silver dish into a shapeless mass. "The Iliad is a well-knit epic and the story of Beowulf a shapeless monotrosity" (Quiller-Couch).

The last three words of this group are not strictly synonyms, because their implications are very different; however, they (especially chaotic and inchoate) are sometimes confused, and in current use they roughly correspond respectively to formless, unformed, and shapeless. That is chaotic which is formless because it is unorganized and its constituent elements are not arranged so that each is clearly distinguishable and its relation to each of the others and to the whole clearly apparent. "[The hypothesis] that the present solar system gradually condensed into its present state from a chaotic mass of nebulous material" (Tait & Stewart). "The difference [between classicism and romanticism] seems to me rather the difference between the complete and the fragmentary, the adult and the immature, the orderly and the chaotic" (T. S. Eliot). That is inchoate which is unformed because it as yet exists only in its rudiments and awaits perfection, completeness, or fullness of realization. "This...act [the signature of a commission]...necessarily excludes the idea of its being, so far as respects the appointment, an inchoate and incomplete transaction" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "The undifferentiated, inchoate religious sense is thus intensified and fixed [by emotional or orgiastic worship], to the great and lasting injury of the spiritual life" (Inge). That is amorphous which is shapeless because it has or assumes no clearly or sharply defined outline or structure or because it presents no recognizable design or pattern; as, opals occur in amorphous masses. "The [political] groups were amorphous, without sharp edges" (Galsworthy). "Sentimentality is at its worst in verse, when emotion flows over a theme, vague, and hazy, and amorphous" (Lowe).

Ana. Fluid, *liquid: rough, raw, crude, *rude.

fornication. *Adultery, incest.

forsake. Desert, *abandon.

Ana. Repudiate, spurn, reject (see DECLINE): *abdicate, renounce, resign: quit, leave (see GO).

Ant. Return to: revert to.

forswear. 1 *Abjure, renounce, recant, retract.

Ana. *Abandon, desert, forsake: repudiate, spurn, reject (see DECLINE): *deny, contravene, traverse, gainsay.

2 *Perjure.

fort. Fort, fortress, citadel, acropolis, stronghold, fastness denote in common a structure or place offering resistance to a hostile force. A fort is an enclosed, fortified structure occupied by troops. A fortress is a large fort of strong construction intended for long-term occupancy, as on the border of a hostile country. A citadel (literally, "little city") is a fortification, usually one on an eminence, that protects a city or keeps it in subjection. Acropolis (literally, "upper city") is usually restricted to the elevated citadel of an ancient Greek city, particularly that of Athens. A stronghold is a strongly fortified place whose resistance to attack or siege affords protection to its occupants. "Here...a famous robber had his stronghold" (L. Ritchie). A fastness is a place whose inaccessibility or remoteness makes for security. It may or may not be fortified. "A strong and almost inaccessible fastness" (H. H. Wilson).

Fort, fortress, citadel, stronghold, fastness are often used figuratively. A fort is something that by its very nature resists attack. "Oft breaking down the pales and forts of reason" (Shak.). A fortress is something that gives a feeling of security. "My Rock and Fortress is the Lord" (J. Wesley). Citadel and stronghold are very similar in their figurative uses, both being applied to a place where (or, sometimes, to a class or group in which) something prevails or persists in spite of attacks or encroachment. "The very head quarters, the very citadel of smuggling, the Isle of Man" (Burke). "The scientific world has been the very citadel of stupidity and cruelty" (Shaw). "The South of Somersetshire, one of the strong holds...of the Anglo-Saxon dialect" (J. Jennings). Fastness characteristically suggests impenetrability or inaccessibility. "In the impregnable fastness of his great rich nature he [the Roman] defies us" (J. R. Lowell).

forth. Forward, *onward.

forthright, adj. 1 Also adv. Forthright, downright come into comparison because they agree in their basic sense of moving or in the habit of moving straight to the mark. Forthright (see also STRAIGHTFORWARD) applies to that which gets its effect by a straight thrust in front of one as if of a sword driven by the arm of one person into the breast of another: it therefore usually connotes dexterity, directness, straightforwardness, or a deadly effectiveness; as, "Reach the good man your hand, my girl: forthright from the shoulder, like a brave boxer" (Meredith); "the home thrust of a forthright word" (J. R. Lowell); "The practical, forthright, non-argumentative turn of his mind" (F. W. Farrar). Downright, on the other hand, suggests a falling down or descending with the straightness and swiftness of one who leaps from a cliff or of a weapon that delivers a crushing blow. The word, therefore, usually implies overwhelming force rather than dexterity, and concern for the effect produced rather than the point reached: often, in addition, when applied to persons or things it connotes plainness, bluntness, flatfootedness, or an out-and-out quality; as, "He... Shot to the black abyss, and plung'd downright" (Pope); "sculling against a swift current is work—downright work" (Jefferies); "You seem a pretty... downright sort of a young woman" (Shaw); "A baby. What a coarse, downright word for the little creature" (R. Macaulay).

Ana. *Bluff, blunt, brusque: candid, open, plain, *frank.

2 *Straightforward, aboveboard.

Ana. Honest, *upright, conscientious, just, honorable.

Ant. Furtive. — Con. *Secret, covert, stealthy, surreptitious, underhand: mendacious, *dishonest, untruthful, deceitful.

forthwith. Straightway, at once, *directly, immediately, instantly, instantaneously, anon, right away.

fortitude. Fortitude, grit, backbone, pluck, guts, sand agree in denoting a quality of character combining courage and staying power. Fortitude stresses strength of mind and firmness of purpose; it implies endurance, often prolonged endurance, of physical or mental hardships or suffering without giving way under the strain. "The man's courage is loved by the woman, whose fortitude again is coveted by the man" (Coleridge). "For years he led a life of unrelenting physical toil and mental anxiety combined with miserable health—no small test of fortitude" (Buchan). Grit also implies strength and firmness of mind, but it stresses an incapacity for being downed by difficulties or hardships, and usually also suggests both a willingness to suffer privation and pain necessary to the attainment of one's ends and the fortitude to bear them; as, it is grit that tells in the long run. "Instances of men rising from the lower ranks of society into the most highly remunerated positions in the business world are sufficiently numerous to support the belief that brains and grit can always 'make good'" (J. A. Hobson). Backbone emphasizes resoluteness of character; it implies either the ability to stand up in the face of opposition for one's principles or one's chosen objectives, or determination and independence that require no support from without; as, in spite of all his gifts, he did not have the backbone necessary to a good statesman; when mob hysteria prevails, then if ever, backbone is needed in our legislators; "in Constance's opinion she lacked backbone, or grit, or independence of spirit" (Bennett). Pluck and guts, in the sense in which they are here considered, have a similar primary meaning; both literally denote the viscera, or entrails, of animals, but pluck is used especially of those that are edible, such as the heart, liver, and lungs, and guts of those that form the contents of the abdominal cavity, especially the stomach and the intestines. Pluck, in the derived sense, was first a prize fighter's word implying stoutness of heart and gameness in fighting, especially against odds. "If a fellow knows how to box, they always say he has science but no pluck. If he doesn't know his right hand from his left, they say that he isn't clever but that he is full of game" (Shaw). This implication of a willingness to fight or continue fighting against odds is found when the word is used with precision; thus, it is pluck that keeps a sick person at work; it is pluck that keeps soldiers from retreating in the face of disaster. "The energy, fortitude, and dogged perseverance that we technically style pluck" (Lytton). "Decay of English spirit, decay of manly pluck" (Thackeray). Guts, which is usually considered vulgar although expressive (therefore sometimes humorously replaced by intestinal fortitude), stresses possession of stamina or the physical and mental vigor essential both to facing that which repels or frightens one, and to stomaching, or putting up with, the hardships it imposes; as, he hasn't the guts to be a successful surgeon; they used men with guts for the East African missions. Sand, which is regarded as slang but not as vulgar, comes close to grit in its meaning, but since it often carries a suggestion of pluck or of the ability to fight against odds, it does not so strongly as grit connote triumph over difficulties. "No more pride than a tramp, no more sand than a rabbit" (Twain).

Ana. *Courage, mettle, spirit, resolution, tenacity: bravery, courageousness, intrepidity, dauntlessness, valorousness (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE).

Ant. Pusillanimity. — Con. Cowardliness or cowardice, cravenness, poltroonery (see corresponding adjectives at COWARDLY): timidity, timorousness (see corresponding adjectives at TIMID).

Ana. Putrid, stinking, fetid, noisome, *malodorous: *offensive, revolting, repulsive, loathsome: obscene, gross, vulgar, *coarse.

Ant. Fair: undefiled.

found, v. Found, establish, institute, organize are here compared as meaning to set going or to bring into existence something such as a business, a colony, an institution, or the like. Found implies nothing more than a taking of the first steps or measures to bring into existence something that requires building up. Just what these steps and measures are vary in usage: in very precise use, however, a person who provides the funds for a new educational institution may be said to have *found*ed it, and those who first devised the project and won his support may also be said to have *found*ed it. On the other hand, those who took the next steps, such as the choice of a site, the erection of buildings on that site, and the selection of the staff of administration and teaching, are also often listed among those who have *found*ed it, though such use occasionally meets objection: however, found invariably implies the very earliest acts leading to the existence of something; as, to found a parish in a new section of a city; the Pilgrims in 1620 *found*ed Plymouth Colony in what is now the State of Massachusetts; a school of philosophy *found*ed by Plato. Establish (as here considered: see also SET) is often employed in the sense of found: in strict use, however, it implies not only the laying of the foundations but also a bringing into enduring existence; thus, Brook Farm was *found*ed (not *establish*ed, because its existence was short) by George Ripley and others as an experiment in communistic living; Vassar College was not *establish*ed until some years after the date of its *found*ing. "The... Sisters of Loretto, who came to found the Academy of

Our Lady of Light. The school was now well established" (Cather). Institute stresses an origination or an introduction: like found, it implies the taking of the first steps and like establish, the actual bringing into existence, but it differs from both words in its far wider range of application and in being referable to things which do not have a continuous life or a permanent existence, such as a new game or a course of lectures; as, to institute a new society; to institute a new method of accountancy; to institute an inquiry into an official's conduct of his office. Organize (as here compared: see also ORDER, v., 1) may or may not imply founding but it usually implies the taking of the steps whereby a business, an institution, a government, or the like, is set up so that it functions properly, with its departments clearly distinguished and governed by a responsible head, and with a supervisory staff responsible for the working of the whole as a unit; as, Smith College was founded by Sophia Smith but was organized by its first president and board of trustees; the company sent him to Shanghai to organize its new branch there.

Ana. *Begin, commence, start, initiate, inaugurate: form, fashion (see MAKE).

Con. Uproot, eradicate, deracinate, extirpate, *exterminate, wipe out.

foundation. Basis, *base, ground, groundwork.

Ant. Superstructure.

foxy. Willy, tricky, crafty, cunning, *sly, artful.

Ana. Devious, *crooked, oblique: deceitful, *dishonest.

Con. *Straightforward, aboveboard, forthright: candid, open, plain, *frank.

foyer. *Entry, entryway, vestibule, lobby, hall, narthex, anteroom, antechamber.

fracas. *Brawl, broil, melee, row, rumpus, scrap.

Ana. Fray, affray, fight, conflict, combat, *contest: altercation, wrangle, *quarrel, squabble: contention, dissension, strife, *discord.

fraction. Fragment, piece, *part, portion, section, segment, sector, detail, member, division, parcel.

fractionous. *Irritable, peevish, snappish, waspish, petulant, pettish, huffy, fretful, querulous

Ana. *Unruly, refractory, recalcitrant, ungovernable, intractable, willful: perverse, *contrary, froward, restive, wayward.

Con. Compliant, *amiable, good-natured: docile, tractable, *obedient, amenable, biddable.

fracture, n. Fracture, rupture, although they agree in meaning the act or an instance of breaking apart, are used in surgery and the physiological sciences as sharply differentiated terms. Fracture always implies the breaking of a hard or rigid substance, sometimes cartilage, but commonly bone; as, a fracture of the skull or of the shoulder blade. Rupture usually implies the breaking of some softer tissue, such as the wall of a blood vessel. In medicine, however, rupture often is used specifically to denote hernia, or the protrusion of an organ or of a part through some opening in the wall of the cavity in which that organ or part is normally placed; as, an abdominal rupture.

fragile. 1 Fragile, frangible, brittle, crisp, short, friable agree in meaning inclined to break easily. They are, however, not often interchangeable. Fragile (see also WEAK) is applicable to anything which must be handled or treated carefully lest it be broken; as, a fragile chair; a fragile dish; a fragile flower. "I found the skeleton, or, at all events, the larger bones, rendered so fragile by the fierce heat they had been subjected to, that they fell to pieces when handled" (Hudson). Frangible stresses susceptibility to being broken rather than positive weakness or delicacy of material or construction; as, frangible stone; to avoid using frangible materials in ship construction. Brittle implies hardness plus frangibility because of the inflexibility of, or lack of elasticity in, the substance of which a thing is made; it also suggests susceptibility to quick snapping or fracture when subjected to pressure or strain; as, glass is especially brittle; as a person ages, his bones grow more brittle; brittle sticks of candy. The term is much used figuratively of things that are dangerously inelastic or taut. "He would take no risks with a thing so brittle as the Roman polity, on which depended the fate of forty-four millions of men" (Buchan). Crisp usually suggests a good quality, which makes a thing firm and brittle yet delicate and easily broken or crushed, especially between the teeth; as, crisp toast; crisp lettuce. In extended use, it implies freshness, briskness, cleanness of cut, incisiveness, or other qualities that suggest the opposite of limpness, languor, slackness, or the like; as, a crisp morning; a crisp style; a crisp answer. Short implies a tendency to crumble or break readily, and is applicable to different things; thus, a short biscuit (or shortcake) is rich in butter or other fat and is crisp and crumbly when eaten; short mortar is difficult to spread because of oversanding; short timber is desiccated wood; short (or hot-short) steel is brittle when heated beyond a certain point because of an excess of sulphur. Friable is applicable to substances that are easily crumbled or pulverized; as, friable soil; friable sandstone; a friable blackboard crayon.

Ant. Tough. — Con. *Elastic, resilient, flexible: *strong, stout, sturdy, tenacious.

2 Frail, *weak, feeble, decrepit, infirm.

Ana. Impotent, *powerless: delicate, dainty (see CHOICE): evanescent, ephemeral, *transient, transitory.

Ant. Durable.

fragment. Fraction, piece, *part, portion, section, segment, sector, division, detail, member, parcel.

Ana. Remnant, *remainder, relic.

fragrance. Fragrance, perfume, scent, incense, redolence, bouquet are here compared as denoting a sweet or pleasant odor. Fragrance usually suggests the odor diffused by flowers or other growing things, though it is applicable to odors that merely suggest the presence of flowers; as, "fragrance after showers" (Milton); "Flowers laugh before thee on their beds And fragrance in thy footing treads" (Wordsworth); "through the open doors . . . the soft wind . . . brought in the garden fragrance" (Stark Young); "A fragrance such as never clings To aught save happy living things" (Milay). Perfume originally applied either to the pleasantly odorous smoke emitted by burning things such as some spices, gums, leaves, or the like (as, "Three April perfumes in three hot Junes burn'd Since first I saw you"—Shak.), or to some natural or prepared substance which emits a pleasant odor (as, "Take unto thee sweet spices . . . with pure frankincense . . . And thou shalt make it a perfume . . . after the art of the apothecary"—Exodus xxx. 34-35). Only the latter sense prevails in current use, though the substance called a perfume is now usually a preparation in liquid form, also called a scent (for full treatment of this term see SMELL) that contains the essence of a fragrant flower or flowers or is a synthetic concoction; as, "Rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes" (Milton); a perfume redolent of the odor of violets. When applied to an odor rather than to a preparation, perfume differs little from fragrance except that it usually, when unqualified, suggests a heavier and more redolent odor, or at least a less delicate one, than the latter word; as, "The perfume of lilies had overcome the scent of books" (Galsworthy); "a gigantic rose-tree which clambered over the house . . . filling the air with the perfume of its sweetness" (L. P. Smith). Incense is now used in place of perfume for the agreeably odorous smoke emitted by burning spices, gums, and the like, but since this smoke is closely associated with its ceremonial religious use (as, the church was filled with the odor of incense), the term, in the more general sense in which it is here chiefly considered, applies to odors or things comparable to odors that are not only pleasant but grateful to the senses or that for some cause uplift or are mentally or spiritually exalting; as, "The breezy call of incense-breathing Morn" (Gray); "Grateful the incense from the lime-tree flower" (Keats); "Love wraps his wings on either side the heart... Absorbing all the incense of sweet thoughts So that they pass not to the shrine of sound" (Tennyson); "This [prayer] is that incense of the heart, Whose fragrance smells to heaven" (N. Cotton). Redolence now usually implies a different mixture of fragrant, often pungently agreeable, odors; as, the redolence of a forest; the redolence of a garden in spring. Bouquet, as here compared, applies to the distinctive fragrance of a good wine, which is perceptible when one inhales the delicate and agreeable odor; as, "Lifting his glass to his lips, [he] voluptuously inhaled its bouquet" (Lytton).

Ana. *Smell, scent, odor, aroma.

Ant. Stench, stink.

fragrant. *Odorous, aromatic, redolent, balmy.

Ana. Ambrosial, nectared (see under AMBROSIA): delicious, delectable, *delightful.

Ant. Fetid. — Con. *Malodorous, stinking, noisome, putrid, rank.

frail. Fragile, *weak, feeble, infirm, decrepit.

Ana. Slight, slender, tenuous, *thin, slim: puny, *petty; flimsy, sleazy (see LIMP): *powerless, impotent.

Ant. Robust. — Con. *Strong, stout, sturdy, stalwart, tough, tenacious: *healthy, sound, hale: *vigorous, lusty.

frailty. *Fault, failing, foible, vice.

Ana. Defect, flaw, *blemish: infirmity, fragility, feebleness, weakness (see corresponding adjectives at WEAK).

framer. *Carpenter, joiner, cabinetmaker.

frame-up. Cabal, intrigue, *plot, machination, conspiracy.

framework. *Structure, skeleton, anatomy.

franchise. *Suffrage, vote, ballot.

frangible. *Fragile, brittle, crisp, short, friable.

frank, adj. Frank, candid, open, plain come into comparison when they mean showing in speech, looks, and manners the willingness to tell what one feels or thinks. Frank (etymologically, free) stresses lack of reserve or of reticence in the expression of one's thoughts or feelings; it therefore usually connotes complete freedom from restraints such as fear, shyness, inarticulateness, secretiveness, and the like. "This, to Anne, was a decided imperfection... She prized the frank, the open-hearted, the eager character beyond all others" (Austen). "Things were as she had suspected: she had been frank in her questions and Polly had been frank in her answers" (Joyce). "The child who has been treated wisely and kindly has a frank look in the eyes, and a fearless demeanour even with strangers" (B. Russell). Candid (etymologically, white and glistening) is often used interchangeably with frank. Among highly discriminating writers and speakers this does not occur, for candid implies a fundamental honesty and fairness that make evasion impossible; consequently, in precise use, it suggests a refusal to dodge an issue or to be governed by bias or fear. "I have tried to be as candid as possible, to follow out every thought as far as I could without caring where it would lead and without tempering any conclusions out of consideration to either my own sensibilities or those of any one else" (J. W. Krutch). "That letter had the cardinal defects of all Cyril's relations with his mother; it was casual, and it was not candid. It gave no hint of the nature of the obstacle which had prevented him from coming" (Bennett). Open implies both frankness and candor but it often suggests more naturalness or artlessness than frank, and less conscientiousness than candid. "Mr. Elliot was rational, discreet, polished, but he was not open. There was never any burst of feeling, any warmth of indignation or delight, at the evil or good of others" (Austen). "For the white man to put himself mentally on their level is not more impossible than for these aborigines to be perfectly open, as children are, towards the white" (Hudson). Plain comes closer to candid than to frank, but it suggests outspokenness, downrightness, and freedom from affectation more than fairness of mind. "I am no orator, as Brutus is; But, as you know me all, a plain blunt man" (Shak.). "Plain truth, dear Murray, needs no flow'rs of speech" (Pope). "A plain confession, such as leaves no doubt" (Wordsworth).

Ana. Ingenuous, naïve, unsophisticated, simple, *natural: *forthright, downright: *straightforward, above-board.

Ant. Reticent. — Con. *Silent, taciturn, reserved, uncommunicative: furtive, *secret, covert, underhand.

fraud, n. 1 *Deception, trickery, chicanery, chicane, double-dealing, subterfuge.

Ana. Duplicity, *deceit, guile, dissimulation: defrauding, swindling, cheating, cozening, overreaching (see CHEAT, v.).

2 *Imposture, cheat, sham, fake, humbug, deceit, deception, counterfeit, simulacrum.

Ana. Hoaxing or hoax, bamboozling or bamboozlement, hoodwinking, duping or dupery (see corresponding verbs at DUPE): *trick, ruse, stratagem, maneuver, wile, artifice.

fray, n. Affray, fight, conflict, combat, *contest.

Ana. Fracas, broil, *brawl, melee: altercation, wrangle, *quarrel: contention, strife, dissension, *discord.

freak, n. *Caprice, whim, whimsey, vagary, crotchet.

Ana. Notion, *idea: *fancy, fantasy, dream, daydream.

free, v. Free, release, liberate, emancipate, manumit, deliver, discharge, enfranchise, affranchise are here compared as meaning to set loose from that which ties or binds or to make clear of that which encumbers or holds back. Free is the ordinary general term interchangeable with many of the succeeding terms: it may be used not only in reference to persons that are in bondage, or in a state of dependence or oppression, or under restraint or constraint (as, to free one's slaves; to free an oppressed people; to free a person from prison or from a charge; to free one from the necessity of speaking against a proposal), but also in reference to things that are confined, entangled, encumbered, or the like, and are therefore unfastened, unloosed, disentangled, disengaged, or the like (as, to free a squirrel from a trap; to free one's hair from a net; "flower-scents, that only nighttime frees"—Amy Lowell). Release carries a much stronger implication of loosing or of setting a person or thing loose from something or someone that holds him or it confined, restrained, under obligation, or the like; as, to release a prisoner; to release a person from a promise; "Release me from my bands With the help of your good hands" (Shak.); activities that release one's stored-up energy; death has released him from his sufferings. Liberate, a very close synonym of the preceding words, differs from them chiefly in carrying a stronger suggestion of resulting liberty. The term may therefore connote, as do the others, emergence from some more or less disagreeable bondage or restraint (as, to liberate all slaves by a proclamation) or it may merely suggest a cutting of any tie, relationship, or connection without regard to the power of another thing or things to restrain or restrict, thereby approaching separate, disengage, or detach in meaning (as, oxygen is liberated when potassium chlorate is heated; an electric current will decompose water, liberating hydrogen). "The poet draws life . . . from the community . . . to cut himself off from this source of life is much more likely to cripple than to liberate him" (Day Lewis). Emancipate, originally a legal term meaning to free one person from subjection to another, as a child from subjection to his parent, or a slave from subjection to his master (thereby conferring on him the status of freeman), is still often used historically in this sense. "Little more hope than had the son of an Athenian slave to be emancipated" (Quiller-Couch). In current use, the term is more frequently found in an extended sense, implying a liberation of someone or something from that which controls or dominates: it usually but not invariably also suggests a freedom by which one's own judgment, or conscience, or intelligence decrees the course to be taken, the principles to be followed, or the like. "If we can imagine the various County Councils of England emancipated from the control of Parliament and set free to make their own laws" (G. L. Dickinson). "All the philanthropic and humanitarian movements to which the Quakers, now emancipated from the notion that all initiative in such matters is an attempt to force the hand of the Almighty, devoted themselves in the nineteenth century" (Inge). Manumit differs from emancipate in its historical sense in always implying liberation from slavery or servitude: it is therefore sometimes preferred as the more definite term. "Darnall . . . was the son of a white man by one of his slaves, and his father executed certain instruments to manumit him" (Ch. Just. Taney). "The Church was the great manumiller and improver of the condition of the serf" (J. B. Mouley). Deliver (etymologically, to liberate) is now comparatively rare as a close synonym of free. But in all of its many extended senses the idea of freeing is the basic, though not the strongest, implication. It is specifically a synonym of rescue (see RESCUE) when it implies release from peril, danger, or other evil: it comes close to transfer or convey when it implies a disburdening of oneself of something which belongs to another or is intended for him (as, to deliver a letter to the addressee; to deliver a package to the purchaser), or to utter or pronounce when it implies a relieving oneself of something one must say or is charged by oneself or another with saying (as, to deliver oneself of one's opinions; to deliver a message over the telephone; to deliver a speech). In idiomatic English, the term implies the disburdening of a woman of offspring at the time of its birth, usually by the aid of a physician or midwife (as, the queen was safely delivered of a son and heir), or the freeing of all prisoners confined in a prison (as, to deliver a jail). Discharge, as here compared (see also DISMISS, 1; PERFORM), implies the release of someone or something that is held in confinement or under restraint or within the bounds of a thing: it may suggest liberation (as, to discharge a prisoner) but often it implies an ejection (as, to discharge a shot; to discharge an arrow), an emission (as, to discharge passengers from a train; to discharge a cargo; to discharge a patient from a hospital), or a pouring forth through an outlet, vent, or the like (as, the smoke is discharged through a very large chimney; the stream discharges its waters into the Hudson River), or a payment or settlement as of an obligation

(as, to discharge one's debts). Often discharge differs from release in carrying a stronger connotation of force or violence. "Many creative writers have a critical activity which is not all discharged into their work" (T. S. Eliot). "All his accumulated nervous agitation was discharged on Maud like a thunderbolt" (Bennett). Enfranchise once stressed the idea of freeing from servitude, as from a vow, an obligation, or the like: the term is still used in the sense of to free from subjection (as, "The nobles desired . . . to enfranchise themselves . . . from the power of the King"—Belloc) but in its commonest current sense it implies the removal of political disabilities and admission to full political rights, especially as a freeman or as a citizen; as, the slaves were emancipated by the proclamation of President Lincoln on January 1, 1863, but were not enfranchised until the Fifteenth Amendment went into effect in 1870. Affranchise, which is much less common than enfranchise, usually implies freeing from servitude, subjection, confinement, or any condition that deprives one of personal or political liberty; as, "Every slave, after fifteen years, should be affranchised" (Landor).

Con. *Hamper, fetter, manacle, shackle, trammel, hog-tie: *imprison, incarcerate, jail, immure, intern: confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit: *restrain, curb, inhibit.

free, adj. Free, independent, sovereign, autonomous, autonomic, autarchic (or autarchical), autarkic (or autarkical) come into comparison in the sense of not subject to the rule or control of another. The same differences in implications and connotations are found in their corresponding nouns freedom, independence, sovereignty, autonomy, autarchy, autarky, when they denote the state or condition of not being subject to external rule or control. Free and freedom (as here compared: see also FREEDOM, 2) stress the absence of external compulsion or determination and not the absence of restraint. For free as applied to a state, a people, a person, the will, and the like, implies self-government, and therefore the right to determine one's own acts, one's own laws and one's own restraints, or to accept or reject those that are proposed from without. "The motive power to realize it [the dream of the habitable earth peaceful under a universal empire] must come from the West, where men could still be both disciplined and free" (Buchan). "Freedom makes man to choose what he likes; that is, makes him free" (Quiller-Couch). "After all, the boy had a right to choose. Mr. Arvold [the boy's father] believed in perfect freedom for the individual, didn't he?" (M. Austin). Independent and independence have for their fundamental implication lack of relatedness to anyone or anything else. When used strictly, independent implies that the person or thing so described stands alone. "Words have a meaning independent of the pattern in which they are arranged" (A. Huxley). When applied to a state or government, it implies not complete detachment from other states or governments and a refusal to have allies or dominions, but a lack of connection with any state or government that has the power to interfere with one's liberty of action; thus, the Thirteen Colonies sacrificed their independence, but not their freedom, when they joined the federation that became the United States of America. When applied to a person, his acts, opinions, and the like, it implies either a disposition to stand alone and apart from others, or refusal to accept other's judgments, or self-reliance amounting almost to a fault; thus, a person who is independent in politics is attached to no political party; one might wish that a person one is trying vainly to help were less independent. "An economist should form an independent judgment on currency questions, but an ordinary mortal had better follow authority" (B. Russell). Sovereign (see also DOMINANT) and sovereignty stress the absence of a superior power and imply the supremacy within its own domain or sphere of that which is so described or so designated. As applied to a state or government, these words usually involve the ideas both of political independence and of the possession of original and undervived power; thus, for many years before the Civil War, it was debated whether the federal government was sovereign. "The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the States, who alone are truly sovereign.... It would be difficult to sustain this proposition" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Although it [the government of the United States] is sovereign and supreme in its appropriate sphere of action, yet it does not possess all the powers which usually belong to the sovereignty of a nation" (Ch. Just. Taney). When used in reference to a thing, both words impute to that thing unquestioned supremacy and imply that whereas it acknowledges no master, everything within its sphere of influence is subject to it; as, "noble and most sovereign reason" (Shak.). "The sovereignty of man lieth hid in knowledge; wherein many things are reserved that kings with their treasure cannot buy, nor with their force command" (Bacon). Autonomous and autonomy, in very precise use, imply independence combined with freedom. The terms are much used in philosophy to describe or designate a theoretical or ideal freedom in which the individual is absolutely self-governing and acknowledges no claim of another to interference or control; as, the question is often asked whether an autonomous state and an autonomous church can exist side by side. "If this pre-eminence and autonomy of the spiritual be not granted, it is misleading to use the word God at all" (Inge). In political use, the words seldom imply this absolute independence and freedom, for they are employed largely in reference to states which belong to an empire, a federation, or a commonwealth of nations (as used in the designation British Commonwealth of Nations). In reference to such states, autonomy and autonomous commonly imply independence of the central power only in matters pertaining to self-government; they also usually imply recognition of the central governmental sovereignty in certain matters affecting the empire, federation, or commonwealth of nations as a whole, such as its foreign policy. When a state is granted autonomy or becomes autonomous, the terms of such a grant are usually precisely stated. "The Imperial Conference of 1926 defined the Dominions as 'autonomous Communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or foreign affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations'" (Statesman's Year-Book, 1939). Autonomic, once a close but not frequently employed synonym of autonomous, is now chiefly a technical term, used in the biological sciences, to describe movements which originate in the organism and not as a result of external influence, or to designate the nerves or the nervous system (the autonomic nervous system as distinguished from the central nervous system) controlling such spontaneous or involuntary movements. Autarchic and autarchy [Gr. autarkhia, autocracy] originally implied absolute sovereignty or absolute or autocratic rule. They have, however, been confused with autarkic and autarky [Gr. autarkeia, self-sufficiency] and both pairs of words now have acquired the implication of national economic self-sufficiency. Consequently, all four words are used in reference to states or governments that favor isolation through a policy of economic self-sufficiency, as a means of maintaining their independence; as, to convert Germany into an autarky; the autarkic (or autarchic) policies characteristic of dictators.

Ana. Liberated, emancipated, delivered, freed, released, enfranchised (see FREE, v.).

Ant. Bond. — Con. Compelled, coerced, forced, constrained, obliged (see FORCE, v.).

freedom. 1 Independence, autonomy, sovereignty, autarky. See under FREE, adj.

Ana. Liberation, emancipation, release, delivery, enfranchisement, manumission (see corresponding verbs at FREE): liberty, license (see FREEDOM).

Ant. Bondage. — Con. *Servitude, slavery.

2 Freedom, liberty, license (or licence) are here compared as meaning the state or condition of one who can think, believe, or act as he wishes. Freedom, as here compared (see also under FREE, adj.), is the term of widest application; in philosophy, for example, it often implies a state or condition in which there is not only total absence of restraint but release even from the compulsion of necessity; at the other extreme, in ordinary unthinking use, freedom merely implies the absence of any awareness of being restrained, repressed, or hampered in any way: between these two extremes the term may imply the absence of any definite restraint or of compulsion from any particular power or agency; as, "me this unchartered freedom tires" (Wordsworth); the freedom of the press; "he was not affected by her reserve, and talked to her with the same freedom as to anybody else" (Arch. Marshall). "Who would not say, with Huxley, 'let me be wound up every day like a watch, to go right fatally, and I ask no better freedom'" (W. James). Liberty is often used interchangeably with freedom, but in precise speech or writing it often carries one of two implications which are not so marked in the use of freedom. The first of these implications is the power to choose what one wishes to do, say, believe, or the like, as distinguished from the state of being uninhibited in doing, thinking, etc.; as, to have the liberty (better than freedom) to come and go as one pleases; "in totalitarian states there is no liberty of expression for writers and no liberty of choice for their readers" (A. Huxley); "freedom in thought, the liberty to try and err, the right to be his own man" (Mencken). The second of these implications is deliverance or release from restraint or compulsion; as, to set a slave at liberty (not freedom); the prisoners were willing to fight for their liberty; "From bondage freed. At liberty to serve as you loved best" (M. Baring). License often implies the liberty to disobey the rules or regulations imposed on the many, but not necessarily governing all, when a great advantage is to be gained by disobedience; as, poetic license; "sometimes, with truly medieval license, singing to the sacred music... songs from the street" (Palmer); a general must be allowed considerable license in the field. More often, however, the term implies an abuse of liberty in the sense of the power to do exactly what one pleases; as, "License they mean when they cry Liberty" (Milton); "[The grammarian's] rules are useful... Without them freedom might become licence" (H. Ellis); many persons think that freedom of the press and liberty of free speech often degenerate into license.

Ana. *Exemption, immunity: scope, *range, compass, sweep.

Ant. Necessity. — Con. Compulsion, constraint, coercion (see corresponding verbs at FORCE).

freethinker. Unbeliever, *atheist, agnostic, deist, infidel.

Ana. *Skeptic, agnostic.

freezing, adj. *Cold, frigid, frosty, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic, chilly, cool.

freight, n. Cargo, *load, burden, lading.

frenzy or phrenzy. 1 Delirium, *mania, hysteria.

2 Fury, furor, enthusiasm, *inspiration, afflatus.

Ana. *Ecstasy, rapture, transport.

frequent, v. Frequent, haunt, habituate come into comparison in the sense of to visit or resort to often and habitually. Frequent implies little more than this: it is chiefly used of places, especially places of amusement (as, to frequent the cinemas; to frequent the lobby of a hotel) but it still is preserved in some idiomatic phrases such as to frequent the Sacraments [that is, to go to confession and to Holy Communion frequently]. "Myself when young did eagerly frequent Doctor and Saint, and heard great argument" (FitzGerald). Haunt may imply a continual or pertinacious frequenting (as, "a poor Cavalier knight who haunted Whitehall"—Macaulay; "haunting [shipmasters] with demands for a job"—Conrad), but it has so long been associated with the actions of ghosts or specters alleged to frequent places (as, a haunted house) that the term now suggests the frequent or persistent coming of thoughts, ideas, fears, or the like, that terrify and upset or obsess the mind; as, "Wordsworth... seems ever haunted by the sorrows of mankind" (Binyon); "the continual dread of falling into poverty which haunts us all at present" (Shaw). Habituate (see also HABITUATE, 1) is a colloquial Americanism in this sense. It differs little from frequent except in its stronger implication of a formed habit; as, boys that habituate poolrooms are usually a problem.

Ana. *Resort (to), go (to), turn (to): *infect, overrun.

Con. Shun, avoid, escape (see ESCAPE).

frequently. *Often, oft, oftentimes.

Ant. Rarely, seldom.

fresh. Novel, *new, new-fashioned, newfangled, modern, modernistic, original, neoteric.

Ana. Gleaming, glistening, sparkling (see FLASH, v): virginal, *youthful: raw, green, crude (see RUDE): naive, unsophisticated, artless, *natural.

Ant. Stale — Con. *Trite, hackneyed, shopworn, stereotyped, threadbare.

fret. Chafe, gall, *abrade, excoriate.

Ana. *Irritate, exasperate, nettle, aggravate: *annoy, vex, irk.

fretful. Peevish, *irritable, petulant, querulous, fractious, snappish, waspish, pettish, huffy.

Ana. Cross, cranky, touchy, techy, choleric, *irascible: captious, carping, caviling, faultfinding, *critical: *contrary, perverse.

Con. Patient, long-suffering, forbearing, resigned (see corresponding nouns at PATIENCE): *tame, submissive, subdued.

friable. Short, frangible, crisp, brittle, *fragile.

Ana. Crumbling or crumbly, disintegrating (see corresponding verbs at DECAY).

friar. *Religious, monk, nun.

friend. Friend, acquaintance, intimate, confidant come into comparison when they designate a person, especially a person not related by blood, with whom one is on good and, usually, familiar terms. Friend, in its application, ranges from any person who is not hostile or is a well-wisher to any person whose society one seeks or accepts with pleasure because of liking, respect, or affection. Acquaintance, in its most inclusive sense, is applied to any person with whom one is on speaking terms. However, when these words are used in contrast, both imply a degree of familiarity; friend distinctively connoting close bonds of love and affection and acquaintance, comparative infrequency of contact and less close personal interest. "You understand that I am not their friend. I am only a holiday acquaintance" (Conrad). This distinction is commonly but not invariably observed, especially when acquaintance is used as a collective plural; as, he has a wide circle of friends; he has a large acquaintance. "He never speaks much, unless among his intimate acquaintance" (Austen). Intimate adds to friend the implications of a depth of affection and a closeness of association that tend to preclude reserve; as, only his intimates were aware of his plans. Confidant usually designates that intimate who actually is entrusted with one's secrets or is admitted to confidential intercourse.

Ana. Comrade, companion, crony, chum, pal, *associate: ally, colleague, *partner.

Ant. Foe. — Con. *Enemy: antagonist, *opponent, adversary: rival, competitor (see corresponding verbs at RIVAL).

friendly. *Amicable, neighborly.

Ana. *Familiar, intimate, close: *loving, affectionate, devoted: loyal, leal, true, steadfast, *faithful.

Ant. Unfriendly: belligerent. — Con. Hostile, antagonistic, antipathetic (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY).

friendship. Friendship, amity, comity, good will are comparable when they denote the relation (or, in the first three instances, the alliance) existing between persons, communities, states, or the like, that are in accord and in sympathy with each other. Friendship is the strongest of these terms in its implications of sentiment in the relation and of closeness of attachment. "The friendship between me and you [the Indians with whom he has concluded a treaty] I will not compare to a chain; for that the rains might rust, or the falling tree might break" (Penn). Sometimes, as in the illustration just given, it suggests an alliance; at other times it excludes that suggestion. "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none" (Jefferson). Amity always implies the absence of enmity or discord. Positively, it may imply nothing more than amicable relations (as, the colonists and the Indians seldom lived together in amity), or it may suggest reciprocal friendliness. "On his arrival he [the new bishop] found amity [between the French priest and the Mexicans] instead of enmity awaiting him. Father Vaillant had already endeared himself to the people" (Cather). In current use, the suggestion of a friendly alliance is rare, but it was not uncommon in the past. "The amity that wisdom knits not, folly may easily untie" (Shak.). "The less we have to do with the amities or enmities of Europe, the better" (Jefferson). Comity, in modern use (see also COURTESY), owing to an etymological confusion between comitas, friendliness, and comes (pl. comites), companion, has come to imply comradeship based either upon an interchange of courtesies or upon a similarity of interests and aims. So strong has this implication become in recent years that the word now often denotes a group bound together by friendship or by common interests. It never implies loss of independence by any member of the group or the transference of sovereignty to the group. "Turkey should... be saved... and rendered a useful member of the civilised comity" (Daily Telegraph, 1880). "The more... the merrier, to win their way into the great comity [of poets influenced by the troubadours]" (Quiller-Couch). "Outside the comity of the [Roman] empire, beyond the border provinces and client-kingdoms, lay the unknown lands and the strange peoples" (Buchan). Good will, as here narrowly considered, derives its chief implication of a benevolent attitude or of reciprocal good feeling largely from the Authorized Version's translation of the Angelic Hymn, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" (Luke ii. 14). The term is now often used in international diplomacy to designate a reciprocal friendliness which constitutes an informal bond between nations and works to the advantage of all concerned. "Good Will is the mightiest practical force in the universe" (C. F. Dole). "To promote the exchange of intellectual ideas and good-will between Belgium and America" (School and Society).

Ana. Sympathy, affinity, *attraction: sympathy, empathy (see PITY): accord, concord, consonance, *harmony: *alliance, league, coalition, fusion, federation. Ant. Animosity. — Con. *Enmity, hostility, antagonism, antipathy, rancor: *hate, hatred.

fright, n. Alarm, consternation, panic, *fear, dread, dismay, terror, horror, trepidation.

Ana. Scaring or scare, startling, affrighting, frightening (see corresponding verbs at FRIGHTEN): appalling, horrifying, daunting (see DISMAY, v.).

fright, v. *Frighten, scare, alarm, terrify, terrorize, startle, affray, affright.

Ana. See those at FRIGHTEN.

frighten. Frighten, fright, scare, alarm, terrify, terrorize, startle, affray, affright mean to strike or to fill with fear or dread. Frighten is perhaps the most frequent in use; it is the most inclusive, for it may imply a momentary reaction to a stimulus or a state of mind in which fear or dread prevails. In careful use, however, it commonly implies paralyzing fear, affecting either the body or the will. "The silence of the house... frightened Clara" (S. Anderson). "In a world too frightened to be honest" (T. S. Eliot). Fright is the older form of frighten; it now rarely occurs in speech or nonliterary writing, except in Scotland. "They fled like frightened doves [doves]" (Burns). In colloquial use scare is often equivalent to frighten; in the work of discriminating writers, it usually implies fear that causes one to run, shy, or tremble. "Sour visages, enough to scare ye" (Gray). "A noise did scare me from the tomb" (Shak.). "Earth shakes beneath them, and heaven roars above; But nothing scares them from the course they love" (Cowper). Alarm, in modern use, nearly always stresses apprehension or anxiety; as, they are alarmed for his safety. "The girl was... alarmed by the altogether unknown expression in the woman's face" (Conrad). In older use, however, it retained its etymological implication of a sharply sudden awakening or a call to be on the alert. "Great crimes alarm the conscience, but it sleeps While thoughtful man is plausibly amused" (Cowper). Terrify emphasizes intensity of fear and agitation; it usually suggests a state of mind in which self-control or self-direction is impossible; as, they were terrified out of their wits; the dread of failure terrified them. Terrorize, in distinction from terrify, implies the effect of an intention, and therefore is used in reference to voluntary agents; thus, one may say that gangs terrorized (more explicit than terrified) the neighborhood by their constant depredations, and that the depredations of the gangs terrified (but not terrorized) the neighborhood. Terrorize often implies coercion or intimidation; as, to terrorize a people into submission. Startle always implies surprise and a sudden shock that causes one to jump or shrink; occasionally its suggestion of fright is very weak. "One learns in parish work not to start, however much one may be startled" (R. Macaulay). "Investigations of scientists... sprung on a Public shocked and startled by the revelation that facts which they were accustomed to revere were conspicuously at fault" (Galsworthy). Affray and affright are now archaic and poetic, the former, as a rule, coming close to terrify, and the latter, to frighten.

Ana. Appall, horrify, *dismay, daunt: *intimidate, cow, browbeat, bulldoze: agitate, perturb, upset, disquiet, *discompose.

frightful. Dreadful, *fearful, awful, terrible, terrific, horrible, horrific, shocking, appalling.

Ana. *Ghastly, grisly, gruesome, macabre, grim, lurid: *sinister, baleful, malign.

frigid. Freezing, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic, *cold, cool, chilly, frosty.

Ant. Torrid (temperature): amorous (persons).

frivolity. Levity, flippancy, light-mindedness, volatility, flightiness, *lightness.

Ana. Trifling, flirting, dallying, coquetting, toying (see TRIFLE, v.): play, sport, *fun, jest, game: gaiety, liveliness, vivaciousness, sprightliness (see corresponding adjectives at LIVELY).

Ant. Seriousness, staidness. — Con. Sedateness, gravity, solemnity, soberness, earnestness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

frollic, n. Play, sport, disport, rollick, romp, gambol. See under PLAY, v.

Ana. *Fun, jest, game, play, sport: caper, *prank, antic, monkeyshine, dido: levity, *lightness, frivolity.

frollic, v. *Play, sport, disport, rollick, romp, gambol.

frolcsome. *Playful, sportive, roguish, waggish, impish, mischievous, wanton.

Ana. *Merry, blithe, jocund, jovial, jolly: mirthful, gleeful, hilarious (see corresponding nouns at MIRTH): *lively, vivacious, sprightly, gay.

front, n. Port, presence, *bearing, demeanor, deportment, mien, manner, carriage.

frontage. Frontage, exposure, aspect come into comparison when they mean situation with respect to that which is faced. Frontage is capable of being used in reference to anything whose location may be described in terms of that which it faces or fronts; as, a lot with a river frontage; a slope with a southern frontage; a store with a 100-foot frontage on Main Street. Exposure is used in reference to anything that is made more or less desirable or is helped or hindered by the point or points of the compass it faces, and the conditions of light or wind to which it is exposed; as, the artist sought a studio with northern exposure because of the steadiness of the light; city dwellers often prefer apartments with a southern exposure; the house's eastern exposure was weather-beaten. Aspect is used commonly in reference to something from which one can get a view or outlook, as a window or a room with windows, a veranda or piazza; like exposure, it is used in relation to a point or points of the compass, but it suggests the direction in which one looks rather than the quarter from which light or air comes. "What aspect do you like for your bedroom?—East?" said the Baronet" (Meredith).

frontier. March, border, *boundary.

Ana. *Limit, bound, bourn, confine, end.

frosty. Chilly, *cold, cool, frigid, freezing, gelid, icy, glacial, arctic.

froth, n. *Foam, spume, scum, lather, suds, yeast.

Ana. Effervescence, *ebullition, ferment, fermentation: *lightness, levity, frivolity, flippancy.

froward. *Contrary, perverse, balky, restive, wayward.

Ana. *Obstinate, stubborn, mulish, pigheaded, stiff-necked: willful, headstrong, refractory, *unruly, ungovernable, intractable, recalcitrant: contumacious, *insubordinate, rebellious.

Ant. Compliant. — Con. Docile, tractable, amenable, *obedient, biddable: acquiescent, resigned (see COMPLIANT).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

frown, v. Frown, scowl, glower, lower (or lour), gloom come into comparison when they mean to put on a dark or malignant countenance or aspect. Frown commonly implies a stern face and contracted brows that express displeasure, disapprobation, anger, or contempt; as, "that Stonehenge circle of elderly disapproving Faces—Faces of the Uncles, and Schoolmasters and the Tutors who frowned on my youth" (L. P. Smith). Scowl carries an implication of wrinkled drawn-down brows that express ill humor, sullenness, or discontent; as, "a spinner that would not rebel, nor mutter, nor scowl, nor strike for wages?" (Emerson). Glower (in its earliest sense, now rare except in Scotland, to stare) implies a more direct stare or gaze than frown or scowl and carries a stronger connotation of anger, contempt, or defiance; as, "The steward...glowered at Powell, that new-comer, that ignoramus, that stranger without right or privileges" (Conrad); "He...stood glowering from a distance at her, as she sat bowed over the child" (D. H. Lawrence). Lower implies a menacing blackness and sullenness of face or of aspect; the term is used in reference not only to persons but to skies that give promise of a storm; as, "Stand firm, for in his look defiance lours" (Milton); "wandering from chamber to chamber...all distinguishable by the same lowering gloom" (Beckford); "Up behind the Sangre de Cristo, gathered great thunderheads, lowering as they came, fringed threateningly with light" (M. Austin). Gloom in earlier use was a close synonym of lower (as, "What's he, who with contracted brow, And sullen port, glooms downward with his eyes?"—Congreve) but in current English carries a much stronger implication of gloominess or dejection, and a much weaker (often nonexistent) suggestion of threatening; as, "They may be wise in not glooming over what is inevitable" (J. B. Cabell); "Skiddaw [a mountain] gloomed solemnly overhead" (E. Dowden).

Ant. Smile. — Con. *Disapprove, deprecate.

frowzy. Blowzy, *slatternly, dowdy.

Ana. Slovenly, unkempt, sloppy, *slipshod: squalid, *dirty, filthy: *negligent, neglectful, lax, slack, remiss.

Ant. Trim: smart. — Con. *Neat, tidy, trig, spick-and-span: *clean, cleanly.

frugal. Thrifty, economical, *sparing.

Ana. *Careful, meticulous: provident, prudent, discreet (see under PRUDENCE): saving, preserving, conserving (see SAVE): parsimonious, cheeseparing, penny-pinching (see STINGY).

Ant. Wasteful. — Con. Extravagant (see EXCESSIVE): prodigal, lavish, *profuse.

fruitful. Recund, prolific, *fertile.

Ana. Reproducing or reproductive, propagating, breeding (see corresponding verbs at GENERATE): bearing, producing or productive, yielding (see corresponding verbs at BEAR): teeming, abounding (see TEEM): luxuriant, lush, exuberant (see PROFUSE).

Ant. Unfruitful: fruitless. — Con. *Sterile, barren, impotent, infertile: *futile, vain, bootless, abortive.

fruitfulness. Prolificacy, fecundity, fertility. See under FERTILE.

fruition. Enjoyment, delectation, *pleasure, delight, joy.

Ana. Realization, actualization, substantiation, materialization (see corresponding verbs at REALIZE): fulfillment, accomplishment (see corresponding verbs at PERFORM): attainment, achievement (see corresponding verbs at REACH): possession, enjoyment (see corresponding verbs at HAVE).

fruitless. *Futile, vain, bootless, abortive.

Ana. Unfruitful, barren, infertile, *sterile: *vain, idle, otiose, nugatory, empty, hollow: frustrated, thwarted, foiled (see FRUSTRATE).

Ant. Fruitful. — Con. *Effective, effectual, efficacious, efficient: *fertile, fecund, prolific.

frustrate. Frustrate, thwart, foil, baffle, balk, circumvent, outwit agree in meaning either to defeat a person attempting or hoping to achieve an end or satisfy a desire or, in some cases, to defeat another's desire. To frustrate is to render vain or ineffectual all efforts, however feeble or however vigorous, to fulfill one's intention or desire. "If such a failure can change a writer... from a second-rate poet and novelist into a supreme critical historian... ought we not rather to welcome this frustration?" (L. P. Smith). "Whatever Nature... purposes to herself, she never suffers any reason, design, or accident to frustrate" (Fielding). "My good intentions towards you... are continually frustrated" (Cowper). To thwart is to frustrate especially by crossing or running counter to someone or something making headway. "Others had thrust themselves into his life and thwarted his purposes" (G. Eliot). "Public enforcement of hygienic practices is thwarted by a really obstructive neglect of the rules of health by her [France's] peasantry" (J. A. Hobson). Foil commonly implies repulse or discomfiture that makes further effort difficult or destroys one's inclination to proceed further. "His attempts to replace ambition by love had been as fully foiled as his ambition itself" (Hardy). To baffle is to frustrate especially by confusing or puzzling; to balk, by interposing obstacles or hindrances. "Such knotty problems of alleys, such enigmatical entries, and such sphinx's riddles of streets without thoroughfares as must, I conceive, baffle the audacity of porters and confound the intellects of hackney coachmen" (De Quincey). "I like reading my Bible without being baffled by unmeaningnesses" (Arnold). "When an affection as intense as that is balked in its direct path and repressed it usually, as we know, finds an indirect outlet" (Van W. Brooks). "His inclination to dreams, balked by the persistent holding of his mind to definite things" (S. Anderson). Circumvent implies frustration by stratagem; outwit, by craft or cunning. "Immigration laws had been growing more and more effective.... But... the rejected aliens soon learned a method of circumventing them" (V. Heiser). "The skill with which she [Elizabeth] had hoodwinked and outwitted every statesman in Europe" (J. R. Green).

Ana. Negative, counteract, *neutralize: defeat, beat, overcome, *conquer: *forbid, prohibit, inhibit: *prevent, preclude, obviate: *hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar

Ant. Fulfill. — Con. Effect, accomplish, achieve, *perform: further, forward, promote, *advance: *incite, instigate, abet, foment.

fuddle. Muddle, bemuddle, addle, *confuse.

Ana. & Ant. See those at BEFUDDLE.

fugitive, adj. Evasive, transitory, *transient, fleeting, passing, ephemeral, momentary, short-lived.

fulfill or fulfil. 1 Effect, achieve, accomplish, execute, *perform, discharge.

Ana. *Enforce, implement: compass, attain, *reach, gain: *realize, actualize: finish, complete (see CLOSE).

Ant. Frustrate: fail (in).

2 *Satisfy, meet, answer.

Ana. Equal, approach, *match, touch, rival.

Ant. Fall short (of).

full. Full, complete, plenary, replete are not synonyms in the sense that they are interchangeable with each other, but the last three are interchangeable with the most comprehensive term, full, in at least one of its senses. Full implies the presence or inclusion of everything that is wanted or required by something, or that can be held, contained, attained, or the like, by it; thus, a full year numbers 365 days or, in leap years, 366 days; a full basket is one that can hold nothing more; a full mind is stocked to the point of overflowing with knowledge or ideas; a full moon has reached the height of its development; a full stomach is one that can contain no more food with comfort or is completely satisfied; a full meal is one lacking in none of the courses (or sometimes in none of the elements) to make a satisfying or balanced meal; a sponge full of water has absorbed all the water it can hold. Complete comes into comparison and close synonymy with full when the latter implies the entirety that is needed to the perfection, consummation, integrity, or realization of a thing; as, complete (or full) combustion; a complete (or full) meal; complete (or full) sovereignty or control. "If you consider the ritual of the Church during the cycle of the year, you have the complete drama represented. The Mass is a small drama, having all the unities; but in the Church year you have represented the full drama of creation" (T. S. Eliot). "The panorama of to-day's events is not an accurate or complete picture, for history will supply posterity with much evidence which is hidden from the eyes of contemporaries" (C. W. Eliot). Only when complete means completed (as, the building is now complete) is full not a synonym of the word. Plenary comes into comparison with full when full implies the absence of all qualification or even suggestion of qualification as to a thing's completeness. Plenary, however, heightens the force of full in this sense and carries a much stronger suggestion of absoluteness; thus, to give plenary powers is to give full power without the slightest qualification; a plenary indulgence implies the remission of the entire temporal punishment due for one's sins. "By this word 'miracle' I meant to suggest to you a something like plenary inspiration in these . . . men; an inspiration at once supernatural and so authoritative that it were sacrilege now to alter their text by one jot or tittle" (Quiller-Couch). Replete (with), the more bookish term, as compared with full (of), heightens the implication of abundant supply, or of being filled to the brim with something; as, "Should a man full of talk be justified?" (Job xi. 2); "He is quick, unaffected, replete with anecdote" (Hazlitt); "An anxious captain, who has suddenly got news, replete with importance for him" (H. James). Often, however, the term implies fullness to satiety or to the point of being surfeited; as, "When he of wine was replete at his feast" (Chaucer); "Right reading makes a full man in a sense even better than Bacon's; not replete, but complete rather, to the pattern for which Heaven designed him" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. Including or inclusive, comprehending or comprehensive (see corresponding verbs at INCLUDR): teeming, abounding, superabounding (see TEEM): glutted, cloyed, gorged, surfeited, sated (see SATIATE).

Ant. Empty. — Con. Void, vacant, blank (see EMPTV): *bare, barren: stripped, dismantled, divested, denuded (see STRIP).

full-fledged. *Mature, matured, ripe, mellow, adult, grown-up.

Ant. Unfledged: callow. — Con. *Proficient, skilled, skillful, expert, adept.

fulsome. Fulsome, oily, unctuous, oleaginous, sleek, soapy are here compared as adjectives that mean too obviously extravagant or ingratiating to be accepted as genuine or sincere. Fulsome (etymologically, exceedingly full) has passed through an interesting sense development until it now stresses a surfeit of that which in measure is not displeasing, but which in abundance is cloyingly extravagant and offensive. In current use, the term is applied chiefly to praise, flattery, and compliments, with the intent to suggest that they exceed the bounds of good taste and are lacking in truth and sincerity; as, fulsome flattery; "He was debauching one of those worthies with the most fulsome praise" (Smollett); "The fulsome strains of courtly adulation" (Edgeworth); "He could never be made ridiculous, for he was always ready to laugh at himself and to prick the bladder of fulsome praise" (Buchan). Oily and unctuous both suggest the smoothness and blandness of oil. The former, as applied to persons and their utterances and acts, carries a strong implication of an offensively ingratiating quality, and sometimes suggests a suavity, a benevolence, a kindness, or the like, that is assumed as a mask for one's own evil or dubious ends; as, an oily scoundrel; oily manners; oily smugness; "Only oily and commonplace evasion" (Stevenson). Unctuous, on the other hand, suggests the assumption, often in hypocrisy, of the tone or manner of one who is grave, devout, or spiritual; as, the unctuous grandiloquence of Dickens's Chadband; "The look [of benevolence] was, perhaps, unctuous, rather than spiritual, and had, so to speak, a kind of fleshy effulgence . . . He . . . smiled with more unctuous benignity than ever" (N. Hawthorne); "Mark Twain writes those words with an almost unctuous gravity of conviction" (Van W. Brooks); "the English . . . bear their patriotism heavily, unctuously, speak solemnly of the white man's burden, and introduce religion into the gay and worldly affair" (R. Macaulay). Oleaginous is sometimes used in place of oily or unctuous when pomposity is connoted or a humorous note is desired; as, "[the person] who snuffles the responses with such oleaginous sanctimony" (F. W. Farrar). Sleek (as here compared: see also SLEEK, 1) may suggest the assumption of any of the outward marks that distinguish the suave, the courtly, or the urbane gentleman, but it usually stresses the speciousness of that appearance and often imputes rank hypocrisy to the person who assumes it; as, sleek rogues preying upon young girls. "Another [than Lancelot] sinning on such heights with one [Queen Guinevere]. The flower of all the west and all the world, Had been the sleeker for it" (Tennyson). Soapy comes close to unctuous in its extended sense but it carries almost no suggestion of hypocrisy: rather, it connotes an unduly soft, bland, or ingratiating manner; as, "But why . . . do people call him [Bishop Wilberforce] 'Soapy Sam'?" (Pall Mall Gazette).

Ana. Lavish, *profuse, exuberant: *excessive, extravagant: cloying, satiating, sating (see SATIATE): bombastic, grandiloquent, magniloquent (see RHETORICAL).

fumigate. Disinfect, sanitize, *sterilize.

fun, n. Fun, jest, sport, game, play come into comparison when they mean anything, such as an activity, an utterance, a form of expression, or the spirit behind any of these, which provides oneself with amusement or is expected or intended to arouse others' smiles or laughter. Fun, the ordinary colloquial term of this group, may imply merely amusement, or the engagement of the mind in something that interests one without thought of another end or effect (as, to play football for fun; he writes just for the fun of it), but it more often implies a natural or inherent capacity for laughing, for provoking laughter, or for finding a cause for laughter in other persons, or in their situations or activities; as, "He used to be full of fun. Once we laughed all day together tumbling in the hay" (Meredith); "Artemus Ward was all fun and sweet reasonableness and profoundest common sense" (Lucas); "It will be fine fun to see how you'll master your husband and never raise your voice above the singing o' the kettle all the while" (G. Eliot); "A couple of boys left to themselves will furnish richer fun than any troop of trained comedians" (Meredith). Jest (as here compared: see also JEST, 1) comes into comparison with fun chiefly when used in phrases such as in jest (cf. in fun), or when used in the larger sense of activities, utterances, or forms of expression not to be taken seriously. But in these instances, jest carries a stronger implication of raillery, ridicule, or hoaxing than fun usually carries; as, one never can determine whether he is telling these tales of adventure in jest or in earnest; he is such a hoaxer that one takes nearly everything that he does or says as jest. Sport (as here compared: see also under PLAY, v., 1) also comes into comparison with fun chiefly in idiomatic phrases such as in sport or to make sport (cf. to make fun), where it suggests not only a desire to arouse laughter, but to make one a butt of one's mirth or a laughingstock; as, "then make sport at me" (Shak.); the offensive nickname was given to him in sport; to find sport in his deep embarrassment. Game was originally a close synonym of fun, but in this sense it is now rare except in the phrase to make game of, where it often carries an implication of mischievous or malicious fun; as, "Do they not seek occasion... to... make a game of my calamities?" (Milton); "She had all the talents which qualified her... to make game of his scruples" (Macaulay). But game, largely through association with other senses of the word, such as a contest or competition in sports (see games under ATHLETICS) or an object of pursuit in a hunt, applies to an activity indulged in or carried on in the spirit of fun or sport (as, "It is an amusing game... to waylay leader-writers and tackle them... turn them inside out and show how empty they are"—R. Macaulay), or to a person or situation that is made fun of (as, "Their sour aspect, their nasal twang, their stiff posture, their long graces, their Hebrew names... were indeed fair game for the laughers"—Macaulay). When the phrases in fun and in sport seem a little too explicit in their connotations, play, which implies nothing more than an opposition to the noun earnest (especially in the phrase "in earnest"), is sometimes substituted for fun or sport; as, you have no reason to be offended, for the remark was made only in play.

Ana. Amusement, diversion, recreation, entertainment (see under AMUSE): merriment, jocundity, blitheness, joviality (see corresponding adjectives at MERRY): *mirth, glee, hilarity, jollity.

function, n. 1 Function, office, duty, province come into comparison when they mean the act, acts, activities, or operations expected of a person or thing by virtue of his or its nature, structure, status, position, or the like. Function is the most comprehensive of these terms, capable of referring not only to any living thing or to any organ or member of a living thing, but to anything in nature (such as the sun, the stars, the earth) or in art (such as poetry, painting, music, or an example of one of these), or to anything constructed that serves a definite end or purpose or is intended to perform a certain kind of work; as, to fulfill one's function as a mother; the function of the stomach is to digest food sufficiently to enable it to pass into the intestines where digestion is completed and absorption takes place; "The function of language is twofold: to communicate emotion and to give information" (A. Huxley); the function of the leaves of a plant; the function of criticism; the function of a stationary engine; "what after all... is the true function of religion?" (G. L. Dickinson). Office applies usually, but not exclusively, to the function of, or the work to be performed by, a person as a result of his trade, profession, employment, position with relation to others, or the like; in this sense it refers to a service that is expected of one or to a charge that is laid upon one; as, "O, pardon me for bringing these ill news, Since you did leave it for my office, sir" (Shak.) "to suppose she would shrink... from the office of a friend" (Austen); "They exercise the offices of the judge, the priest, the counsellor" (Gladstone). The term was once, and is still occasionally, used in reference to things in a sense very close to that of function; as, "the gown which had been let down to hide it [the mud-died rim of a petticoat] not doing its office" (Austen). Duty (as here considered: for a more restricted sense, see TASK) applies not only to the tasks the performance of which is expected or required of one by reason of one's occupation or employment (as, the duties of a cook; the duties of a hotel porter) but to the offices associated with one's status, one's rank, one's calling, and generally regarded as inherent in that status, rank, and calling and as imposing an obligation upon the person so stationed; thus, a man and wife fulfill their biological function when they produce children but they must still perform their duties as parents in rearing, protecting, and educating those children; the governor regarded it as his duty to warn the citizens of the dangers ahead. "It is not only the right, but it is the judicial duty of the court, to examine the whole case as presented by the record" (Ch. Just. Taney). Province, in the sense here considered, is closely related to the sense in which it is discriminated from field and other terms (see FIELD, 2), but it is distinguishable from that sense in denoting any function, office, or duty which comes within one's range of jurisdiction, powers, competence, and the like; as, "Nursing does not belong to a man; it is not his province" (Austen); "It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Ana. End, goal, object, objective, purpose (see INTENTION): business, concern, *affair: *task, job.

2 *Power, faculty.

Ana. *Ability, capacity, capability: action, behavior, operation (see corresponding verbs at ACT).

function, v. Operate, work, *act, behave, react.

fundamental, adj. 1 Fundamental, basic, basal, underlying, substratal, substrative, radical come into comparison when they mean forming or affecting the groundwork, roots, or lowest part of something. Fundamental is now used chiefly, but not exclusively, in reference to immaterial things or to abstractions, whether they are thought of figuratively as built up on a foundation or as having their origins in roots; as, the fundamental rules of poetry; a fundamental change in his attitude to life; the fundamental rock in a geological formation; "The fundamental absurdity of the plot... remains" (FitzGerald); "The fundamental note [in an oasis] is struck by the palms" (A. Huxley). Basic is often used interchangeably with fundamental when the latter implies reference to a substructure; as, the fundamental or basic argument. But basic is preferred to fundamental when the reference is to a definite or concrete base (that is, groundwork, bottom, or starting point); as, the basic stone of a pillar; a basic wage in the electrical industry; the basic speed of an automobile. Basal differs from basic chiefly in not being used as often in reference to immaterial things and in more often implying reference to the bottom or to the lowest point or regions of a thing; as, "geologising the basal parts of the Andes" (Darwin); the basal plane of a crystal; the basal leaves on a stem. Underlying may be used to suggest nothing more than extension beneath something else; as, the underlying strata; the underlying layer of tissue. However, especially when the reference is to something immaterial, the term frequently comes close to fundamental, differing from it chiefly in suggesting a depth that removes the thing from one's range of vision or a remoteness that demands study or research on the part of one that would detect it; as, the underlying motive for his act; the underlying causes of the World War; the underlying differences between Communism and Socialism. Substratal, and the still rarer substrative, often refer to the metaphysical conception of a substratum, or the substance in which the qualities of a thing inhere (as, the substratal substance), or to the derived scientific (chiefly biological) conception of a substratum as the substance or base in which something grows, such as a medium used for the cultivation of bacteria or other organisms, or of cells; as, the substratal substance in this experiment is gelatin. However, substratal and substrative are also applied to something which literally underlies an upper layer or stratum; as, substratal soil; substratal rock. Radical (see also LIBERAL, 2) implies reference to the root or origin or ultimate source of a thing; thus, a radical change is one that is so thoroughgoing that it affects the fundamental character of the thing involved; a radical error touches the very center and source of a thing's life. "Actual differences distinguishing the different races of mankind—differences that may be ascribed to radical peculiarities of mind" (Bridges).

Ana. *Primary, primal, primordial, prime: *elementary, elemental.

2 *Essential, vital, cardinal.

Ana. Requisite, *needful, necessary, indispensable: paramount, *dominant: principal, capital, foremost, *chief.

Con. *Superficial: *subordinate, secondary.

fundamental, n. *Principle, axiom, law, theorem.

Ana. *Element, integrant, constituent, component, factor: ground, basis, foundation, *base, groundwork.

funny. *Laughable, risible, ludicrous, ridiculous, farcical, comic, comical, droll.

Ana. Humorous, *witty, jocose, jocular, facetious: amusing, diverting, entertaining (see AMUSE): grotesque, bizarre, *fantastic, antic.

Con. *Serious, solemn, grave, sober: *melancholy, plaintive, doleful, dolorous, lugubrious.

furbish, v. Buff, *polish, shine, burnish.

Ana. *Clean, cleanse: renovate, refurbish, restore, *renew, rejuvenate: revise, reform, amend, rectify (see CORRECT).

furnish. Furnish, equip, outfit, appoint, accounter (or accouter), arm are comparable when they mean to supply a person, or something used by him, with the adjuncts necessary or appropriate to his daily living or his occupation. Furnish stresses the provision of all essentials; thus, one furnishes a house when it is supplied with all the necessary conveniences (not parts of its structure) that make it ready for use as a home. Equip stresses the provision of things (sometimes a single thing) making for efficiency in action or in use; thus, a poorly furnished kitchen may be short in tables or chairs, but a poorly equipped kitchen is not adequately provided with the utensils or appliances needed for cooking and other work carried on there; one may equip (but not furnish) an automobile with four-wheel brakes. Outfit stresses provision for a journey, an expedition, or a special kind of work; it is used chiefly with reference to necessary clothes, tools, and the like, and so is narrower in its range of applications than furnish and broader than equip. "It took several days to outfit me for my journey to Washington" (Cather). Appoint (now somewhat bookish in this sense) suggests complete, or often elegant, furnishings or equipment; as, well-appointed drawing rooms. "The Bristol mail is the best appointed in the kingdom" (De Quincey). Accouter stresses provision of dress, array, or personal equipment, esp. for military service; as, soldiers accoutered for the conflict. "He... was accoutred in riding dress" (Dickens). It often refers to harness or trappings. "As soon as his master was in the saddle, he shook his accoutrements and sprang forward" (G. Moore). In its specific military sense, the noun accoutrements is used only of such articles of a soldier's personal outfit as the belt or sword hanger, and excludes clothes and weapons; as, inspection of arms and accoutrements. Arm stresses provision for effective action or operation; it is used chiefly with reference to equipment necessary for offense or defense; as, to arm a man of war; armed to the teeth; but it may imply any means of preparation for added strength, security, or the like; as, to arm the hilt of a sword with a plate; armed with rubbers and umbrella.

In their figurative senses, the words in this group retain their respective implications, but refer to mental, moral, or physical qualifications rather than to things; as, a strong heart is an important part of an athlete's equipment. "Perception is only part of our mental outfit" (Eddington). "He armed himself with patience, as was needful, having so much to endure" (C. E. Norton).

Ana. Endue, endow, *dower: array, apparel, *clothe.

Con. *Strip, diamantle, denude, divest: despoil, spoliage (see RAVAGE).

furor or furore. Fury, frenzy, enthusiasm, *inspiration, afflatus.

further, adv. & adj. *Farther.

further, v. Forward, *advance, promote.

Ana. *Help, aid, assist: back, champion, *support, uphold: propagate, *generate, engender: accelerate, *speed, hasten, quicken.

Ant. Hinder: retard. — Con. *Frustrate, thwart, foil, balk, baffle, circumvent, outwit: impede, obstruct, bar, block (see HINDER): *prevent, forestall.

furthermore. Moreover, besides, likewise, *also, too.

furtive. Stealthy, clandestine, surreptitious, underhand, underhanded, *secret, covert, privy, backstairs.

Ana. *Sly, cunning, crafty, wily, artful: *cautious, calculating, wary, circumspect: disguised, cloaked, masked (see DISGUISE, v.).

Ant. Forthright: brazen. — Con. *Straightforward, aboveboard: barefaced, brash, *shameless, impudent.

fury. 1 Rage, ire, *anger, wrath, indignation.

Ana. *Passion: exasperation, irritation, aggravation (see IRRITATE): *acrimony, asperity, acerbity.

2 Furor, frenzy, *inspiration, enthusiasm, afflatus.

fuse, v. 1 *Liquefy, melt, dissolve, deliquesce, thaw.

2 Amalgamate, merge, coalesce, blend, mingle, commingle, *mix.

fusion. Coalition, *alliance, league, federation, confederation, confederacy.

fuss, n. Pother, ado, flurry, *stir, bustle.

Ana. Agitation, perturbation, disturbance, flustering or fluster (see corresponding verbs at DISCOMPOSE): *haste, hurry, speed.

fussy. Finical, particular, pernickety, fastidious, squeamish, *nice.

Ana. Exacting, demanding, requiring (see DEMAND, v.): querulous, fretful, *irritable.

fustian, n. Rant, rodomontade, *bombast, rhapsody.

fusty. Musty, rancid, *malodorous, putrid, fetid, stinking, noisome, rank.

Ana. *Dirty, squalid, nasty, filthy, foul: slovenly, unkempt, sloppy, *slipshod.

futile. Futile, vain, fruitless, bootless, abortive agree in denoting barren of result. Futile and vain parallel each other only when they imply failure to realize an immediate aim. "It was equally in vain, and he soon wearied of his futile vigilance" (Stevenson). Vain (see VAIN, 1) usually implies little more than simple failure; futile may connote the completeness of the failure or the unwisdom of the undertaking. "All literature, art, and science are vain... if they do not enable you to be glad" (Ruskin). "...the futility of Sophia's career.... She had grown old and hard in joyless years in order to amass this money which Cyril would spend coldly and ungratefully" (Bennett). Though both vain and futile may be applied to something contemplated but not yet tried, vain more often suggests a judgment based on previous experience; futile, one based on reasoning from self-evident principles. "But it is vain to talk of form and symmetry to the pure expansionist" (Babbian). "It is futile to ask which [Shakespeare or Dante] undertook the more difficult job" (T. S. Eliot). Fruitless is often interchangeable with vain. But its literal meaning makes it especially applicable to undertakings that entail long, patient, arduous effort and severe disappointment. "...Whom he had long time sought with fruitless suit" (Spenser). Bootless, chiefly poetic, is especially applied to petitions or efforts to obtain relief. "They would not pity me, yet plead I must; And bootless unto them" (Shak.). Abortive implies failure before plans are matured or activities begun; as, an abortive conspiracy; an abortive attempt to break jail. "He had stirred up the Maronites to attack us... had I not brought up unexpectedly so many Arabs as rendered the scheme abortive" (Scott).

Ana. *Vain, idle, otiose, nugatory: *ineffective, ineffectual, inefficacious.

Con. Effectual, *effective, efficacious: fruitful (see FERTILE).

gather. v. 1. Gather, collect, assemble, congregate agree in meaning to come or to bring together so as to form a group, a mass, or a unit. The same distinctions in applications and in implications characterize their derivative nouns gathering, collection, assemblage (which see) or assembly, congregation. Gather is the most widely applicable of these words; it may be used in reference not only to persons and objects but to intangible things; as, a crowd gathers wherever there is excitement; to gather the boys and girls of the neighborhood for a picnic; leaves gather in heaps on windy days; to gather the leaves for burning; beads of moisture gathered on his brow; to gather one's ideas together before planning one's speech. In certain phrases gather acquires additional specific connotations; thus, to gather flowers or crops implies plucking and culling as well as bringing together; to gather a ruffle implies a drawing together or into folds as in shirring; to gather one's wits connotes an effort at concentration or at mustering or rallying; in the phrase "pus gathers to form an abscess" there is an implication of generation as well as of coming to a head. Collect is often used in place of gather with no intended difference in meaning; thus, one may say: to collect leaves or leaves collected; beads of moisture collected on his brow. They are not interchangeable, however, whenever the ideas of careful selection or a principle of selection, of orderly arrangement, or of a definitely understood (though not always expressed) end in view are involved; thus, to collect butterflies implies a selection of specimens and, usually, their cataloguing; to collect books (as in book collector) implies a choice of books with regard to some principle such as rarity, beauty of binding, authorship, and the like. There is a subtle difference between to gather one's thoughts, which often merely implies previous scattering, and to collect one's thoughts, which in precise use implies their organization; there is also a difference between to gather money, which may mean merely to accumulate it, and to collect money, which usually suggests raising a fund by gifts, subscriptions, and the like. In idiomatic English collect and collection are often preferred to gather and gathering when various things are brought together; thus, a jumble or an omnium-gatherum (despite its literal translation) is called a miscellaneous collection (not gathering); one collects (better than gathers) an assortment of articles. Assemble stresses more emphatically than either gather or collect a close union of individuals and a conscious or a definite end in their coming or in their being brought together. It is used chiefly (but far from exclusively) in reference to persons who gather together, either of their own will or at the call of another, so as to form a group or body that will unite in action, join in counsel, or the like; as, the democratic rights of free speech and free assembly. "They acted upon it [the proposed Constitution of the United States] in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in Convention" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Even after a new crew had...been assembled, I had qualms about setting forth over the treacherous waters of the China Sea" (V. Heiser). In reference to things, assemble, in discriminating use, always implies an agent who collects them in order to unite them into a single body or structure, or into a distinct and isolated group; thus, the assembly department of an automobile plant is the department in which the workmen build the cars by assembling the component parts made in other departments or in other factories; it took twenty years to assemble the musical instruments which form this collection. Congregate implies a flocking together into a crowd, a huddle, a mass, or the like; as, cattle congregate during a storm; to pass laws forbidding persons to congregate on the streets. "They [tinted clouds produced in a gas-discharge lamp] are congregations of atoms excited and lucent, mingled with free electricity" (Karl K. Darrow). Congregation is specifically applied to an assembly meeting for religious worship, but it usually retains the suggestion of a crowd that has flocked together.

Ana. *Accumulate, amass, hoard: *heap, pile, stack, mass.

2 *Infer, deduce, conclude, judge.

gathering. Collection, assemblage, assembly, congregation. See under GATHER, v.

Ana. *Crowd, throng, press, horde, mob, rout, crush: accumulation (see corresponding verb ACCUMULATE).

gauche. Maladroit, *awkward, clumsy, inept.

gaudy. Gaudy, tawdry, garish, flashy, meretricious come into comparison as meaning vulgar or cheap in its showiness. That is gaudy which uses gay colors and conspicuous ornaments or ornamentation lavishly, ostentatiously, and tastelessly; as, "gaudy calicoes" (Shaw); "False eloquence, like the prismatic glass, Its gaudy colors spreads on ev'ry place" (Pope). That is tawdry which is not only gaudy but cheap. "Beneath the lamp her tawdry ribbons glare" (Gay). "A fancy...fruitful, yet not wanton, and gay without being tawdry" (Cropper). "He saw nothing else; the tawdry scenery, the soiled cotton velvet and flimsy crumpled satin, the reek of vulgarity, never touched his innocent mind" (DeLand). That is garish which is dazzlingly or offensively bright; as, "Hide me from day's garish eye" (Milton); "for this week he would produce a bunch [of flowers] as garish as a gypsy, all blue and purple and orange, but next week a bunch discreet as a pastel, all rose and gray with a dash of yellow" (V. Sackville-West). That is flashy which dazzles for a moment but then reveals itself as shallow or vulgar display; as, "Tom Paine was considered for the time as a Tom Fool to him [Godwin], Paley an old woman, Edmund Burke a flashy sophist" (Hazlitt); "flashy make-believe" (G. Eliot). That is meretricious (literally, having to do with harlots, or prostitutes) which allures by false or deceitful show of worth, value, brilliancy, or the like; as, "The jewels in the crisped hair, the diadem on the polished brow, are thought meretricious, theatrical, vulgar" (Hazlitt). "The false taste, the showy and meretricious element...invading the social life of the period [around 1800] and supplanting the severe elegance, the instinctive grace of the eighteenth century" (Binyon). "If a writer's attitude toward his characters and his scene is as vulgar as a showman's, as mercenary as an auctioneer's, vulgar and meretricious will his product for ever remain" (Calher).

Ana. *Showy, pretentious, ostentatious: vulgar, *coarse, gross: resplendent, gorgeous (see SPLENDID).

Ant. Quiet (in taste or style). — Con. Modest, *chaste, decent, pure.

gauge or gage, n. *Standard, criterion, yardstick, touchstone.

gaunt. Rawboned, angular, lank, lanky, *lean, spare, scrawny, skinny.

Ana. Cadaverous, wasted, *haggard, worn: *thin, slim, slender, slight.

Con. Portly, plump, *fleshy, fat, stout, corpulent, obese, rotund, chubby.

gay. Vivacious, *lively, sprightly, animated.

Ana. *Merry, blithe, jocund, jovial, jolly: *playful, frolicsome, sportive.

Ant. Grave, sober. — Con. *Serious, sedate, staid, solemn, earnest: quiet, *still, silent.

gaze, v. Gaze, stare, glare, peer, gloat come into comparison as meaning to look at long and attentively, but they vary greatly in their implications of attitude and motive. Gaze implies fixed and prolonged attention, especially as in admiration or wonder; as, "And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew, That one small head could carry all he knew" (Goldsmith); "He gazed so long That both his eyes were dazzled" (Tennyson). Gape adds to gaze the implication of stupid and openmouthed wonder or indecision; as, a yokel gaping at the sights on his first visit to the city; "The little men [Gurkhas] hitched their kukris well to hand, and gaped expectantly at their officers" (Kipling). Stare implies a fixed and direct gazing at a person or object: it may connote curiosity, astonishment, insolence, or vacant fixedness; as, "Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes He star'd at the Pacific—and all his men Look'd at each other with a wild surmise— Silent, upon a peak in Darien" (Keats); "staring at each other as if a bet were depending on the first man who winked" (G. Eliot); "She tried not to stare at Mr. Scales, but her gaze would not leave him" (Bennett). Glare adds to stare the implication of fierceness or anger; as, "All... with countenance grim Glared on him passing" (Milton); "Neither Clem nor Lonnie replied. Arch glared at them for not answering" (E. Caldwell). Peer suggests a looking narrowly, especially with or as if with partly closed eyes, or curiously, especially through or from behind something; as, "Mrs. Cary kept peering uneasily out of the window at her husband" (M. Wilkins); "His pale, near-sighted eyes had always the look of peering into distance" (Calher). Gloat usually implies prolonged or frequent gazing upon something, especially in secret, in earlier use amorously, but now more often with profound, usually malignant or unhallowed, satisfaction; as, a miser gloating over his hoard, "To gaze and gloat with his hungry eye On jewels that gleamed like a glowworm's spark" (Longfellow). In more recent use, the implication of malignant satisfaction is often so emphasized that the implication of gazing is obscured or lost; as, "in vengeance gloating on another's pain" (Byron); "that resolution of Orrin's is chock-full of bad grammar, and King'll gloat over that" (Kipling).

generate, v. Generate, engender, breed, beget, get, sire, procreate, propagate, reproduce come into comparison in the sense of to give life or origin to or to bring into existence by or as by natural processes. Generate, which means no more than this, is now used rarely in reference to human beings, seldom in reference to animals or plants (as, mushrooms are not generated from seeds), but is the technical term in reference to electricity (as, to generate an electric current) and is used commonly in reference to ideas, emotions, passions, moods, conditions, or the like, that have a traceable cause or source; as, "a habit of thought... only to be generated by intimate knowledge of good literature" (B. Russell); "I do not think religious feeling is ever aroused, except by ideas of objective truth and value; but these ideas are certainly not generated by feeling" (Inge); "the mood generated in me by the intellectual convictions current in my time" (J. W. Krutch). Engender, like generate, is now chiefly found in its extended sense. Literally, however, it refers particularly to the initial step in the process of generation, sometimes on the part of the male parent (as, "When a man... engenders his like... it is no miracle"—Hobbes), sometimes, but less often, on the part of the female parent (as, "O error, soon conceived, Thou... kill'st the mother that engender'd thee!"—Shak.); as a result, in extended use, it more often suggests an originating or a sudden or immediate birth than a bringing into fullness of life or being; as, "to hunger for the hope and happiness which... the dance seemed to engender within them" (Hardy); "a sudden spontaneous illumination... engendered in the course of writing a poem" (Day Lewis); "the strike, during which three men had been killed and ill-feeling engendered in hundreds of silent workers" (S. Anderson). Breed originally meant, but now rarely means except in dialectal or vulgar use, to bring, as a mother, one's young through the process of development from the time of the fertilization of the seed or egg to the time of birth or hatching. Now, the term often carries a less specific meaning and suggests merely the production of offspring (as, "Mankind will in every country breed up to a certain point"—W. Paley), sometimes by parental action but even more often by the activity of those who determine the parentage, the time of mating, the number of offspring, and the like (as, specialists who breed horses for racing; breeders of fine cattle; "the notion of a Government department trying to make out how many different types were necessary, and how many persons of each type, and proceeding to breed them by appropriate marriages, is amusing but not practicable"—Shaw). Oftentimes, the word adds the implication of nurturing or rearing to that of producing offspring, sometimes so stressing it that there is no reference to the life processes involved in generation; as, he was bred in a manner befitting the son of a king; "he was born and bred in your house" (Jowett); "bred and born in a brier patch, Br'er Fox" (J. C. Harris). In its extended sense, breed usually implies a gradual or continuous process of coming into being: it may specifically suggest a period of latency or quiescence before breaking out; as, "An iniquitous government breeds despair in men's souls" (J. Morley); "The yoke a man creates for himself by wrong-doing will breed hate in the kindest nature" (G. Eliot); "Incessant recurrence without variety breeds tedium" (Lowes). Beget, or get, and sire imply the act of the male parent: in current use, beget is preferred in reference to men and get and sire in reference to animals, but in earlier use all three were interchangeable; as, "Cowards father cowards and base things sire base" (Shak.); "He that begetteth a fool doeth it to his sorrow" (Proverbs xvii. 21); the only lawfully-begotten son of the King; "I had rather to adopt a child than get it" (Shak.); a thoroughbred sired by one of the most famous stallions of the breed. Only beget has an extended sense derived from this literal meaning. In such use there is very little difference between beget and engender, both terms often being employed interchangeably without loss. But beget tends to stress calling into being, as on the spur of the moment or without any previous preparation or expectation; as, beauty that begets wonder and admiration; "stories...spring from the fillip of some suggestion, and one begets another" (Lowes). Procreate, a somewhat formal or literary word, comes close in meaning to breed in the sense of to produce offspring. Though sometimes used as a synonym of beget, it more often refers to sexual acts involved in a mating and their results in the production of children; as, through this marriage an heir to the throne was procreated; "Matrimony...was ordained for the procreation of children" (Marriage Service in Book of Common Prayer). Propagate is now more often used than procreate, but it carries implications of preserving and increasing one's kind that are not inherent in procreate; also, it is used as frequently of animals and of plants as of men, and may be employed in reference to races, peoples, species, and the like, as well as in reference to individuals; as, plants are propagated by seeds, cuttings, division of roots, offsets, and the like; the rabbit propagates itself with great rapidity; "Thine ordinance [matrimony], whereby Thou hast provided for the propagation of mankind" (Marriage Service in Manual of Prayers). In its extended use, propagate implies not only giving rise to something or bringing it into existence, but often also a continuation of that existence or the widespread dissemination of the thing that is brought into existence; as, Communists have been successful in propagating their ideas; the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; "Oh! does patience beget patience?" said Adrian. "I was not aware it was a propagating virtue" (Meredith). Reproduce may be used in reference to any living thing capable of bringing into existence one or more of its kind. The term does not necessarily imply the mating of male and female and consequent generation, for it may suggest an asexual process such as the division of one body into two parts (a process which occurs in the lowest forms of life) or the formation of a protuberance or projection on the parent's body and its development (sometimes separating as in the hydra, sometimes remaining attached, as in the coral). "The tribe was dying out; infant mortality was heavy, and the young couples did not reproduce freely,—the life-force seemed low" (Cather).

Gentile, n. *Pagan, heathen, paynim, ethnic.

gentle, adj. 1 Gentle, genteel, come into comparison as meaning characteristic of or befitting a person of good birth or good breeding. Gentle, except when applied to terms such as blood, birth, extraction, and breeding, or when found in compounds such as gentleman, gentlewoman, and gentlefolk, is now chiefly historical or archaic in the sense of having (or derived from a family having) inherited high rank or social position. When the adjective is applied to actions, words, manners, a way of living, or the like, the term now usually implies the manifestation of qualities commonly associated with such persons, such as courteousness, chivalrousness, cultivation, refinement, taste, and the like. "Monsieur Defarge bent down on one knee to the child of his old master, and put her hand to his lips. It was a gentle action, but not at all gently done" (Dickens). "A restful, friendly room, fitted to the uses of gentle life, covered...with beauty, with the...manners of a life lived with...leisure" (M. Austin). Genteel came into English from the French gentil in the late 16th century, the spelling gentile being preferred until the late 17th century. The first implication was that of birth and breeding above that of a commoner: though the term was occasionally applied to persons of noble birth, it soon was associated particularly with the class called the gentry, and especially with persons of leisure, or fashion, or good breeding as distinguished from the masses of common or ill-bred persons; as, "After staying long enough...to discover that the crowd was insupportable, and that there was not a genteel face to be seen...they hastened away to the Crescent, to breathe the fresh air of better company" (Austen); "A well-known and respected widow...of a standing which can only be expressed by the word genteel" (Hardy). Gradually the term came to imply a more or less affected gentility or an effort to retain the outward marks of gentility under the stress of insufficient means, and is now regarded as inelegant, except when used humorously or in the combination shabby-genteel; as, "Shabby-genteel houses, surrounded with deal fences, and things called gardens" (W. Cobbett). It occurs, however, more often in sly than in broad humor; as, "country or Bavarian beer not being genteel enough for the hotel" (Thackeray); "Swaying her rattling skirts with a genteel air" (M. Wilkins); "Her letter, couched in majestic but most genteel phrase, reached him Friday evening" (Deland).

Ana. Chivalrous, courtly, gallant, courteous (see CIVIL): *debonair: aristocratic, gentlemanly, patrician (see corresponding nouns at GENTLEMAN).

Ant. Boorish. — Con. Churlish, loutish, clownish (see under BOOR): *rude, ill-mannered, discourteous, ungracious, impolite, uncivil.

Ant. Rough, harsh. — Con. Vehement, *intense: *powerful, forcible, forceful: stimulating, exciting, provoking or provocative (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE).

gentlefolk. Gentry, *aristocracy, nobility, county, elite, society.

gentleman. Gentleman, patrician, aristocrat are synonyms when they denote a wellborn or blue-blooded person. Gentleman, in its technical British sense (which is now chiefly historical), implies descent from good family, the right to bear a coat of arms, and social rank just below that of the noble and above that of the yeoman. The term, especially in modern use, has been widely extended in its application and has acquired connotations which have little or nothing to do with lineage or heraldic rights; however, when used specifically with reference to social rank, it still commonly suggests the outward marks of good birth, elegance of person and of manners, and a life of leisure. "A gentleman born, master parson; who writes himself 'Armigero,' in any bill, warrant, quittance, or obligation" (Shak). "A gentleman ... I'll be sworn thou art; Thy tongue, thy face, thy limbs, actions and spirit, Do give thee five-fold blazon" (Shak). "Somebody has said that a king may make a nobleman, but he cannot make a gentleman" (Burke). Patrician derives its implications from its historical applications, but chiefly from its earliest reference to a Roman citizen who belonged to one of the original families of ancient Rome which, after the growth of the plebeian order, kept power and authority in their own hands. The word in modern use always suggests a distinguished ancestry, superior culture, and aloofness from all that is common or vulgar; it is applied chiefly to descendants of the oldest and most influential families when they constitute a social caste, especially one marked by exclusiveness and pride in birth. "The merchant-patricians [of Boston], like those of Holland and Flanders, in times gone by, wished to perpetuate their names and glorify their capital not only in the elegance of their mansions but also in churches, parks and public buildings" (Van W. Brooks). Aristocrat carries fewer suggestions of inbred physical characteristics than gentleman or patrician, but it suggests a sympathy with the point of view common to them. In historical use, it commonly implies an opposition to democrat, and is applicable to a person who believes in government by superior persons or by the class which includes such persons; in general modern use it is commonly applied to a person who by reason of birth, breeding, title, wealth, or the like, is accorded recognition as a member of the highest and, in some countries, the ruling caste. "Men ... are naturally divided into two parties: 1. Those who fear and distrust the people, and wish to draw all powers from them into the hands of the higher classes. 2. Those who identify themselves with the people, have confidence in them... and consider them as the most honest and safe... depository of the public interests.... The appellation of Aristocrats and Democrats is the true one, expressing the essence of all" (Jefferson). "Up to now it had been an essentially aristocratic movement—superior, sniffish and anti-democratic" (Mencken).

germ, n. Germ, microbe, bacterium, bacillus, virus, pathogen require discrimination not because they are synonyms but because all except pathogen, in the popular mind, denote one of numerous organisms invisible to the naked eye and responsible for the origin and development of many diseases. Germ and microbe are the ordinary nonscientific names for such an organism, especially for one that causes disease. Germ was first used in the early part of the nineteenth century when scientists were beginning to realize that minute organisms were probably responsible for some diseases; microbe came into use after the existence of disease-producing microorganisms had been established. Bacteria, the plural of bacterium, and the form commonly in use, is often incorrectly employed as though it were the equivalent of germs and microbes. Actually, it is the scientific designation of a very large group of unicellular microorganisms only some of which are instrumental in producing disease in man, animals, and plants, which are found widely distributed in water, air, soil, living things and dead organic matter, and which have structural and biological characteristics distinguishing them from other unicellular microorganisms such as the protozoa. In addition to the pathogenic, or disease-causing bacteria, there are the saprophytic bacteria which live upon dead or decaying organic matter and which, for the most part, are beneficial in their effects. Through the operation of bacteria such organic matter is converted into plant food. Fermentation, oxidation, and many other natural processes are the result of bacterial activity. Bacillus is often employed as though it designates any of the pathogenic bacteria. In correct scientific use, it names one of a genus of bacteria which are rod-shaped as distinguished from those which are globe-shaped (the coccus form, of which the streptococcus is an example) and those which are spiral (the spirillum form, of which the vibrio which causes Asiatic cholera is an example). Shape, and usually, nutritive habits, distinguish these genera, and beneficent as well as pathogenic species are found in all three groups. However, bacillus has, owing to differences in scientific description of the shape, been used in the designations of many species, including a large number of pathogenic forms, which are properly classified in other genera. It is possible to speak of the bacilli of typhus, diphtheria, tetanus, and the like, though they are not true bacilli, only because in some classifications these bacteria are so designated. But only in loose use is bacillus employed as meaning any disease-causing microorganism. Virus is, in accurate use, a substance, or poison, which is present in the juices of an organism (person, animal, plant) having an infectious disease and which, when transmitted to or injected into another organism, causes the same disease; thus, vaccine is a preparation containing the virus of cowpox in attenuated form. Since this substance is usually so minute that it is invisible even under the finest microscopes and passes through the finest filters known to bacteriologists (so that the term virus alone is often used as equivalent to the term filtrable virus), its exact nature is not known and it is by some believed to be a microorganism and by others a lifeless molecule. The juice of an animal or plant containing this virus in attenuated or dead form is often also, especially in loose or extended use, called virus. "When the doctors inoculate you... they give you an infinitesimally attenuated dose. If they gave you the virus at full strength it would overcome your resistance and produce its direct effect" (Shaw). The specific scientific term for a disease-producing organism or virus is pathogen, but this word has not yet been introduced into general use.

gesture, n. Gesture, gesticulation come into comparison as meaning an expressive movement or motion of the body or limbs, or the use of such a movement or motion. Gesture is commonly the more inclusive term, for it may imply any such movement or motion intended to express what words cannot or to increase the effectiveness or poignancy of words that are being uttered, or to take the place of words when for some reason or other they are unnecessary or impossible; as, "The right [hand of Niobe] is drawing up her daughter to her; and with that instinctive gesture... is encouraging the child to believe that it can give security" (Shelley); "he had permitted himself his very first and last gesture in all these days, raising a hard-clenched fist above his head" (Conrad); "the gesture with which he threw away the cigar-end struck her as very distinguished" (Bennett). Gesticulation, on the other hand, is applicable only when there is implication of unrestrained excitement, or the loss or absence of grace or dignity, or a determined effort to attract attention; as, "His [Poussin's] human figures are sometimes 'o'erinformed' with... feeling. Their actions have too much gesticulation" (Hazlitt); "making various savage gesticulations" (Livingstone); the speaker's gesticulations caused much amusement among the bystanders.

get. 1 Get, obtain, procure, secure, acquire, gain, win, earn are often used interchangeably in the sense of to come into the possession of. Get, one of the most general words in the English language, outstrips all the others in the number and diversity of its implications and in the range of its applicability. Unlike the others in this group, it does not necessarily presuppose effort or, at least, initiative. One gets, or comes into possession of, a thing by various means, as by fetching (go and get the book), by derivation or extraction (to get gold from ore), by receiving (to get a present), or in return for something (to get interest on one's money). Obtain is closest to get in extent of applicability, but it almost always implies activity or, at least, intent or hope, in the one who obtains. It suggests, therefore, the satisfaction of a desire or the attainment of an end worked for, sought for, or prayed for; as, to obtain money enough to establish a small business; to obtain a victory; to obtain mercy or pardon. "Evidence obtained and only obtainable by a criminal act" (Justice Holmes). Procure suggests effort directed to the obtaining of something for oneself or for others: it distinctively implies care, management, or contrivance; as, to procure supplies at the lowest market prices; he was unable to procure milk for the children. "They procured the means to get the best education England can give" (Quiller-Couch). Secure as a synonym of get and obtain is often attacked by purists. Discriminating writers, however, use it so as to retain its etymological implication of placing beyond danger, especially of loss. In such use, one secures that which is difficult to obtain because of competition, rarity, or the like, and fixes it in one's possession or under one's control; as, to secure the best seat in a coach; several colleges tried to secure Professor F's services; to secure the good opinion of the critics. "This style which secures its emphasis by always hesitating on the edge of caricature at the right moment" (T. S. Eliot). Acquire, though it usually presupposes exertion, strongly suggests addition, as by accretion, by natural growth, or as an inevitable result, to what is already possessed. "Jane seemed to me to be increasingly interesting; she was acquiring new subtleties, complexities, and comprehensions, and shedding crudities" (R. Macaulay). In very precise use, that which is acquired is not an immediate objective but an ultimate product or a by-product; thus, one reads good poetry and acquires a fine literary taste; a lawyer obtains a victory and acquires renown; by buying books regularly, he finally acquired a library of his own. "A doctrine which has acquired a mysterious or sacramental value" (Inge). The participial adjective acquired is often used with the implication of a contrast; as, acquired (opposed to inherited) wealth; acquired (opposed to innate, inborn) ability. Gain adds to obtain the implications of struggle or competition and of value, especially material value, in the thing gained. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul" (Matthew xvi. 26). Sometimes only struggle is implied; as, to gain a meager living from the soil; sometimes, there is no suggestion of struggle and the value of the thing gained is stressed. "Unless good sense preserve what beauty gains" (Pope). Win, though often interchangeable with gain, can suggest, as gain cannot, favoring qualities in the one who wins or favorable circumstances affecting the result; as, faint heart never won fair lady; to win a prize for the best essays; to win a hundred dollars in a lottery. Earn definitely implies a correspondence between the effort and that which one gets by effort; it therefore usually suggests compensation. "The high repute Which he through hazard huge must earn" (Milton).

Ana. Fetch, *bring: extract, elicit, extort, *educer, evoke: *receive, accept: seize, *take, grasp, grab, clutch: effect, accomplish, achieve (see PERFORM): *incur, contract, catch.

Con. *Forgo, eschew, abnegate, sacrifice, forbear.

2 Beget, procreate, sire, *generate, engender, breed, propagate, reproduce.

Ana. See those at BEGET.

ghastly. Ghastly, grisly, gruesome (or growsome), macabre, grim, lurid come into comparison only when they mean horrifying and repellent in appearance or aspect. Ghastly suggests the terrifying aspects of death or bloodshed; as, his ghastly paleness; "Death Grinned horrible a ghastly smile" (Milton); "the image of a hideous—of a ghastly thing—of the gallows!" (Poe). The term is often currently used as a strong intensive for hideous, horrifying; as, the growing conviction that the defeat was the result of a ghastly and unnecessary blunder. Grisly, or in modern usage more commonly gruesome, implies an appearance that inspires shuddering or uncanny horror; as, "So spake the grisly Terror" (Milton); "See the grisly texture grow, ('Tis of human entrails made)" (Gray); "Look down, and see a grisly sight; A vault where the bodies are buried upright!" (Wordsworth); the gruesome details of a murder; many readers find Keats's Isabella too gruesome for enjoyment. In current English, grisly (sometimes as a variant of, but often by confusion with, grizzly) occasionally suggests grayness and unkemptness rather than horribleness; as, "the grisly old man at the helm, carrying his craft with strange skill through the turmoil of waters" (Kinglelake). Macabre (taken from the French phrase danse macabre, or dance of death, a dance in which Death, the leader, is often represented, as in a painting, as a skeleton drawing living persons or other skeletons to the grave) is used in place of gruesome when one wishes to imply preoccupation with the horrors of death; as, a macabre painting; a macabre tale. Grim suggests a fierce and forbidding aspect; as, "So should a murderer look, so dead, so grim" (Shak); "with countenance grim Glared on him passing" (Milton). Lurid comes into comparison with ghastly as referring to light or color; it suggests either a ghastly pallor or coloring reminiscent of death (as, "Death... pale as yonder wan and horned moon, With lips of lurid blue"—Shelley) or more frequently, in modern usage, a sinister and murky glow; as, "He caught the color of what was passing about him but mixed with a lurid and portentous hue" (N Hawthorne); "No lurid fire of hell or human passion illumines their scenes" (C. W. Eliot). In still looser but even commoner use, lurid differs little from gruesome except, possibly, in its stronger suggestion of sensationalism; as, reporters who like to give all the lurid details of a catastrophe; the detective story may be described as lurid rather than as mysterious.

Ana. Deathly, *deadly: frightful, horrible, horrific, dreadful, *fearful, appalling: repellent, *repugnant: repulsive, revolting, loathsome, *offensive.

ghost. Spirit, specter, shade, *apparition, phantasm, phantom, wraith, fetch, revenant, spook, haunt.

giant, adj. Gigantic, gigantean, colossal, *enormous, huge, mammoth, elephantine, titanic, herculean, immense, vast, Cyclopean, Antaeon, Gargantuan, Brobdingnagian.

gib. Variant of JIB.

gibber, v. Prate, chatter, *chat, gab, patter, prattle, babble, gabble, jabber.

gibberish. Gibberish, mummery, hocus-pocus, abracadabra are compared here as terms of contempt applied to that which is in itself unintelligible or is meaningless to the person concerned. They are often used interchangeably without justification, for they are not synonyms. Gibberish always suggests language. It is applied, however, to inarticulate but expressive sounds or attempts at speech; as, a baby's or a monkey's gibberish. When applied to articulate but incoherent utterance it usually implies a low-grade or disordered intelligence in the speaker. It often means little more than jargon. One or more of these implications is carried over when the word is used to express contempt. "I have often warn'd you not to talk the court gibberish to me" (Fielding). Mummery, on the other hand, does not suggest language, but actions uninterpreted by words, as in the old dumb shows. As a term of derogation, however, it is applied chiefly to rites, proceedings, and the like, which, whether or not accompanied by words, appear theatrical and ridiculous, as well as meaningless, to the observer. "Nigel felt, and indeed exhibited, some disgust at this mummery [ceremony of his acceptance as a resident of Whitefriars]" (Scott). Hocus-pocus always suggests jugglery and incantations. Sometimes, in its extended use, the stress is placed upon tricks intended to mystify or confuse, sometimes upon empty but impressive-sounding words. In either case there is the suggestion of conscious attempts to bewilder and mislead. "I'd rip their [hypocritical preachers'] rotten, hollow hearts, An' tell aloud their jugglin, hocus-pocus arts To cheat the crowd!" (Burns). Abracadabra was originally applied to a mystical figure, an inverted triangle, used as an amulet and formed by repetitions of the word abracadabra minus one letter at each successive line until only a was left. Abracadabra in figurative use is applied chiefly to discourse and implies not only its unintelligibility and formulism, but its complete unfitness for the ends it proposes to achieve. "Psychology is either true knowledge concerning the spiritual nature of man or it is moonshine and abracadabra" (J. M. Murry).

gibe¹ or jibe, v. *Scoff, jeer, sneer, flout, gird, fleer.

Ana. *Ridicule, deride, mock, taunt, twit, rally.

gibe.² Variant of JIBE.

gift, n. 1 Gift, present, gratuity, favor (or favour), boon, largess (or largesse), fairing come into comparison when they denote something (often a thing of value, but not necessarily a material thing) given freely to another for his benefit or pleasure. Gift is the most inclusive term but it is not interchangeable with some of the others, for, in itself, apart from the context, the term carries no hint of remuneration for something done or received and excludes all suggestion of return; as, a birthday gift; a gift to a museum; gifts to the poor; to fear the Greeks bearing gifts; "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above" (James i. 17). Present is ordinarily applied to something tangible which is offered as a compliment or expression of good will; as, "She used to define a present, 'That it was a gift to a friend of something he wanted or was fond of, and which could not be easily gotten for money'" (Swift); "Flowers and fruits are always fit presents" (Emerson); "Little odd presents of game, fruits, perhaps wine" (Lamb). Gratuity implies voluntary compensation (usually in money) for some service for which there is no fixed charge or for special attention or service over and beyond that which is normally included in a charge, such as a tip to a porter or a fee to a stewardess; he distributed gratuities so generously that he received more attention than any other guest of the hotel. Favor (see also FAVOR, 1) applies to anything given or granted to another as a token of one's affection, regard, or partiality, or as an indulgence or concession. The term is often intentionally vague, especially when that which is given is not a concrete thing; as, he said he did not deserve so many favours from his party. "Queen's favours might be fatal gifts, but they were much more fatal to reject than to accept" (H. Adams). Concretely, the term applies to various small things, such as a ribbon, a cockade, a lady's glove, or the like, given to a lover or admirer as a token, or some knickknack or other trifle, given to guests at a wedding, a cotillion, or the like. Favor, rather than gift, is used commonly in requests for anything that can be had only from the person addressed; as, to ask the favor of one's presence at a reception; "begging the favour of a Copy of his Beautiful Book" (Meredith). Boon applies to any gift or favor either as petitioned for or prayed for as something much desired or needed, yet not necessarily regarded as a right (as, "High emperor, upon my feeble knee I beg this boon, with tears not lightly shed"—Shak.; "If you mean to please any people, you must give them the boon which they ask"—Burke; "I ask justice from you, and no boon"—Sheridan) or as given gratuitously and bringing with it such benefits or advantages that it is regarded as a blessing or cause for gratitude (as, our forefathers have given us the boon of freedom; "The boon of free and unbought justice was a boon for all"—J. R. Green; "Corinth was given certain boons, since it was a Julian colony, but Athens... was left to academic decay"—Buchan). Largess is a grandiloquent term for a bountiful gift, especially of money or of food and drink, or a liberal gratuity; it usually suggests an ostentatious bestowal; as, the newly consecrated king bestowed largesses on all the heralds and minstrels; "contrasting his [Antony's] meagre bounty with the largesse of Octavius"—(Buchan). Fairing, originally applied to a gift bought at a fair and later to any gift or present, now occurs rarely, although it was common up to the nineteenth century. "Colin... gives her a fairing to put in her hair" (Goldsmith).

Alms. *Donation, benefaction, contribution, alms.

2 Gift, faculty, aptitude, genius, talent, knack, bent, turn come into comparison when they mean a special ability or a capacity for a definite kind of activity, achievement, or the like. Gift applies not only to an ability but also to a quality; it always suggests an origin not easily explainable by natural laws and often implies that the recipient is favored by God, by nature, or by fortune. It is, therefore, precisely applied to any innate ability, capacity, or quality, especially to one not commonly found in men or not possible of acquirement; as, a gift of humor; "she has a real gift for arranging flowers" (E. Wharton). "Men have always revered prodigious inborn gifts, and always will" (C. W. Eliot). "An artist is the sort of artist he is, because he happens to possess certain gifts" (A. Huxley). Faculty, as here considered (see also POWER, 2), applies to both innate and acquired abilities or capacities; it does not in itself apart from the context impute an extraordinary value to that power, but it does usually imply distinction or distinctiveness in its quality and skill or facility in its exercise. "He had not that faculty of extracting the essence from a heap of statements" (Dickens). "She seemed to have lost her faculty of discrimination; her power of easily and graciously keeping everyone in his proper place" (Cather). Aptitude usually implies a natural liking and taste for some particular activity or pursuit as well as a native capacity for it and the ability to master its details or technique. "There are all sorts of people today who write from all sorts of motives other than a genuine aptitude for writing" (H. Ellis). "At fourteen education should begin to be more or less specialized, according to the tastes and aptitudes of the pupil" (B. Russell). Genius, when it applies to the ability or capacity, rather than to the person who possesses that ability or capacity, always suggests an inborn gift of an exalted character, or more often, a combination of such gifts. Further than this the implications of the term are various and shifting, for the word is tied up in use with psychological, aesthetic, and critical explanations of the nature of genius. Thus, during the age of romanticism, originality and creative energy working without reference to rule or law were its chief connotations; in modern times these connotations have been weakened as the result of a prevalent conception of genius as "an infinite capacity for taking pains." However, the word often retains its etymological implication of a controlling spirit, and in discriminating use usually denotes an inner driving energy (often thought of as an indwelling spirit or other self) which compels utterance or performance, often, but far from invariably, of a lofty or transcendent quality. "Carlyle is one [of the writers having a distinctive style]—who take no care to put listeners at their ease, but rely rather on native force of genius to shock and astound" (Quiller-Couch). "That effortless and unconscious victory over Death, which is the ultimate interest of her writing, was the outcome of a genius she [Madame de Sévigné] never knew she possessed" (L. P. Smith). The word is often employed in current English in the sense of gift, usually with a connotation of transcendence or of uniqueness; as, "she made her drawing-room a sort of meeting-place; she had a genius for it" (V. Woolf). "Mr. G. K. Chesterton has a genius for saying new and surprising things about old subjects" (A. Huxley). In humorous use, the connotation of transcendence is especially strong, but that of supreme unawareness is also usually evident; as, he has a genius for ineptness of remark; "the genius for illogicality of the English people" (Inge). Talent comes very close in its meaning to gift when the latter term denotes a native capacity or an innate ability. Talent, however, carries the implication, derived from the Scriptural parable of the servants' use of the talents (pieces of money) entrusted them by their master (Matthew xxv. 14–30), that the gift is a trust, and that its possessor is required to develop it and put it to profitable use. "It is quite probable that many... who would make the best doctors are too poor to take the course. This involves a deplorable waste of talent" (B. Russell). "Was he to leave such talents lying idle (and that after chafing for eight years to employ them)?" (Belloc). This basic implication in talent led inevitably to another implication: that the gift is under the control of its possessor because its proper exercise depends on industry and the acquirement of necessary knowledge and skill. When the romantic conception of genius became prevalent toward the end of the eighteenth century, the two words were commonly opposed, genius then denoting great creative ability, beyond the power of its possessor to control or to exercise at will, yet magnificent in its results, and talent, a lesser kind of power, capable of development through study and industry, completely under the control of the will, and tending to facile, agreeable, and effective, but not exalted, performance or utterance. Although in modern psychology and aesthetics these distinctions are seldom enforced, talent, when applied to a person's ability, may be derogatory if there is an expressed or implied contrast with genius. "What Goethe did really say was 'the greatest talent,' not 'the greatest genius.' The difference is important, because, while talent gives the notion of power in a man's performance, genius gives rather the notion of felicity and perfection in it" (Arnold). "To achieve conspicuous mundane success in literature, a certain degree of good fortune is almost more important than genius, or even than talent" (A. C. Benson). Knack stresses ease and dexterity in performance, though it commonly implies an aptitude; as, "she has, certainly, something of a knack at characters" (Burney); "an uncommon knack in Latin verse" (C. W. Eliot). Bent usually implies a natural inclination or taste; it often carries the same implications as aptitude and is sometimes preferred in modern literary English, owing to the technical use of the latter word in educational psychology. "It doesn't seem to me that you've shown any great bent towards a scholastic life" (Arch. Marshall). "The bent thus revealed for precise observation and classification" (Babbitt). Turn not only implies a bent, but the actual manifestation of power, and often suggests skill or proficiency. "He had a turn for mechanics; had invented a plough in his district, had ordered wheel-barrows from England" (V. Woolf).

give, present, donate, bestow, confer, afford. Give is the general term meaning to pass over, deliver, or transmit something which becomes the receiver's to own, to use, to enjoy, or the like. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 35). "Give my love to your mother and sisters" (Keats). Present is more formal or ceremonious. "On Saturday Colonel Bellingham is going to address the lads of the Brigade and present them with six drums" (C. Mackenzie). "Pray, present my respects to Lady Scott" (Byron). Donate, found chiefly in American use, usually implies publicity attending the giving or a public cause or charity as the recipient of the gift; as, to donate a piano to an orphanage. Bestow implies the settling of something on one as a gift. "Large gifts have I bestowed on learned clerks" (Shak.). "What nature wants commodious gold bestows" (Pope). To confer is esp. to give graciously, or as a favor or honor. "The Queen confers her titles and degrees" (Pope). To afford, as here compared, is to give or bestow, esp. as a natural or legitimate consequence of the character of that which gives. "This fine day affords us some hope" (Cowper). "Do the laws of his country afford him a remedy?" (Ch. Just. Marshall).

glabrous. Glossy, *sleek, slick, velvety, silken, silky, satiny.

glacial. Arctic, icy, gelid, frigid, freezing, *cold, frosty, cool, chilly.

glad. Glad, happy, cheerful, lighthearted, joyful, joyous come into comparison as meaning characterized by or expressing the mood, temper, or state of mind of a person who is pleased or delighted with something or with things in general. Glad is capable of being used (as opposed to sorry) in polite conventional expressions of pleasure or gratification; as, I am glad to hear of your recovery; I shall be glad to have the opportunity to meet you. In richer use, however, it implies opposition to sad, and connotes actual delight and a lift of spirits, if not always elation; as, "Wine that maketh glad the heart of man" (Psalms civ. 15); "Glad did I live and gladly die" (Stevenson); "A child's kiss Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad" (E. B. Browning). Happy may also be used in polite conventional phrases in which its content can hardly be distinguished from that of glad. In precise and meaningful use, however, it distinctively implies a sense of contentment and well-being or a realization either of one's good fortune or of the fulfillment of one's desires; as, he will never be happy until he finds work which utilizes all his talents. "With the tension of an unachieved task no longer felt... I can say with truth that the last phase of my life has been the happiest" (H. Ellis). Cheerful suggests a strong and, often, a spontaneous flow of good spirits, either as a result of feeling glad or happy or as a result of an equable disposition or of a naturally sanguine temperament. "Cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity" (Addison). "Suicidal thoughts... could not enter the cheerful, sanguine, courageous scheme of life, which was in part natural to her and in part slowly built up" (H. Ellis). Lighthearted stresses freedom from care, worry, and discontent. Since it also implies high spirits, vivacity, or gaiety, it commonly suggests in addition youth or an easygoing and somewhat volatile temperament. "He whistles as he goes, light-hearted wretch, Cold and yet cheerful" (Cowper). "Why, man, I was light-hearted in my prime, I am light-hearted now; what would you have?" (Browning). Joyful and joyous imply keen gladness or happiness with resulting elation; they are often used as though they were equivalent terms. Among highly discriminating writers, however, joyful usually suggests a mood or an emotional reaction to an event or situation and it implies rejoicing; as, "in the day of prosperity be joyful" (Ecclesiastes vii. 14); "And joyful nations join in leagues of peace" (Pope); a joyful countenance. Joyous, on the other hand, applies more to that which by its nature or character is filled with joy or is a cause of joy. "All that ever was joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy music doth surpass" (Shelley). "The happy and joyous temper, which characterises a fresh and confident faith" (Inge). Ana. Pleased, delighted, gratified, tickled, rejoiced (see PLEASE): *elated, elate, exultant: blithe, jocund, *merry, jolly, jovial: gleeful, mirthful, hilarious (see corresponding nouns at MIRTH).

go. 1 Go, leave, depart, quit, withdraw, retire, scam, clear out, clear off are synonymous when they mean to move out of or away from the place where one is. Of these terms, go is the most general and the least explicit in its implications: it often is used merely as the opposite of come; as, he came here yesterday and went this morning before I was up; "Go, baffled coward, lest I run upon thee" (Millon); he would not let her go before he had obtained her promise to sell him the property. Leave (see also RELINQUISH; LET, 2) so strongly implies a separation from someone or something that the verb in this sense is more often used transitively than intransitively; in its intransitive use, the term commonly implies a more formal or a more conspicuous act than go implies and often but not invariably requires a statement of the means of locomotion; as, he plans to leave by the noon train; we shall be sorry to have him leave (or leave us); do not leave the place until I return; her servants always leave (or leave her) after a few days in her employ. Depart (as here considered: see also SWERVE) is rarely transitive except in a few idiomatic phrases (such as, to depart this life, i.e., to die): as an intransitive verb it not only carries a far stronger implication of separation from a person, place, or status than leave carries, but it is somewhat more formal, or at least less colloquial, especially when it is used as the opposite of arrive; as, to depart for a trip to Europe; "You will not leave me yet, Richard?"... He had no thought of departing" (Meredith); "A goddess of gone days, Departed long ago" (Millay). Quit (see also STOP, 1; BEHAVE, 1), like leave, is more often a transitive than an intransitive verb and carries a strong implication of separation from a person or thing. Unlike leave, however, it stresses a getting free or being rid of that which holds, entangles, burdens, or the like; as, "The distinction [knighthood]... had given him a disgust to his business, and to his residence in a small market town; and, quitting them both, he had removed with his family to... Lucas Lodge" (Austen); "He quitted London to take refuge among the mountains" (Meredith); "I was at a show only last week when there was such a tremble [of the walls] that every one quit" (Lucas). Withdraw (for transitive senses see REMOVE, 2), which is a literary rather than a colloquial term, stresses, far more than quit, a deliberate removal for reasons that seem justifiable to the person concerned or more acceptable to the reader; the term therefore seldom, if ever, carries, as quit often carries, a suggestion of cowardice, weakness, or instability (thus, one quits a trying job, but one withdraws from an insecure position), and frequently implies a motive such as courtesy, a sense of propriety, a grievance, or the like; as, the women withdrew from the room when the men were ready to discuss business; the visitors withdrew when the doctor entered; "the perfect lyric is a poem from which the author has withdrawn once he has set it in motion" (Day Lewis); "a hermit withdrawn from a wicked world" (Conrad). Retire is often used interchangeably with withdraw, but it is the preferred term when the removal also implies a renunciation, a relinquishing of a position for good, a retreat, a recession, a recoil, or the like; as, to retire from the world into a monastery; "When he dies or retires, a new manager must be found" (Shaw); "After the Captain's terrible fall... which broke him so that he could no longer build railroads, he and his wife retired to the house on the hill" (Cather). Often retire carries the specific sense of to withdraw to one's bedroom and to one's bed for the night; as, to retire early. Scram (a slang term) and clear out or clear off (colloquial terms) imply a leaving in haste and usually in fear or under compulsion; as, the boys scrammed when they heard the policeman's step; he ordered all the intruders to clear out.

Ana. *Escape, decamp, abscond, flee, fly.

Ant. Come. — Con. Arrive (see COME): *stay, remain, abide.

2 *Resort, refer, apply, turn.

Con. Avoid, shun, elude, evade, *escape.

Ana. Atheistic, agnostic, infidel (see corresponding nouns at ATHEIST).

Godspeed. Farewell, *good-by, adieu, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, bon voyage, adios.

good, adj. Good, right come into comparison only in the most general of their senses, when they mean in accordance with one's standard of what is satisfactory. Good (as opposed to bad) implies full approval or commendation of someone or something in the respect under consideration, such as excellence of workmanship, excellence of condition, beneficial properties, competence, agreeableness, purity, freshness, etc. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (Genesis i. 31); good food; a very good light; foods good for the teeth; it is a good book for children; good news; a good neighbor. Good (as opposed to poor) does not imply hearty approval, but it does not suggest dissatisfaction; it implies that the person or thing so described measures up to a point which is regarded as satisfactory, or possesses the qualities necessary to a thing of its kind; as, a good crop; good soil; good, but not excellent, work; the business for the past year was good; a good return on an investment; a good play. "Our ideas of a good time aren't the same, and never will be" (R. Macaulay). "Between good workmanship and design and that touch of rareness which makes not merely good but fine and lovely" (S. Alexander). Oftentimes, the difference in meaning between these two senses of good is apparent only in the inflection or through the medium of a context. Right (see also CORRECT) often implies that the thing so described is fitting, proper, appropriate, or the like, with respect to the circumstances; thus, a book one knows to be good may not be the right book to give to a person who is unable to understand it; the right light for a picture may be quite different from a good light for reading; so, she always does the right thing at the right time. "The scene in Julius Caesar is right because the object of our attention is not the speech of Antony... but the effect of his speech upon the mob" (T. S. Eliot). Right may also imply the absence of anything wrong in the person or thing so described. "God's in his heaven— All's right with the world!" (Browning). "She didn't think he was quite right [that is, mentally sound]" (C. Morley).

Ant. Bad: poor.

good-by or good-bye. Good-by (or good-bye), farewell, Godspeed, adieu, adios, au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, bon voyage are the forms of address in conventional good use at parting or leave-taking. Only good-by is frequent in colloquial use; it is the ordinary phrase used by everybody and, except in very discriminating use, without reference to the phrase of which it is historically the contraction, "God be with ye." Farewell is now chiefly in literary or elevated use; etymologically, it expresses the wish of one left behind ("fare [thee] well") for the well-being of one who departs from home or host. This implication is not always carried by farewell; it is, however, pretty generally maintained in Godspeed (literally, "God speed you, or make you fare well"), for that is a conventional form of farewell restricted to those going away. Adieu, though still sometimes retaining its French pronunciation and often its French plural, is thoroughly naturalized in literary English. Literally a commendation to God (à Dieu), it, like good-by, seldom conveys its original significance. Adios, its unnaturalized Spanish equivalent, is not uncommon in the Southwestern states of the United States. Au revoir (French for "till I see you again") and its German equivalent auf Wiedersehen, are frequent in written English and are often preferred in speech where the wish to renew or extend the acquaintance or the expectation of another meeting is to be expressed. Bon voyage (French for "good journey"), like Godspeed, is reserved for a farewell to one departing, but unlike the latter term, it implies usually a wish for a pleasant trip, especially one over water or across an ocean.

good humor. *Good nature, good temper.

Ana. Geniality, sociableness, affability, graciousness, cordiality (see corresponding adjectives at GRACIOUS).

good-looking. Comely, pretty, bonny, fair, beauteous, pulchritudinous, handsome, *beautiful, lovely.

Ana. Attractive, alluring, taking, charming (see under ATTRACT): pleasing, *pleasant, agreeable.

good nature. Good nature, good humor, good temper are not always clearly distinguished when they denote an agreeable temperament. Good nature implies a disposition, usually a natural and inborn rather than an acquired disposition, to please and be pleased; often, but far from invariably, the term is used depreciatively to imply undue compliance with the wishes of others; as, "...their good nature, for they would have been glad to do any little service, such as lend a time-table or impart useful information" (V. Woolf); his good nature is the reason he is so often imposed upon. Good humor implies a mood of ease and cheerfulness, especially as displayed in one's demeanor or in social intercourse; good temper differs from good humor not only in denoting the habit of mind of one not easily ruffled or provoked but in its lack of implication of qualities such as geniality or sociableness. "He had blue eyes, and an expression of boyish good-humor, which, however, did not convey any assurance of good temper" (Shaw).

Ana. Amiability, complaisance, obligingness (see corresponding adjectives at AMIABLE): kindness, kindness (see corresponding adjectives at KIND).

good-natured. *Amiable, obliging, complaisant.

Ana. Compliant, acquiescent: *kindly, kind: altruistic, benevolent, *charitable.

Ant. Contrary. — Con. Cross, cranky, touchy, techy, *irascible, choleric, splenetic: glum, morose, gloomy, *sullen, surly, crabbed.

goodness. Goodness, virtue, rectitude, morality are the most general terms in English denoting moral excellence. Goodness is the most homely of these terms: it suggests an excellence so deeply established that it is often thought of as inherent or innate rather than acquired or instilled. Of all these terms it is the only one applied to God; as, "The Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth" (Exodus xxxiv. 6). When applied to persons, it usually suggests appealing qualities such as kindness, generosity, helpfulness, deep sympathy, or the like; as, "the need I have of thee thine own goodness hath made" (Shak.). "Abashed the Devil stood. And felt how awful [awe-inspiring] goodness is" (Milton); "She has more goodness in her little finger than he has in his whole body" (Swift). Virtue, though often coupled with goodness as its close synonym, is distinguishable in the sense here considered (see also EXCELLENCE) as suggesting acquired rather than native moral excellence and, often, a greater consciousness of it as a possession: usually the term implies either close conformity to the moral law or persistent choice of that which is good and the persistent rejection of that which is evil; as, virtue is its own reward; "Virtue may be assailed, but never hurt, Surprised by unjust force, but not enthralled" (Milton); "The highest proof of virtue is to possess boundless power without abusing it" (Macaulay). Goodness and virtue also come into comparison in the sense of the characteristic and intrinsic power or property of a thing. Since virtue often specifically implies chastity or fidelity in marriage, rectitude is frequently employed in its place when moral excellence acquired through obedience to the moral law and self-discipline is implied. But the term differs from virtue in often having reference to motives, intentions, and habits and not merely to character, and sometimes also in placing greater stress on uprightness, integrity, probity, and similar stern qualities; as, no one can question the rectitude of his purpose; "for various reasons all having to do with the delicate rectitude of his nature, Roderick Anthony... was frightened" (Conrad). "Society is, after all, a recreation and a delight, and ought to be sought for with pleasurable motives, not with a consciousness of rectitude and justice" (A. C. Benson). All of the preceding words refer directly or indirectly to the moral excellence involved in character. Morality, too, may imply such excellence and therefore come close to virtue (both in its general and specific sense) and rectitude (as, he cared much for power and influence and little for morality): in this sense the term often specifically suggests a moral excellence that arises from fidelity to ethical principles as distinguished from that which arises from obedience to the divine law or the moral laws enforced by religious teachings (as, "Evil must come upon us headlong, if morality tries to get on without religion"—Tennyson). Often, however, morality refers not to character but rather to the principles touching morals or ethics as involved in a book, a work of art, a practice, a law, or the like: in such use the term means either moral excellence or trustworthiness derived from adherence to the principles accepted by the Church, the body of people, the virtuous men of the day and age, or the like, or moral influence as exerted by a thing; as, the morality of Flaubert's Madame Bovary was questioned soon after the book's publication.

Ana. Righteousness, nobility, virtuousness (see corresponding adjectives at MORAL): *honesty, integrity, probity, honor.

Ant. Badness, evil.

good sense. See SENSE, n., 2.

good temper. Good humor, *good nature.

Ant. Ill temper. — Con. *Acrimony, asperity, acerbity: ill will, malignity, spite, malevolence, *malice.

good will. 1 *Favor, countenance.

Ana. Friendliness, neighborliness, amicability (see corresponding adjectives at AMICABLE): *attachment, affection, love: respect, esteem, admiration, *regard.

Ant. Ill will. — Con. Malevolence, malignity, spite, *malice.

2 *Friendship, amity, comity.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ant. Animosity.

gorge, v. Surfeit, *sate, glut, surcharge, cloy, pall.

gorgeous. Resplendent, *splendid, glorious, sublime, superb.

Ana. *Luxurious, sumptuous, opulent: *showy, ostentatious, pretentious.

gory. *Bloody, sanguinary, sanguine, sanguineous.

gossip, v. Gossip, blab, tattle denote in common to disclose something that one would have done better to keep to oneself. To gossip is to communicate or exchange in conversation remarks, often uncomplimentary or damaging and of questionable veracity, about the private affairs of others, especially acquaintances or neighbors; as, to gossip about the squabbles of the family next door; gossip has it that Smith makes at least fifteen thousand dollars a year. To blab is to disclose something that has been confided to one as a secret or to which one is privy. "If he sees cards and actual money passing, he will be sure to blab, and it will be all over the town in no time" (Conrad). Tattle variously is more closely akin to gossip or to blab, or combines the implications of the two. It suggests irritable and loquacious gossip, the unsolicited revelation, to one having power of discipline or punishment, of some trivial misdeed on the part of another, or blabbing gossip, as of one in a position of confidence; as, Mary always tattled to the teacher when a classmate threw a spitball. "So that no discovery . . . might be made by any tattling amongst the servants" (T. Hook).

gourmand. Glutton, gastronome, gastronomer, bon vivant, *epicure, gourmet.

gourmet. *Epicure, bon vivant, gastronome, gastronomer, gourmand, glutton.

govern. Govern, rule come into comparison when they mean to exercise power or authority in controlling or directing another or others, often specifically those persons who comprise a state or nation. Govern (etymologically, to steer as a pilot) may imply any kind of power, despotic or constitutional, or any kind of authority, assumed by force, acquired by inheritance or through election, or granted by due processes of law, but it usually connotes as its end the keeping of those (or of that) directed or controlled in a straight course or in smooth operation, where perils are avoided and the good of the individual or of the whole is achieved; as, parents who cannot govern their children; "The right divine of kings to govern wrong" (Pope); to govern one's emotions. "Every prince should govern as he would desire to be governed if he were a subject" (Temple). "The [Roman] Senate was more than a modern constitutional monarch, reigning and not governing, it had a substantial amount of governing to its share" (Buchan). "As Matthew Arnold pointed out . . . educated mankind is governed by two passions—one the passion for pure knowledge, the other the passion for being of service or doing good" (C. IV. Eliot). Rule (etymologically, to regulate) was not in early use always as clearly distinguished from govern as it is in current good use; as, "Fit to govern and to rule multitudes" (Shak.). Now it often implies the power to lay down the laws which shall determine the action of others or to issue commands which must be obeyed: since the term commonly suggests the exercise of despotic or arbitrary power, it is not used of the person or body that exercises authority over the people in a democracy, or republic, or other constitutional state; thus, "resolved to ruin or to rule the state" (Dryden); dictators rule the German, Italian, and Russian peoples. "It's damnable to have to hurt the people we love—but, after all, we can't let our parents rule our lives" (R. Macaulay). "Are you, sir, the person who serves here?"

asked a stranger of a minister whom he met in the streets of Rowley. 'I am, sir, the person who rules here,' was the swift and apt response" (A. Repplier).

Ana. *Execute, administer: *conduct, direct, control, manage: *restrain, curb, inhibit.

government. Government, administration, usually preceded by the, denote in common the persons authorized to administer the laws of a country. Government may bear either of two connotations: it may consider these persons abstractly, as anonymous agents vested with certain broad powers by the constitution; as, only the government may coin money; or it may place emphasis on the persons who happen to hold office at a given time, particularly on the personal or partisan nature of their specific interpretation and application of the broad powers granted by the constitution. Administration is interchangeable with government when both bear this latter connotation; administration is the commoner term in the United States (where it usually refers to the President and his cabinet), government in Great Britain (where it usually refers to the ministry); as, the Coolidge administration, the Baldwin government; a Republican administration, a Liberal government. In British usage government and administration are commonly followed by a plural verb. "The Government are not prepared to adopt the course suggested" (The Times). "As his Majesty's present administration are not immortal, their successors may be inclined to attempt to undo what the present ministers shall have attempted to perform" (Burke).

grab, v. Grasp, clutch, *take, seize, snatch.

Ana. *Catch, capture, nab, cop.

grace, n. 1 *Mercy, clemency, lenity, charity.

Ana. Kindliness, kindness, benignity, benignancy (see corresponding adjectives at KIND): *favor, good will, countenance: tenderness, compassionateness, responsiveness (see corresponding adjectives at TENDER): indulgence, forbearance, leniency (see under FORBEARING).

2 *Elegance, dignity.

Ana. Loveliness, beautifulness or beauty, fairness, comeliness (see corresponding adjectives at BEAUTIFUL): suppleness, litheness, lithesomeness, lissomeness (see corresponding adjectives at LIMBER): attractiveness, alluringness or allurement, charmingness or charm (see corresponding adjectives under ATTRACT).

gracious. Gracious, cordial, affable, genial, sociable are used to describe persons (or by extension, their words or acts) who are markedly pleasant and at ease in social intercourse. Gracious implies kindness and courtesy, especially (but not necessarily) to inferiors. When it carries the latter implication, it more often suggests benignity than condescension. "Gracious to everyone, but known to a very few" (Cather). "Heartened by her gracious reception of a nervous bow" (Shaw). Cordial stresses warmth and heartiness; as, a cordial welcome; a cordial handclasp; to be on cordial terms. Affable implies approachability and readiness to talk in the person conversed with or addressed; when applied to a social superior it sometimes connotes condescending familiarity, but more often a gracious willingness to be friendly. "I don't find . . . that his wealth has made him arrogant and inaccessible; on the contrary, he takes great pains to appear affable and gracious" (Smollett). "His father was an excellent man . . . 'his son will be just like him—just as affable to the poor'" (Austen). Genial sometimes, especially in loose use, emphasizes cheerfulness and even joviality. In very precise use and in the sense here considered genial stresses qualities that make for good cheer among companions, such as warm human sympathy, a fine sense of humor; as, a genial host. "He was no fanatic and no ascetic. He was genial, social, even convivial" (G. Smith). Sociable, which is felt to be more colloquial than the others, implies a genuine liking for the companionship of others and readiness to engage in social intercourse even with strangers or inferiors. "His father's sociability gave a basis for Joyce's wide and miscellaneous acquaintanceship" (P. Colum).

Ana. Obliging, complaisant, *amiable: benignant, benign, kindly, *kind: courteous, courtly, chivalrous (see CRVIL).

Ant. Ungracious. — Con. Churlish, boorish (see under BOOR): brusque, crust, crusty, blunt, gruff (see BLUFF): surly, crabbed, *sullen.

grade, n. Gradient, incline, *slant, inclination, slope, acclivity, declivity.

gradient. Grade, incline, *slant, inclination, slope, acclivity, declivity.

grand, adj. Grand, magnificent, imposing, stately, majestic, august, noble, grandiose come into comparison when they mean large, handsome, dignified, and impressive. They vary somewhat in the emphasis which they respectively place on these qualities, and they differ somewhat also in their additional implications and connotations. Grand emphasizes magnitude or greatness of dimensions; often, however, it is not physical largeness that is implied, but a kind of spiritual, intellectual, or aesthetic greatness that makes the thing so described pre-eminent among its kind. It is distinguishable, however, from all other words meaning very large such as big, huge, and colossal, by its implications of handsomeness, dignity, and impressiveness; as, the grand view from the summit; the grandest of Gothic cathedrals; a grand production of Parsifal. "The grand style arises in poetry, when a noble nature, poetically gifted, treats with simplicity or with severity a serious subject" (Arnold). "The castle was considered grand by the illiterate; but architects...condemned it as a nondescript mixture of styles in the worst possible taste" (Shaw). Magnificent also may or may not imply actual physical largeness, but it always suggests an impressive largeness proportionate to the thing's scale, without sacrifice of dignity or violation of the canons of good taste. The term was originally applied to certain rulers, notable for their great deeds, the sumptuousness of their way of living, the munificence of their gifts, or the like; as, Lorenzo de' Medici was known as Lorenzo the Magnificent. In current English, it is often applied to ways of living or to the things that contribute to a sumptuous and handsome way of living, such as houses, furnishings, clothes, jewels, and the like. "The drawing-room, which was a truly magnificent apartment" (Bennett). It is also applicable to many things which at one end of a scale with numerous gradations may be described as plain or insignificant and at the other, as magnificent; as, magnificent clothes; a magnificent theme; "so ostentatiously magnificent a name as Gabriele d'Annunzio" (H. Ellis); a magnificent performance of Hamlet. "Much of Dryden's unique merit consists in his ability to make...the prosaic into the poetic, the trivial into the magnificent" (T. S. Eliot). Imposing stresses impressiveness because of size and dignity or sometimes because of magnificence. "Though tall and heavily built, he was not imposing like Moxon-Hughes" (C. Mackenzie). "It is between the town and the suburb, that midway habitation which fringes every American city, and which is imposing or squalid according to the incomes of suburbanites" (A. Repplier). Stately usually emphasizes dignity but there is an almost equal stress placed on handsomeness and impressiveness, and there is often an implication of larger than usual size; as, stately ships under full sail; "Stately dames like queens attended" (Longfellow); "solid and stately furniture" (Bennett). "I like to think of the obscure and yet dignified lives that have been lived in these quaint and stately chambers" (A. C. Benson). Majestic combines the implications of imposing and stately, but it adds a strong connotation of solemn grandeur. Consequently, it is applicable not only to persons, to buildings, interiors, furniture, and the like, but also to intangible things or to things that produce an aesthetic effect. "Both [Goethe and Schiller in appearance] are majestic; but one has the majesty of repose, the other of conflict" (G. H. Lewes). "Twilight combined with the scenery of Egdon Heath to evolve a thing majestic without severity, impressive without showiness" (Hardy). "The full moon shone high in the blue vault, majestic, lonely, benign" (Cather). August implies impressiveness so strongly as to impute to the thing so described a power to inspire awe, veneration, or, in humorous use, abashment and dread. But it also ascribes a lofty or exalted character to that which it qualifies. "So glorious is our nature, so august" (Browning). "How can you look round at these august hills, look up at this divine sky...and then talk like a literary hack...?" (Shaw). "No assemblage of academic duennas, however august" (C. E. Montague). Noble (as here compared: see also MORAL) carries no suggestion of a moral quality or of a social status; rather it implies a commanding grandeur, or the power to impress the imagination, emotions, or the intellect as incomparably great or excellent. "Now see that noble and most sovereign reason, Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh" (Shak). "The Vandals of our isle... Have burnt to dust a nobler pile Than ever Roman saw!" (Cowper). Grandiose is sometimes distinguished from grand, magnificent, imposing and, less often, from the other words of this group, in implying an almost preposterous pretentiousness or pomposity (as, "the grandiose manner of the stage"—Irving; a grandiose project, impossible of fulfillment with the resources at hand), but it is equally often used by good writers and speakers without derogation to imply a more than usual largeness of plan or scope or a grandeur or majesty exceeding that of life or experience; as, "Things painted by a Rubens... All better, all more grandiose than the life" (Browning); "they [proposed new religions] yet tend to make us forget what more grandiose, noble, or beautiful character properly belongs to religious constructions" (Arnold); "[Antony] had inherited Julius's plans for a Parthian campaign, and this grandiose dream was always at the back of his mind" (Buchan).

Ana. Sumptuous, *luxurious, opulent: sublime, superb, *splendid, gorgeous: monumental, tremendous, stupendous, prodigious (see MONSTROUS).

Con. *Petty, puny, paltry, trivial, trifling, measly.

grandiose. Imposing, stately, *grand, august, magnificent, majestic, noble.

Ana. Ostentatious, pompous, pretentious, *showy: grandiloquent, magniloquent, *rhetorical.

grant, v. 1 Grant, concede, vouchsafe, accord, award denote in common to give as a favor or as a right. One grants, usually to an inferior or a subordinate, as an act of justice or indulgence, that which is requested or demanded (sometimes implicitly rather than explicitly) or the request or demand itself; as, the governor granted the condemned man a week's respite; he begged the Lord to grant him his prayer. "Any political rights which the dominant race might...withhold or grant at their pleasure" (Ch. Just. Taney). One concedes something claimed or expected as a right, prerogative, or possession, when one yields it with reluctance and, usually, in response to some compelling force in the claim or the claimant. "If we mean to conciliate and concede, let us see of what nature the concession ought to be" (Burke). "As an instrument of mind-training, and even of liberal education, it [science] seems to me to have a far higher value than is usually conceded to it by humanists" (Inge). One vouchsafes something prayed for, begged for, or, in looser use, expected as a courtesy, when one grants it to a person beneath one in dignity or station. It is often found in supplications where it implies humility in the suppliant. "Vouchsafe, O Lord: to keep us this day without sin" (Bk. of Com. Prayer). In modern use, it is often ironical, usually suggesting absurd condescension; as, he vouchsafed no reply to our question. One accords to another that which is admittedly his due or in keeping with his character or status. "He treated bishops with the superficial deference that a sergeant-major accords to a junior subaltern" (C. Mackenzie). "Children...will readily accord to others what others accord to them" (B. Russell). One awards something that is deserved or merited; the word usually implies determination by legal adjudication or by judges in a contest or competition; as, the plaintiff was awarded heavy damages; to award a prize for the best story. "His [Tiberius's] victory was duly acclaimed by Senate and People; he was given the title of Imperator and awarded a triumph" (Buchan). Ana. Bestow, confer, *give, present, donate: *allot, assign, apportion, allocate: cede, yield, surrender, *relinquish.

2 Grant, concede, allow come into comparison when they mean to admit something in question, especially a point or contention of one's opponent in an argument. Grant usually implies voluntary acceptance in advance of proof in order to clarify the issues or to center attention on what are regarded as the main issues; as, I grant there is no obvious motive; let us take his good will for granted. Concede implies reluctant acceptance, either before or after proofs have been advanced: it usually suggests the strength of the opponent's contention; as, he was unwilling to concede the supremacy of any group. Allow implies acceptance, but usually a somewhat qualified acceptance; it often suggests admission on the ground of apparent truth, logical validity, reasonableness, or the like. "Even Wickham had allowed him merit as a brother" (Austen). "We need not wait for this final reconciliation [of science and religion] to allow...that science...is working in the service of one of the ultimate values, unified truth" (Inge).

grant, n. *Appropriation, subvention, subsidy.

Ana. *Donation, benefaction, contribution.

graph, n. *Chart, map.

Ana. Plot, scheme, design, *plan: diagram, outline, *sketch.

Ana. See those at GRAPH, n.

graphic. Graphic, vivid, picturesque, pictorial come into comparison only when they mean having or manifesting a quality or character that produces a strong, clear impression, especially a visual impression. All of these words, as here compared, apply particularly, but not exclusively, to works of art, chiefly literary art. That is graphic which has the power to evoke a strikingly clear-cut, lifelike picture; the term applies technically to the arts of painting, drawing, engraving, etching, and the like (the graphic arts), the object of each of which is to present a picture, but it is also definitely applied to any representation of things, especially in words; as, "A graphic description of the face of a young Hindoo at the sight of castor oil" (Darwin). That is vivid which is so vigorously alive that it is felt, seen, heard, or otherwise apprehended with a sense of its intense reality. The term may apply to that which actually exists and impresses itself with such sharp force on the imagination that the memory retains the sight, sound, or other impression; as, a vivid sensation of fear; "he fixed his vivid eyes on Archer as he lit another cigarette" (E. Wharton). "How sights fix themselves upon the mind! For example, the vivid green moss" (V. Woolf). The term may also apply to a mental state or process of which one is oneself intensely aware (as, "Ripton awoke...to the vivid consciousness of hunger"—Meredith; "my sense of right or wrong—of individual responsibility—was more vivid than at any other period of my life"—Hudson; "those for whom the belief in immortality is most vivid"—J. W. Krutch) or which defines its content clearly and sharply (as, "a man of wide and vivid interests"—B. Russell; a vivid realization of approaching danger; "all three had kept a vivid...recollection...of what they had seen"—E. Wharton). Frequently the term applies to that which represents life or one's imaginative conceptions, such as a picture, or a play, or a story, or to the style, colors, language, situations, and the like, which are involved in such a representation: then the implication is of a power, either in the representation itself or in the means of representation, to evoke clearly defined pictures and to give a strong sense of their distinct quality and of their living force; as, "moving pictures are only less vivid than reflections from a mirror" (Justice Holmes); "In his odes, with their thunder of place-names, he [Horace] makes vivid the territorial immensity of the [Roman] empire" (Buchan). "Haydon was an acute observer, and he knew how to tell a story. How vividly, for example, he has seen this tea-party at Mrs. Siddons's, how well he has described it!" (A. Huxley). That is picturesque (still a more or less debatable term) which has, in general, the qualities or the character which one believes essential to a striking or effective picture. Although the term is applicable to a place, a person, a building or other construction, and the like (as, a picturesque costume; Scott's Meg Merrilies is a picturesque character; a picturesque ruin), as well as to a work of graphic, literary, or plastic art (as, a picturesque landscape; picturesque details), and to a style or manner as in writing or painting (as, "the picturesque force of his style"—N. Hawthorne), it carries in every use an implication that the thing has been observed and judged by one who has regard for its form, color, atmosphere, striking or unfamiliar detail, sharp contrasts, or the like, rather than for qualities which are not perceptible to the eye or that do not draw the eye because they are lacking in distinctness and charm. Around 1800, picturesque often specifically implied a kind of wild, rugged beauty associated with untouched or undisciplined nature; that implication is still not unusual; as, "Wide prospects of startling beauty, rugged mountains, steep gorges, great falls of water—all the things that are supposed to be picturesque" (A. C. Benson). Still later, the term came to imply a charm arising rather from remoteness, strangeness, quaintness, informality, diversity, or the like; as, "Though the upper part of Durnover was mainly composed of a curious congeries of barns and farmsteads, there was a less picturesque side to the parish" (Hardy); "The Square is rather picturesque, but it's such a poor, poor little thing!"

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

(Bennett); "the most picturesque Mediterranean craft, with colored sails and lazy evolutions" (Brownell). That is pictorial which does present or aims to present a vivid picture of something; thus, the pictorial arts are the same as the graphic arts, but the emphasis is upon the objective rather than upon the medium; a pictorial style of poetry uses words as though they were colors or pigments by which a vivid representation is produced.

Ana. Lucid, perspicuous, *clear: clear-cut, *incisive: telling, convincing, cogent (see VALID).

grasping. Greedy, avaricious, acquisitive, *covetous.

Ana. Rapacious, ravening, ravenous (see VORACIOUS): extorting or extortionate (see corresponding verb at EDUCE).

grateful. 1 Grateful, thankful are sometimes used with little or no distinction, for both mean feeling or expressing one's gratitude. But grateful is more commonly employed to express a proper sense of favors received from another person or other persons; as, a grateful child; a grateful recipient of charity; "the Queen herself, Grateful to Prince Gerald for service done" (Tennyson). Thankful is often employed by preference to express one's acknowledgment of divine favor, or of what is vaguely felt to be providential; as, a common grace before meat is: "For what we are about to receive, make us truly thankful." "It was really the Lord's Day, for he made his creatures happy in it, and their hearts were thankful" (Landon); "I am endlessly thankful that I was among the last persons to see the original Rheims intact" (H. Ellis).

greet. Salute, hail, *address, accost.

greeting. Greeting, salutation, salute are the general terms in English denoting the ceremonial words or acts of one who meets, welcomes, or formally addresses another. Greeting is the ordinary term which carries so slight a suggestion of formality that it is seldom if ever used when there is any clear suggestion of inferiority in the one who greets or of superiority in the one who is greeted. On the contrary, the term usually suggests friendliness, or good will, or lack of concern for social or official inequalities. "O, to what purpose dost thou hoard thy words, That thou return'st no greeting to thy friends?" (Shak.). "Why meet we on the bridge of Time to 'change one greeting and to part?" (R. F. Burton).

Salutation applies to any more or less formal phrase, gesture, or ceremonial act whereby one greets another: specifically it applies to phrases such as the conventional "How do you do" or the familiar "Hello," or to the words of a letter with which the writer first directly addresses his correspondent, or to acts such as a kiss, an embrace, a bow, or the like. Salute is the only one of these words that applies only to gestures determined by convention or to ceremonial acts: though it now seldom, if ever, applies to a speech, it may be used when to the gesture or act a word or two is added; as, to wave a salute to the friends awaiting one's arrival; the presidential salute of twenty-one guns; the officer returned his subordinate's salute. "Sir Austin bent forward, and put his lips to her forehead. Carola received the salute with the stolidity of a naughty doll" (Meredith).

gregarious. *Social, co-operative, convivial, companionable, hospitable.

Con. Comforting or comfort, solacing or solace, consolation (see corresponding verbs at COMFORT): elation, exultation (see corresponding adjectives at ELATED).

grievance. Wrong, *injustice, injury, tort.

Ana. Hardship, rigor (see DIFFICULTY): *trial, tribulation, affliction, cross.

grieve. Grieve, mourn, sorrow agree in meaning to feel or express one's sorrow or grief. Grieve implies actual mental suffering, whether it is outwardly manifested or not: the term often also connotes the concentration of one's mind on one's loss, trouble, or other cause of distress; as, after so many years, she still grieves for her dead child; "he grieved, like an honest lad, to see his comrade left to face calamity alone" (Mereditih). "My days Are passed in work, lest I should grieve for her, And undo habits used to earn her praise" (Amy Lowell). Mourn may or may not imply as much sincerity as grieve usually implies, but it usually suggests a specific cause, the death of a relative, friend, sovereign, or the like, and carries a much stronger implication of the outward expression of one's grief, as in weeping, sobbing, lamenting, or the wearing of black garments; as, "Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted" (Matthew v. 4); "We wept after her hearse, And yet we mourn" (Shak.); to fix a period of national mourning for a dead sovereign. "Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year, And bear about the mockery of woe To midnight dances, and the public show" (Pope). "Mourn not for Adonais.—Thou young Dawn Turn all thy dew to splendour, for from thee The spirit thou lamentest is not gone" (Shelley). Sorrow may imply grieving or mourning, and be used in place of either term when sincere mental distress is implied; in distinctive use, however, it carries a stronger implication of regret or of deep sadness than either of its close synonyms; as, "So send them [Adam and Eve from Eden] forth, though sorrowing, yet in peace" (Milton); "I desire no man to sorrow for me" (J. Hayward).

Ana. Suffer, *bear, endure: *lament, bemoan, bewail, deplore: *cry, weep, wail, keen.

Ant. Rejoice.

grill, v. 1 Broil, barbecue, roast, *bake.

2 Rack, torment, torture, *afflict, try.

grim. 1 Grim, implacable, relentless, unrelenting, merciless come into comparison in the sense of so inexorable or obdurate as to repel or bar any effort to move one from one's purpose or course. Grim (as here compared: see also GHOSTLY) usually implies tenacity of purpose and stern determination which show themselves outwardly in a forbidding aspect or in a formidable appearance: the term is applicable not only to persons, their words, acts, looks, etc., but to things which reflect or reveal the grimness of persons; as, grim Death; grim necessity; "The Florentines... prepared to do grim battle for their liberties" (Mrs. Oliphant). Implacable literally implies the impossibility of placating, pacifying, or appeasing, and is often used in reference to men or to higher beings; as, "In friendship false, implacable in hate" (Dryden); "He [an African god] is utterly and absolutely implacable; no prayers, no human sacrifices can ever for one moment appease His cold, malignant rage" (L. P. Smith). However, the term is increasingly used to imply an inflexibly uncompromising character or an incapacity for yielding or making concessions, and, in this sense, it is applicable not only to persons but to things; as, "when the true scholar gets thoroughly to work, his logic is remorseless, his art is implacable"

(H. Adams); "I wanted truth presented to me as it is, arduous and honest and implacable" (H. Ellis). Relentless and unrelenting differ mainly in that the former suggests a character and the latter a mood governing action: in their literal use, both imply an absence of pity or of any feeling that would cause one to relent and to restrain through compassion the fury or violence of one's rage, hatred, hostility, vengeance, or the like; as, relentless critics; "Woe to thee, rash and unrelenting chief!" (Byron). Both terms, however, often carry so strong an implication of indefinite duration or of unremitting activity that they are frequently used to describe that which promises not the slightest abatement in severity, violence, intensity, or the like, as long as life or strength lasts; as, a relentless pursuit; the relentless vigilance of the secret service men; the unrelenting fury of a storm; "With unwearied, unscrupulous and unrelenting ambition" (Macaulay). "Everywhere I went in town, the people knew about them, and said nothing.... I found this final, closed, relentless silence everywhere" (T. Wolfe). Merciless differs from relentless and unrelenting mainly in stressing an innate capacity for inflicting cruelty without qualms, or an unparalleled fierceness or savagery: otherwise it carries much the same implications; as, a merciless whipping or tongue-lashing; "harder than any man could be—quite merciless" (S. Cloete); "the psychic disease which ravaged Europe as mercilessly as the Spanish influenza" (Day Lewis).

Con. *Suave, urbane, bland, smooth: unctuous, oily, sleek, soapy, *fulsome.

guarantee, n. Guarantee, guaranty, surety, security, bond, bail come into comparison when they mean either something that is given or pledged as assurance of one's responsibility for the payment of a debt, the fulfillment of a promise or obligation, the performance of a duty, or the like, or the person who accepts such responsibility and gives or pledges something by way of assurance. Guarantee and guaranty generally imply acceptance (often contractual acceptance) of this responsibility for another in case of his default; they may, however, imply an agreement to ensure for another the possession or enjoyment of a right, privilege, prerogative, or the like. The words are often used interchangeably, not only of that which is given as a pledge or of the person making the pledge but also of the contract or promise accepting the responsibility or obligation. In precise use, however, they are often distinguished, guarantee being the more correct term for the person and guaranty the preferred term for the contract or promise; either word is acceptable as a designation for that which is given or pledged; as, to stand guarantee (not guaranty); the small nations begged for guarantees (not guarantees) against invasion; his parents gave a guaranty (or guarantee) for his good behavior. "He even threatened the King of England with interdict, if, as guarantee of the treaty, he should enforce its forfeitures" (Milman). "Many laws which it would be vain to ask the Court [Supreme Court of the United States] to overthrow could be shown, easily enough, to transgress a scholastic interpretation of one or another of the great guarantees in the Bill of Rights" (Justice Holmes). In law, especially when a formal engagement, or guaranty, is entered into, the maker is often called a guarantor (see SPONSOR), but guarantee, despite its -ee ending (for this is not etymologically the suffix -ee), is not its correlative, but its synonym. Surety and security stress provision for the safety of the person who is in a position to lose by the default of another. Both are employable as designating either the person who accepts the responsibility or the money or property turned over to be forfeited in case of default. However, in current use, surety is the usual and the preferred term for the person (or corporation) that serves as guarantee or guarantor for another, and security for the money, property, or certificates of ownership turned over to a creditor, beneficiary, or obligee, or hypothecated for a loan and forfeitable in the case of one's own or another's default; as, every employee handling money is obliged to find a surety (not a security); a contractor provides a surety (usually an insurance corporation) for his performance of a job according to the terms of the contract, but he gives security to the bank that loans him money to begin the job; unsecured debts are those for which no security has been given to the creditors. In British and in some American use, surety is preferred to guarantor. However, in some states of the United States, a distinction is made between the two, surety distinctly implying responsibility for immediate payment in case of the principal's default (for fuller treatment see SPONSOR). Though guarantee and surety usually imply a legal status and documentary proof of that status, they are sometimes used more loosely; as, in you as our partner we have a guarantee of our success; "King, you are free! We did but keep you surety for our son" (Tennyson). Bond, on the other hand, implies documentary proof of one's acceptance of an obligation, and a legally binding promise to repay the holder of that document a sum of money due him on one's own account or in case of the default of another for whom one serves as surety. Bond, therefore, is used either of the document which is given as a pledge (as, government bonds; to give a bond as proof of one's suretyship; his word is as good as his bond) or for the person or corporation that serves as a legally bound surety (as, to go bond for another). "A month before This bond expires, I do expect return Of thrice three times the value of this bond" (Shak.). "The King of England shall be bond for him" (Pepys). Bail implies responsibility for the sure reappearance, at the time prescribed by the court, of a prisoner who has been released from jail pending his trial. The term is applicable (1) to the security given and forfeitable if the prisoner does not return (as, the court asked $5000 as bail; the prisoner was not released because the bail was not forthcoming); (2) to the person serving as surety and providing the security (as, "Sirrah, call in my sons to be my bail"—Shak.; his bail produced him in court at the appointed time); (3) to the state of being out of prison and in the custody of a surety (as, to admit to bail; to be out on bail).

Ana. *Pledge, earnest, token, gage: guarantor, surety (see SPONSOR).

guide, v. Guide, lead, steer, pilot, engineer are here compared in the sense of to direct a person or thing in his or its course or to show the way which he or it should follow. Guide usually implies assistance either by means of a person with intimate knowledge of the course or way and of all its difficulties and dangers (as, "some heavenly power guide us Out of this fearful country"—Shak.; "How shall I tread . . . The dark descent, and who shall guide the way?"—Pope; "Men Who guide the plough"—Crabbe; "The teacher, the parent, or the friend can often do much . . . to guide the pupil into an enjoyment of thinking"—C. W. Eliot) or by means of a thing, such as a light, the stars, a principle, or a device on a machine, which prevents a person or thing from getting off course or going astray (as, "The fine taste which has guided the vast expenditure"—Disraeli; "a vehement gloomy being, who had quitted the ways of vulgar men, without light to guide him on a better way"—Hardy). Lead stresses the idea of going in advance of a person (or persons) or of a thing (or things) to show the way and, often, to keep those that follow in order or under control: in this sense the term is used both literally and figuratively; as, a hand led each division of the procession; the flagship led the fleet; "he longed . . . to lead his men on to victory" (Marryat); "This influence should rather lead than drive" (C. W. Eliot). Often, especially in idiomatic phrases, lead implies the taking of the initiative, the giving of example, or the assumption of the role of leader, director, or guide; as, in the promotion of free education, the United States has led the way; "He . . . Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way" (Goldsmith); to lead people astray by giving them a bad example; to lead one's bride to the altar. Steer stresses the guidance of one able to control the mechanism which determines the course or direction, as of a boat, of an automobile, of an airplane, or the like: it carries a stronger implication of governing or maneuvering than any of the preceding terms and is found in figurative as well as in literal use; as, to steer a ship safely through a narrow channel; "Fortune brings in some boats that are not steer'd" (Shak); "I eagerly desire to steer clear of metaphysics" (Lowes); the steering committee of the House of Representatives. Pilot literally implies the assistance of a pilot, a person competent to steer a vessel safely through unknown or difficult waters, as through a long and narrow channel into or out of a port (as, to pilot a vessel through Ambrose Channel into New York harbor). In its figurative use, it implies guidance over a course where one may easily lose one's way because of its intricacy or may run afoul of various obstacles or dangers; as, their room steward piloted them to the ship's dining room; "We know not where we go, or what sweet dream May pilot us through caverns strange and fair Of far and pathless passion" (Shelley); "[May] the Saints Pilot and prosper all thy wandering out And homeward" (Tennyson). Engineer literally means to lay out and manage the construction of some great project, such as a tunnel under a river, a huge bridge, or the like (as, a firm of experts was called upon to engineer the irrigation project), but in its more common extended sense (originally and still chiefly American) it means to serve as a manager in carrying through something which requires contrivance, maneuvering, or the like; as, to engineer a resolution through the House of Representatives; to engineer a fraud; "the corner in grain engineered by parties in Chicago" (Jay Gould); the coup d'état was engineered by high-ranking army officers.

Ant. Innocent.

gulf. Gulf, chasm, abysm, abyss in literal use agree in denoting a hollow place, of vast width and depth, in the earth. Gulf and chasm, however, suggest a depth which, though vast, is still measurable; abysm and abyss suggest immeasurable depth. Gulf is the most general term and may properly be used of any wide and deep hollow place. "Slippery cliffs arise Close to deep gulfs" (Bryant). In its figurative use, gulf suggests separation by a great, often unbridgeable, distance. "The broad and deep gulf which . . . divides the living from the dead" (Inge). Chasm adds the implication of a deep, and sometimes wide, breach in a formerly solid surface; as, the chasm of the Grand Canyon, worn by the Colorado River. "The brink of a precipice, of a chasm in the earth over two hundred feet deep, the sides sheer cliffs" (Cather). In figurative use, chasm still stresses a sharp break in continuity "Those chasms of momentary indifference and boredom which gape from time to time between even the most ardent lovers" (A. Huxley). Abysm and abyss are etymological variants, abysm being the earlier form. Both originally designated the bottomless gulf or cavity of ancient cosmogonies and both have been applied to hell when thought of as a bottomless pit. Therefore they usually connote not only fathomlessness, but also darkness and horror. Abysm now has a somewhat archaic flavor. "When my good stars . . . Have empty left their orbs, and shot their fires into the abysm of hell" (Shak.). Figuratively, abysm carries over the idea of a vast and immeasurably deep void. "What seest thou else In the dark backward and abysm of time?" (Shak.). Abyss is the form commonly used in modern times. "The abyss of Tartarus, fast secured with iron gates" (Thirlwall). Like abysm, abyss carries over into its figurative use the notion of vast, immeasurable void. "The respectability and prosperity of the propertied and middle classes who grew rich on sweated labor covered an abyss of horror" (Shaw).

H

habit, n. Habit, habitude, practice, usage, custom, consuetude, use, wont come into comparison when they mean a way of behaving, proceeding, or the like, that has become fixed by constant repetition. In most cases, also, these words may be used as collective or abstract nouns denoting all habits, usages, customs, or the like, considered as a directing or impelling force. Habit refers more often to the way of an individual than to the way of a community or other group; the term applies to any way of acting, thinking, or otherwise behaving, which has become so natural to one through repetition that one does it unconsciously or without premeditation; as, he has formed the habit of fingering a coat button when he speaks in public; she has not yet the habit of tidying her room before she leaves it; to break a bad habit; "habits acquired very early feel, in later life, just like instincts; they have the same profound grip" (B. Russell); habit is one of the strongest aids to successful living. Habitude more often suggests a habitual or usual state of mind or attitude than an habitual response to a given stimulus; as, "[She was] from habitude very little incommoded by the remarks and ejaculations of Mrs. Allen" (Austen); "I think, Pericles, you who are so sincere with me are never quite sincere with others. You have contracted this bad habitude from your custom of addressing the people" (Londor). Practice, as here compared (see also practice, n., under PRACTICE, v.), applies to any habit which is by its nature an act or a method which is followed regularly and often by choice; as, it is his practice to rise early each morning and take a walk before breakfast; it is the practice of this surgeon to give local anesthetics wherever possible. Usage, as here compared (see also FORM, 3), applies mainly to a practice that has been so long continued and has been adopted so generally that it serves to guide or determine the action or choice of others; as, it is the usage in certain European countries to breakfast on a roll and a cup of coffee; it is difficult to conform to the usages of a foreign country; "the... inveterate usages of our country, growing out of the prejudice of ages" (Burke). Specifically, in reference to the correct meanings of words, proper grammatical constructions, and idiomatic forms, where there is a difference of opinion, usage (that is, the long-continued and established practice of the best writers and speakers) is regarded as the determining factor; thus, in ordinary use (that is, the way in which the ordinary, or average man uses the term), "nice" means pleasing for one reason or another, but usage (often, the best usage—that is, the way in which the best writers and speakers use the term) indicates that "nice" correctly means showing or involving the use of discrimination; as, "All senses of all words are founded upon usage, and nothing else"

(W. Paley). Custom applies to any habit, any practice, any usage that externally manifests itself and that has come to be associated with an individual or a group by reason of its long continuance, its uniformity of character, and, sometimes, its compulsory nature; as, it is his custom to smoke each evening after dinner; the custom of the club is to wear full dress for dinner; is it the custom in your church for the minister to greet each member of his congregation?; it is not the custom to speak from the floor before being recognized by the presiding officer. Both in law and elsewhere, a custom, as an established practice or usage (or as the body of established practices and usages) of a community or of a people has the force of an unwritten law or laws; thus, the English common law is based upon custom rather than upon legislation. "The answer, 'It is the custom,' is final for the savage, as for the lady of fashion. There is no other reason why they behave in a certain way" (Inge). Consequently, custom, when used as a collective or abstract noun, commonly implies a force as strong, as binding, and as difficult to escape as that exerted by those who enforce the law of the land. "And custom lie upon thee with a weight, Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life" (Wordsworth). "Consecrated custom may keep Chinese civilisation safe in a state of torpid immobility for five thousand years" (Inge). Consuetude, a somewhat rare word except in Scottish or learned use, often comes close to custom in its abstract sense, but it is sometimes nearer to usage; as, "The subjection to, or exemption from, jurisdiction, so completely depended upon consuetude" (Wiseman); "The word was originally not of English but of European consuetude" (Sir W. Hamilton). Use (which is not to be confused with usage as considered earlier in this article, or with use in the sense of the act or way of using) commonly denotes an action, manner, rite, practice, or the like, that is customary to an individual or a particular group and distinguishes him or it from others; as, "more haste Than is his use" (Shak.); the use (that is, the particular liturgy used in a church or diocese) of York; "it had been a family use... to make a point of saving for him anything which he might possibly eat" (M. Austin). Wont, in current English, usually applies to a habitual manner, method, or practice distinguishing an individual or group; it not only differs little from use except in its narrower range of application, but is often coupled with use as a term of equivalent content; as, "The painter followed the religious use and wont of his time" (Mrs. Oliphant); "sad beyond his wont" (Tennyson); "[Renan] begins after the romantic wont by an outburst of sympathy and comprehension for the Parthenon and the Athenians and Pallas Athene" (Babbitt).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. Instinct (see under INSTINCTIVE): convention, convenience, usage, *form.

habitat. Habitat, range, station are here compared only in their technical biological senses in which they agree in denoting the place in which a given species lives or is found. Habitat in strict use refers especially to the kind of environment in which a plant or animal is normally found, such as a desert, seacoast, grassland, marsh, forest, etc. Range, on the other hand, applies to the geographical region in which a plant or animal naturally grows or lives and throughout which it is distributed. Station may be used in place of range, but it is commonly restricted to the exact locality or spot where a given species is found or at which a given specimen has been collected.

habitation. Habitation, dwelling, residence, abode, domicile, house, home. The first three are chiefly literary or elevated. "My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwelling" (Isaiah xxxii. 18). "And one bare dwelling; one abode, no more!" (Wordsworth). Habitation sometimes expresses contrast with the wilderness or with nomadism, and suggests little more than shelter and settled living; as, wandering tribes without a habitation. Dwelling (the equivalent term dwelling house is commoner) and, usually, residence emphasize the use of a building for living in, and contrast with buildings used for trade or business. Residence suggests a certain degree of pretension or dignity in the building and of permanence in occupancy. Abode and domicile (the latter, chiefly a legal term), by contrast, convey no suggestions of the character of the dwelling place, but may imply the extremes respectively of transience and permanence; as, one's abode (not domicile) for the night. A domicile is, legally, a residence in which one intends to remain indefinitely and to which, however long absent, one intends to return. A house (the most general and neutral term of the group) is a building used, or intended for use, as a dwelling place; a home is an occupied dwelling place whose associations evoke in the occupants sentiment and feeling; as, a landlord's house is his tenants' home; "Without hearts there is no home" (Byron).

habitual. *Usual, customary, wonted, accustomed.

Ana. Habituated, addicted, familiarized (see HABITUATE): practiced, drilled (see PRACTICE, v.): confirmed, *inveterate, chronic, deep-seated, deep-rooted.

Ant. Occasional. — Con. *Infrequent, sporadic, rare, uncommon.

habituate. 1 Habituate, accustom, familiarize, addict agree in meaning to make used to something. Habituate, in strict use, implies the formation of habit through repetition of certain acts; as, by constant practice she habituated herself to accurate observation. "To habituate ourselves, therefore, to approve . . . things that are really excellent, is of the highest importance" (Arnold). Accustom implies adjustment to something by frequent or prolonged experience or by constant exposure; as, to accustom oneself to cold; to accustom students to severe criticism. To accustom oneself to nagging is to become inured to nagging by another person; to habituate oneself to nagging is to form the habit of nagging others. This distinction is frequently not observed in loose usage. Sometimes accustom also connotes reconciliation by overcoming one's resistance or distaste. "The 'fourteener' [common meter] . . . which repels readers who have not the patience to accustom their ears and nerves to its beat" (T. S. Eliot). Familiarize presupposes lack of knowledge or of experience with consequent strangeness or constraint, and implies the overcoming of these through close study or association; as, to familiarize oneself with one's duties or with the rules of a game; to familiarize oneself with a foreign language; to familiarize a child with the birds or flowers of a region. Addict (now used chiefly in a reflexive construction or in the passive) adds to habituate the implication of overindulgence or surrender to inclination; as, addicted to study; it very frequently refers to bad habits; as, addicted to drink or to stealing. "A man gross . . . and addicted to low company" (Macaulay).

Ana. Train, discipline, school (see TEACH): inure, *harden, season, acclimatize, acclimate: *practice, exercise, drill.

Con. Fresh, novel, original, *new.

Hadean. Chthonian, *infernal, Tartarean, Stygian, hellish.

haggard. Haggard, worn, careworn, pinched, wasted, cadaverous come into comparison when they mean thin and drawn by or as by worry, fatigue, hunger, illness, or the like. Haggard in very precise use implies wildness, such as that of a person driven distraught by fear, anxiety, privation, or the like (as, "whose haggard eyes Flash desperation"—Cowper; "the strong face to which that haggard expression was returning"—Conrad; "She stood at the door, haggard with rage"—Joyce), but in looser use it usually also implies the extreme thinness or gauntness that is normally associated with age but that comes to younger persons who never know physical or mental ease (as, "they grow thin and haggard with the constant toil of getting food and warmth"—S. Anderson). Worn is the better word etymologically for this looser sense of haggard, for it definitely implies the attrition of flesh characteristic of senility and induced in younger persons by overwork, worry, exhaustion, prolonged ill-health, and the like; as, "The President . . . looked somewhat worn and anxious, and well he might" (Dickens). Careworn differs from worn chiefly in its implication of a being overburdened with cares and responsibilities that cause anxiety; as, the young mother's careworn face; three years of heavy responsibility have changed him to an old careworn man. Pinched and wasted suggest the effects of privation or of a wasting disease; as, the pinched faces of poorly nourished children; the wasted body of a consumptive. Cadaverous is often used in place of pinched or wasted when there is the intent to suggest the appearance of a cadaver, or corpse: it usually implies a deathly paleness and a falling away of the flesh so that the skeleton is apparent though not visible; as, "He has a cadaverous countenance, full of cavities and projections" (Irving); "For a queer second I did see us all in that . . . mirror . . . cadaverous, palsied" (L. P. Smith).

Ana. Gaunt, scrawny, skinny, *lean: fatigued, exhausted, wearied, fagged, jaded (see TIRE, v.): wan, pallid, ashen, *pale.

Con. Jaunty, *debonair, perky, cocky: *vigorous, lusty, energetic, strenuous.

hallucination. *Delusion, mirage, illusion.

Ana. *Apparition, phantasm, phantom, wraith: fantasy, *fancy, vision, dream, nightmare.

halo, n. Halo, glory, aureole (or aureola), nimbus come into comparison when they denote an emblem, usually circular or oval in form, used in the artistic representation of a saint or a sacred figure to indicate sanctity or divinity, or, in some cases, sovereignty. Halo is the ordinary nontechnical term for the most common emblem of sanctity in religious art, especially in paintings, statues, and stained-glass windows, either a circle or band that surrounds the head of the figure or a disk which forms its background. The other three terms are more common in technical use and richer in their implications. Glory is the comprehensive term for any representation of an effulgence of light from the head or from the entire body. It therefore is not restricted to an emblem that resembles a crown; it may be an oval in which the figure is embedded. Usually also it implies representation of rays or of light. Aureole was earliest applied to a spiritual crown, or radiance, piously believed to distinguish some of the saints in heaven, and later to the representation of such a crown in religious art. The term is now used by some writers as equivalent to glory and as including the halo and the pointed oval (vesica piscis) surrounding the entire body. Nimbus (L. for cloud) originally, in English, designated a luminous cloud surrounding a god or goddess visiting earth; it came to be applied in art to any emblematic representation of divinity, sanctity, or sovereignty surrounding the head of a figure. Nimbus is not restricted, as is halo, to something round; it also suggests differentiation more than the other words, for a distinctive type of nimbus, especially in medieval art, is the attribute by which the figure can be definitely identified. Thus, a circular disk with a cross is the common form of nimbus for Christ; a six-pointed star is the nimbus of God the Father in many Greek eikons.

hamper, v. Hamper, trammel, clog, fetter, shackle, manacle, hog-tie are here compared as meaning to hinder or impede one so that one cannot move, progress, or act freely. Hamper is to encumber or embarrass as by an impediment or restraining influence of any sort; as, the long dress hampered her freedom of movement; "The view is vigorously urged to-day that rhyme and meter hamper the poet's free expression" (Lowes). "Never...had she so desired to be spontaneous and unrestrained; never...had she so felt herself hampered by her timidity, her self-criticism, her deeply ingrained habit of never letting herself go" (H. G. Wells). To trammel (literally, to catch in a net) is more specifically to entangle or confine as if enmeshed in a net; as, trammelled in his endeavors by the web of intrigue about him;

"Their life [that is, of women in ancient Rome] was at once dangerously trammelled and dangerously free" (Buchan). To clog (literally, to attach a clog or weight to a man or animal so as to hinder motion) is to hamper the movement, often the ascent, of someone or something by that which is extraneous, encumbering, useless, or the like; as, "The wings of birds were clogged with ice and snow" (Dryden); "Man is ever clogged with his mortality" (C. Bronie); "The Cynic preached abstinence from all common ambitions, rank, possessions, power, the things which clog man's feet" (Buchan). To fetter (literally, to tie the feet with chains so that free or extended movement is impossible) is to confine or restrain so that one's freedom or power to progress is lost; as, "My heels are fettered, but my fist is free" (Milton); "So free we seem, so fettered fast we are!" (Browning); "I refused to visit Shelley that I might have my own unfettered scope" (Keats); "We reverence tradition, but we will not be fettered by it" (Inge). To shackle (literally, to encircle a wrist or ankle with a chain or band attached to something else) and to manacle (literally, to put on manacles or handcuffs) differ little in their extended use, both implying such interference with one's freedom that one feels that movement, progress, or action is impossible if the bonds are not broken; as, to shackle a slave; he would not be shackled in his reasoning by the rules of logic; prisoners are manacled when brought to court; "Grief too can manacle the mind" (Lovelace). Hog-tie, a recent colloquialism in the United States (literally, to tie the four feet of a hog, steer, or the like), is now much used as an intensive of fetter; the term usually implies inability to move from a place, position, duty, or the like; as, he felt hog-tied to his business; industries hog-tied by restrictions on imports of raw materials.

Ana. *Hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar: *embarrass, discomfit: baffle, balk, thwart, foil, *frustrate hand, n. Operative, workman, workingman, laborer, craftsman, handicraftsman, mechanic, artisan, roustabout, *worker.

Ant. Assist (persons): expedite (work, projects, etc.).

handicraft. Craft, art, *trade, profession handicraftsman. Craftsman, workman, artisan, mechanic, workingman, laborer, operative, hand, roustabout, *worker.

handle, v. Handle, manipulate, wield, swing, ply come into comparison as meaning to deal with or manage with or, more often, as if with the hands, especially, but far from exclusively, with the implication of easy, skillful, or dexterous management. Handle, in both its literal and extended senses, implies the acquirement of skill sufficient (or, if qualified, in the degree stated) to accomplish one's ends; as, a child can be taught early to handle a spoon, but it takes longer to teach him to handle a knife and fork; "tools to be handled with care" (T. S. Eliot); she handled the reins superbly; he knows how to handle men so as to get what he wants out of them; "Richelieu sent Charnacé out to handle that situation" (Belloc). Manipulate, in both its literal and extended uses, implies dexterity and adroitness in handling. Especially in its literal sense the term suggests mechanical or technical skill; as, he is able to manipulate the most delicate scientific apparatus; "The kind of courage required for mountaineering, for manipulating an aeroplane, or for managing a small ship in a gale" (B. Russell). In its extended sense, the term often specifically implies crafty or artful, sometimes fraudulent, handling for the attainment of one's own ends; as, a small group of men by manipulating the convention were able to procure the election of their candidate; it was discovered that by manipulating his accounts he had concealed his speculations for years. Wield (etymologically, to have mastery over) in its chief current sense implies mastery and vigor in the handling of a tool, a weapon, or other implement; as, he knows how to wield an axe; to wield a sword; "navvies wielding their hammers in the streets" (H. Ellis). In slightly figurative use, wield may be employed when that which is handled with mastery is an instrument such as a writer's pen, an artist's brush, or a king's scepter, implying not the vigorous movement of the implement itself but its effectiveness as a tool in producing a desired result or as a symbol of power; thus, "to wield a scepter" means to exercise sovereign power or to hold sway. "Of Wu Tao-tzu it is said that it seemed as if a god possessed him and wielded the brush in his hand" (Binyon). The term may also take for its object words such as authority, influence, power, and the like, when their masterful exercise is implied; as, a great editorial writer wields a tremendous influence over the minds of men; "Her newborn power was wielded... by unprincipled and ambitious men" (De Quincey). Swing may be used in place of wield in its literal sense when a flourishing with a sweep is also suggested; as, he swings his golf club with great effectiveness. In its extended sense of to handle successfully, often in spite of great difficulties, swing is an American colloquialism; as, the corporation was able to swing its bond issue; he could not swing the business. Ply (etymologically, to apply) may be used in place of handle or wield when great diligence or industry are also suggested; as, "Go ply thy needle; meddle not" (Shak.); "plying patiently the chisel and mallet" (C. E. Montague); to ply one's oars. The term may also be used when constant and diligent employment, as of a power or faculty, or as at a trade, is also suggested; as, to ply one's wit; "the housewife plied her own peculiar work" (Wordsworth); to ply one's trade.

hang, v. Hang, suspend, sling, dangle come into comparison as meaning to place a thing, or (of a thing) to be placed so that it is supported (literally or figuratively) at one point or on one side, usually a point or side at the top. Hang typically implies a fastening to an elevated point or line so as to allow free motion to, or permit free movement of, that which falls from such a point or line; as, to hang the washing on a line; hundreds of plums hang from the tree's branches; to hang curtains; they hanged (in this application, not hung) the murderer; carcasses of lamb were hung (not hanged) in the butcher's window; to hang out a flag from a window. In extended and figurative use, hang often implies a position or a relation suggestive of hanging, such as that of something poised or seemingly poised in the air (as, "musty [air]...

hung in all the rooms"—Joyce; "just above its [the poplar's] pointed tip, hung the hollow, silver winter moon"—Calder), or of that which is dependent upon something else (as, "A good deal... hangs on the meaning... of this short word"—T. S. Eliot), or of that which clings or adheres to something else (as, she hangs on his arm; "thereby hangs a tale"—Shak.; "Most heavily remorse hangs at my heart!"—Shelley), or the like. Suspend for a long time after its first use in the sense of hang was regarded as a formal or affected term: it is currently used more often, but it still usually seems more literary or less colloquial than hang; as, "Hams, tongues, and flitches of bacon, were suspended from the ceiling" (Irving); "Others [of the rebels] were suspended from the boughs of the oak" (T. Keighley). In some cases, suspend, especially the past participle suspended, is preferred to hang (or hung) when support from a point or points above suggests flexibility, free motion or movement, or a display of skill; as, hundreds of lamps, each held by a thin chain, were suspended from the ceiling; a suspended bridge (now usually suspension bridge). Suspend is also employed more often than hang when a floating as in air, or water, or other fluid is suggested (see SUSPENDED); as, "Wasp-like flies barred with yellow suspended themselves in the air" (Jefferies). Sling, in its earliest sense, implied the use of a sling, or a strap, rope, chain, or the like, equipped with hooks or tackle for grasping heavy or bulky articles so that they might be hoisted or lowered with ease. Later, the term came to imply a hanging over the shoulder, or arm, or similar support, for ease in carrying, reaching, or the like; as, to sling a basket on one's arm; to sling a scaffold from a roof. Dangle implies a hanging in such a manner as to swing or sway to and fro; as, to dangle one's cane from a finger; the children sat on the high wall, their legs dangling; "For all might see the bottle-necks Still dangling at his waist" (Cowper). Figuratively, dangle usually implies dependence on someone, often a loose dependence or connection, in hope of a reward for attentions or services; as, she keeps her suitors dangling.

Ana. *Stick, adhere, cling; hover (see FLIT).

hanger-on. *Parasite, sycophant, leech, sponge, favorite, toady, lickspit.

hap, v. Archaic and poetic variant of HAPPEN.

haphazard. *Random, chance, chancy, casual, desultory, hit-or-miss, happy-go-lucky.

Ana. *Accidental, fortuitous, casual.

Con. Designed, planned, schemed, plotted (see verbs under PLAN, n.): intentional, deliberate, willful, *voluntary.

happen, v. Happen, hap, chance, occur, befall, betide, transpire come into comparison as synonyms only when they mean to come to pass or to come about. Happen is the ordinary and general term; hap, the archaic and poetic term, for this sense: both may imply either obvious causation or seeming accident, either design or an absence of design; in its simplest use, either term takes the event, situation, or circumstance as its subject (as, the incident happened two weeks ago) but in idiomatic phrases it may take the impersonal it or the anticipatory there as its subject (as, "it happened that at Dante's time thought was orderly and strong and beautiful"—T. S. Eliot; "Oft it haps that... a feather daunts the brave" (Scott); there happened to be no visitors that day). In still other idiomatic and largely colloquial phrases, happen or hap may take a person as the subject, especially when the verb implies a coming upon someone or something, or a coming into a place more or less casually or accidentally, rather than a coming to pass; as, the miners happened upon a vein of gold; "I go nowhere on purpose: I happen by" (Frost); "A maiden fine bedight he hapt to love" (Gay). Chance is closer to happen in its idiomatic uses than any of the other words; it is also found occasionally, but somewhat archaically, with the event as the subject; however, it differs from happen in uniformly implying absence of design or apparent lack of causation; as, "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee" (Deuteronomy xxi. 6); "Whenever it chanced that the feelings of the people were roused" (Kinglake); "things they themselves chance to know" (A. Repplier). Occur (etymologically, to run to meet) always, in very precise use, carries an implication of presenting itself to sight, to consciousness, to one's thoughts, or the like; it is, in general, interchangeable with happen only when a definite event, incident, or something that actually takes place is the subject; as, the accident occurred (or happened) yesterday; the bombing raids on the city occurred (or happened) early in the war; I do not know what happened (better than occurred) after I left; "it is necessary for the physicist to arrange the situation so that phenomena shall occur [far better than happen] in which . . . the underlying simplicity will come to light" (Karl K. Darrow). Consequently, occur is preferable to happen in negative expressions when the idea of presentation in the realm of fact is uppermost. "Scientists of the last century . . . under the sway of a naturalistic optimism which regarded an actual event as . . . of superior value to an event which did not occur" (Inge). "This is possible in theory, but, actually, never seemed to occur" (Heiser). This fundamental implication of presentation to sight, mind, etc., makes it possible to use occur where happen would be entirely out of place, as when the word suggests a coming to one's mind (as, "That characters deteriorate in time of need possibly did not occur to Henchard"—Hardy), or a meeting one's eyes or ears, as in print or speech (as, the word seldom occurs except in poetry), or a turning up or appearing (as, another instance of this disease may not occur for several years; corundum occurs in crystals, masses, and grains). Befall (etymologically, to fall, as to one's lot) is used in preference to any of the preceding words, especially in poetry or in literary prose, when there is an implication of a superior power determining events or of the lack of human power to foreknow or forestall them; as, "Anxiety lest mischief should befall her" (Wordsworth). "I hold it true, whate'er befall . . . 'Tis better to have loved and lost, Than never to have loved at all" (Tennyson). Betide is a distinctively archaic synonym of befall; as, "whatever fortune belides you" (H. Martineau). It is, however, often used in poetry in wishes or, especially, in curses; as, "Woe betide the wandering wight" (Scott). Transpire is often used in place of happen or occur, even by some otherwise careful writers (as, among the events which transpired during the war); the usage, though not uncommon, has not been accepted by the best authorities. However, it is necessary to distinguish this disapproved sense from the approved sense with which it is frequently confused, that of to leak out, to become known, especially to the public; as, certain events of the war which have recently transpired. "Precisely what passed on that occasion never transpired" (L. Strachey).

happiness. Happiness, felicity, beatitude, blessedness, bliss agree in denoting the enjoyment or pleasurable satisfaction attendant upon well-being of any kind.

Happiness is the generic term. Felicity, denoting intense happiness, usually has more formal or elevated connotations. Beatitude is supreme felicity. "To understand by honorable love romance and beauty and happiness in the possession of beautiful, refined, delicate, affectionate women" (Shaw). "I know no one more entitled by unpretending merit, or better prepared by habitual suffering, to receive and enjoy felicity" (Austen). "We may fancy in the happy mother's breast a feeling somewhat akin to that angelic felicity, that joy which angels feel in heaven for a sinner repentant" (Thackeray). "About him all the Sanctities of Heaven Stood thick as stars, and from his sight received Beatitude past utterance" (Milton). Blessedness implies a feeling of being highly favored, especially by the Supreme Being, and often, a deep joy arising from the purest domestic, benevolent, or religious affections; bliss adds to blessedness a suggestion of exalted or ecstatic felicity; both blessedness and bliss, like beatitude, often refer to the joys of heaven. "Thrice blest whose lives are faithful prayers, Whose loves in higher love endure; What souls possess themselves so pure, Or is there blessedness like theirs?" (Tennyson). "Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive, But to be young was very Heaven!" (Wordsworth).

Con. *Comfort, solace, console: *relieve, assuage, alleviate.

harbinger. *Forerunner, precursor, herald.

harbor, n. Harbor (or harbour), haven, port come into comparison because they have at one time or another meant a place where ships may ride secure from storms.

Harbor (etymologically, shelter or a shelter) now applies to a portion of a sea or other large body of water that is landlocked or is otherwise artificially protected so that ships or other boats may enter it for safety from storms or may be anchored or moored there when not in use; as, two promontories whose points come near together enclose the harbor; the great natural harbor at Sydney, Australia. Haven is now chiefly literary or occurs in names of towns and cities where a natural harbor, such as a bay, an inlet, a river mouth, or the like, exists and where boats may go for safety during a storm; as, Milford Haven (in south Wales); "O young Mariner, Down to the haven, Call your companions, Launch your vessel" (Tennyson). More than the other words here considered, it connotes a refuge or place of quiet in the midst of storms; as, "My... only haven... is in the arms of death" (Carlyle). Port, even in its earliest sense of a place of security for ships, also denoted a place suitable for landing men or goods; as, "to set me safe ashore in the first port where we arrived" (Swift). Consequently, in literary and extended use, it suggests a destination or goal; as, "Me... Always from port withheld, always distressed" (Cowper). In modern commercial use, port applies to a place, sometimes a harbor, sometimes, especially in place names, a city or town and its harbor, but still more often in the case of the great ports of transatlantic and transpacific shipping, all the approaches, all the inlets, all the docks, wharves, offices, and the like, involved in the business of loading and unloading ships or of embarking and disembarking passengers; as, the ports of New York, Cherbourg, and Southampton.

harbor, v. Harbor (or harbour), shelter, entertain, lodge, house, board come into comparison when they mean, literally or figuratively, to provide a place (especially in one's home, one's quarters, one's confines) where one may be kept for a time. Harbour, in its literal sense, usually implies provision of a place of refuge, especially for a person (or sometimes an animal or insect) that is evil or hunted or noxious; as, to harbor thieves; cellars that harbor rats and cockroaches; "deportation... is simply a refusal by the Government to harbor persons whom it does not want" (Justice Holmes); "What good is he? Who else will harbour him At his age for the little he can do?" (Frost). In its extended sense, the term suggests the reception into one's mind of thoughts, wishes, designs, or the like, especially of those that are evil or harmful, and, usually, the dwelling on them. "Nothing is more astonishing to me than that people... should be capable of harboring such weak superstition" (Pope). "I did not wish him to know that I had suspected him of harbouring any sinister designs" (Hudson). Shelter, far more often than harbor, takes for its subject the place or the thing that affords (as distinguished from the person that supplies) protection or a place of retreat; it also distinctively suggests a threat to one's comfort or safety by the elements, by pursuers or attackers, by a bombardment, or the like; the term further suggests, as harbor does not, a covering or screening. "In such a season born, when scarce a shed Could be obtained to shelter him or me From the bleak air" (Milton). "In Craven's Wilds is many a den, To shelter persecuted men" (Wordsworth). Entertain, in its literal sense, implies the giving of hospitality to a person as a guest at one's table or in one's home. The term, in current use and in this sense, often suggests special efforts to provide for his pleasure and comfort which were not implied in earlier use. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares" (Hebrews xlii. 2). In its extended sense, entertain, like harbor, implies admission into the mind, and consequent consideration, of ideas, notions, fears, and the like, but unlike harbor, the term in itself apart from the context carries no connotations of their good or evil, benign or noxious, character, or of any prolonged dwelling upon them, or even of deep and serious consideration. "It had been Eudora's idea that jealousy had gone out. It wasn't entertained by smart people; it was bourgeois" (M. Austin). "No proposal having for its object the readmission of Master Byron to the academy could be entertained" (Shaw). "Her brothers and sister privately entertained a theory that their mother was rather a simpleton" (V. Sackville-West). Lodge, as here compared, implies the supplying or affording a habitation, often a temporary habitation, for a person or, by extension, for a thing; often it suggests provision merely of a place to sleep, and carries no implications of feeding or entertaining; as, Mrs. Brown will lodge three of the party for the week end; "Every house was proud to lodge a knight" (Dryden). In the now fairly rare figurative extension of this sense, lodge may imply reception as if of a guest or denizen, not only (like harbor) into the mind, but into anything thought of as a receptacle or as a place where a thing may be deposited or imbedded; as, "I well might lodge a fear To be again displaced" (Shak.); "So fair a form lodged not a mind so ill" (Shak.); "And that one talent which is death to hide Lodged with me useless" (Milton). House usually implies the shelter of a building with a roof and side walls that affords protection from the inclemencies of the weather; as, he could find no place in the village to house his family suitably; "the rich man has fed himself, and dressed himself, and housed himself as sumptuously as possible" (Shaw); to house gardening implements in a shed; to house an art collection in the new library building. House is somewhat rare in extended use, but it usually implies enclosing or confining in a particular place. "The universal does not attract us until housed in an individual" (Emerson). Board originally meant to provide a person with meals at one's table, or board (as, "We cannot lodge and board a dozen or fourteen gentlemen"—Shak.). In current use, however, it is distinguished from lodge in implying provision of both room and meals for compensation; as, Mrs. Jones boards four teachers at her home (or, idiomatically, four teachers board at Mrs. Jones's home).

Ana. Foster, cherish, nurture, *nurse: *hide, conceal, secrete: protect, shield (see DEFEND).

Con. *Eject, expel, oust, evict: *banish, exile, deport: *exclude, eliminate, shut out.

hard. 1 Solid, *firm.

Ana. Compact, dense, *close: consolidated, compacted, concentrated (see COMPACT, v.): *hardened, indurated, callous.

Ant. Soft. — Con. Fluid, *liquid: flabby, flaccid, *limp: pliant, pliable, *plastic: flexible, *elastic, supple, resilient, springy.

2 *Alcoholic, spirituous, strong, ardent.

3 Hard, difficult, arduous come into comparison when they are applied to tasks for mind or body and mean demanding great toil or effort in reaching the appointed or the desired end. Hard is the simpler, blunter, and more general term; it implies the opposite of all that is implied by easy, but usually suggests nothing more specific; as, a hard lesson; a hard job; a hard book to understand; "Your easy reading, Sheridan said, is 'damned hard writing'" (C. E. Montague). Difficult commonly implies the presence of obstacles to be surmounted, or of complications to be removed; it therefore suggests the exercise of skill, ingenuity, sagacity, or courage. "[The tutor] Armed for a work too difficult for thee; Prepared by taste, by learning, and true worth. To form thy son, to strike his genius forth" (Cowper). "Men like fly-fishing, because it is difficult; they will not shoot a bird sitting, because it is easy" (B. Russell). Difficult is more widely applicable than hard, because it often means specifically hard to understand (because abstruse, intricate, abstract), or hard to deal with (because thorny, knotty, cumbersome, delicate, exacting), or the like; as, "he [Hegel] is a very difficult writer" (Inge); "the difficult beauty of many passages... of Winter's Tale or Coriolanus" (S. Alexander); "I do not propose... to enter upon the difficult question of Dis-establishment" (T. S. Eliot); "it [the quilt pattern] was a difficult design and had to be executed exactly right" (R. Bradford). Arduous stresses the need of laborious effort, of perseverance, and persistent exertion; thus, one may find a task difficult, but not arduous, because one has no sense of being kept at it against one's inclination; an ascent of a mountain may be arduous, but not especially difficult.

Ana. *Onerous, burdensome, oppressive, exacting: intricate, knotty, complicated, involved, *complex: exhausting, fatiguing, wearying, tiring (see TIRE, v.).

Ant. Easy. — Con. Facile, light, simple, effortless (see EASY).

harden. Harden, inure, season, acclimatize, acclimate denote in common to make a person or thing proof against hardship, strain, exposure, or the like. All when referred to persons imply a becoming accustomed by time or experience. Harden implies habituation that toughens one and makes one insensible of one's own pain or discomfort, or callous and insensitive to others' misery; as, hardened to the rigors of arctic exploration. "I could... hear faint echoes of their grief. It was an experience to which I never became hardened" (V. Heiser). Inure usually implies unwilling submission; it suggests a lesser degree of toughening than harden, sometimes simply patient endurance; as, inured to insult (cf. hardened to insult). "The poor, inured to drudgery and distress" (Cowper). Season implies a gradual bringing into mature, sound, efficient condition; it does not, when referred to persons, necessarily imply that what is to be undergone is uncongenial; as, a seasoned marathon runner; a seasoned actor; seasoned lumber. "With much less compass of muscle than his foe, that which he had was more seasoned—iron and compact" (Lytton). Acclimatize and acclimate imply adaptation to a new and adverse climate or, by extension, to new and strange surroundings in general. Some writers have distinguished acclimatize from acclimate by restricting the first to adaptation by human agency, but this distinction is not commonly observed. "A race... well seated in a region, fixed to the soil by agriculture, acclimatized by natural selection" (W. Z. Ripley). "I have not been long enough at this table to get well acclimated" (Holmes).

Ana. *Habituate, accustom, familiarize: *adapt, adjust, accommodate.

Ant. Soften. — Con. Enervate, emasculate (see UNNERVE): *weaken, debilitate, enfeeble, sap, undermine.

hardened. Hardened, indurated, callous agree in meaning grown or become hard. All these terms are synonyms in both their literal and their figurative uses. Hardened, however, is, in its literal sense, the most inclusive of these terms because it is applicable to any substance, whether originally fluid or solid, or loose or firm in texture, or elastic or inelastic, that has become solder and firmer and increasingly resistant to efforts to cut, pierce, bend, or the like; as, hardened soap; hardened lava; hardened steel. Consequently, in figurative use, hardened usually implies a fixing or setting with loss of flexibility, elasticity, pliancy, susceptibility, impressionableness, or similar qualities; as, hardened beliefs; hardened distrust; a hardened criminal; a hardened heart. Indurated, which in its literal sense is chiefly in geological and in medical use, usually implies an increase of hardness (especially in something already firm or hard) or compactness, sometimes even suggesting abnormal hardness; as, indurated clay; indurated sandstone; an indurated abscess. In its figurative use, it usually implies excessive hardness or stoniness that repels all efforts to penetrate or to soften; as, "Indurated stoic as I am" (John Adams); "her husband's indurated conscience" (H. James). Callous, in its earliest and still common sense, implies a hardening and thickening of the skin by constant pressure or friction and a consequent loss of sensibility in the part affected; as, a callous spot on the sole of one's foot; a callous fingertip. In very precise figurative use, callous also implies a loss of sensibility or an insensitiveness that results from constant experience; as, he has grown callous to such appeals; he is now callous to criticism. "The tiresome and callous repetition of old motives which marked the decadence of the classic tradition" (Binyon). In current use, callous often means unfeeling and carries little implication of the process of hardening; as, a callous answer.

Ana. Tempered, annealed (see TEMPER, v.): consolidated, compacted, concentrated (see COMPACT, v.).

Ant. Softened. — Con. Liquefied, melted, thawed, fused (see LIQUEFY): weakened, enfeebled, debilitated (see WEAKEN).

hardihood. *Temerity, audacity, effrontery, nerve, cheek, gall.

Ana. Boldness, intrepidity (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): brazenness, impudence, brashness (see corresponding adjectives at SHAMELESS): guts, sand, grit, pluck, *fortitude.

hardly, adv. Hardly, scarcely, barely are often interchangeable when they mean "just that and no more." In precise use, however, hardly suggests difficulty; scarcely, scantiness of margin; barely (the strongest term) implies that there is nothing to spare; as, he could hardly speak; he had scarcely gained shelter; he arrived barely in time. Hardly is the preferred term when the word modified implies ability, capacity, or the like; as, he is hardly able to lift this weight. Scarcely and barely, but not hardly, in discriminating use, modify adjectives such as enough and sufficient; as, there is scarcely enough food in the house for one meal; barely enough food for dinner.

hardship. Rigor, vicissitude, *difficulty.

Ana. Adversity, *misfortune, mischance: peril, *danger, jeopardy, hazard: *trial, tribulation, affliction: toil, travail, drudgery (see WORK).

Con. Ease, comfort (see REST).

hark. Hearken, *hear, listen, list, attend.

harlequin. *Fool, jester, clown, antic, buffoon, pantaloons, comedian, comic, zany, merry-andrew, stooge.

harm, n. Damage, *injury, hurt, mischief.

Ana. Detrimentalness or detriment, deleteriousness, perniciousness, noxiousness (see corresponding adjectives at PERNICIOUS): *misfortune, mischance: impairing or impairment, marring (see corresponding verbs at INJURE).

Ant. Benefit.

harm, v. *Injure, impair, hurt, damage, mar, spoil.

Ana. *Abuse, maltreat, mistreat, misuse: *ruin, dilapidate, wrack: discommode, incommode, molest (see INCONVENIENCE): sap, undermine (see WEAKEN).

Ant. Benefit. — Con. *Improve, better, ameliorate: profit, avail, boot, bestead (see BENEFIT): *help, aid, assist.

harmonize. 1 Accord, comport, *agree, correspond, square, conform, tally, jibe.

Ana. Reconcile, adjust, *adapt, accommodate: *match, equal, approach, touch, rival.

Ant. Clash: conflict.

2 Harmonize, tune, attune agree in meaning to bring things which clash or are discordant into accord with each other. Harmonize stresses as its end the combination of two or more things so that they go together without loss of individual identities yet constitute a frictionless or pleasing whole; as, to harmonize the conflicting colors in a room by an emphasis on blue; "their religion is a mixture of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew elements which refuse to be harmonised" (Inge). Tune implies the adjustment of one thing to another or of several things to each other so that they will conform to each other or work in harmony with each other; thus, to tune a piano is to adjust its strings so that the tones produced will conform to a standard pitch or to a predetermined temperament; to tune up the instruments of an orchestra is to adjust the instruments so that they will produce harmonious tones; to tune up an engine of an automobile is to make all the finer adjustments of its parts necessary to smooth operation. In literary use, tune still implies adjustment, as of expression to a mood, or of mood to a situation or need. "For now to sorrow must I tune my song" (Millon); "a mind well strung and tuned To contemplation" (Cowper). Attune stresses the attainment of aesthetic harmony more than harmonize does, and it seldom suggests the idea of mechanical operation or effect often so strong in tune. "Riding, walking, gardening, driving about the level Essex lands, she, attuned to the soil on which she lived, was happy and serene" (R Macaulay). "How by mastering rhythm, our Prose . . . attuned itself to rival its twin instrument, Verse" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. Adjust, reconcile (see ADAPT).

harmony. 1 Harmony, consonance, accord, concord all designate the result attained or the effect produced when different things come together without clashing or disagreement. Harmony, in its strict etymological sense, denotes the unity, order, and absence of friction produced by the perfect articulation and interrelation of distinct parts in a complex whole "To heavenliest harmony Reduce the seeming chaos" (Southey). "The scientific view of the world . . . seeks to find law, harmony, uniformity in nature" (Inge). Harmony, largely because of its associations with music, often but not necessarily suggests beauty of effect, whether that is achieved by order in a whole or by agreeable blending or arrangement, as of tones, colors, or the like. "A harmony of life, a fine balance of all the forces of the human spirit" (Binyon). "Like hues and harmonies of evening" (Shelley). Consonance, rather than harmony, originally denoted and still often denotes the blending of two or more simultaneous sounds so as to produce an agreeable effect: it is then opposed to dissonance. As a rule, it names the fact or the means whereas harmony names the result. "Notes in consonance constitute harmony, as notes in succession constitute melody" (E. Chambers). In careful extended application, consonance retains these implications of coincidence and concurrence. Sometimes the pleasurable effect is still suggested. "In good poetry there always is this consonance of thought and song" (S. Alexander). Very often there is no hint of a pleasurable effect but a strong implication of consistency or congruity. "This was an unprecedented act, but it was in consonance with Roman tradition" (Buchan). Accord is often interchangeable with consonance without loss; as, it was in accord with Roman tradition. However, it can imply, as consonance cannot, personal agreement or good will, or, often, absence of ill will or friction. "But here we're a' [all] in ae [one] accord" (Burns). "For your father's remembrance, be at accord" (Shak.). Hence, the phrase "with one accord" suggests unanimity; as, with one accord, they gave a cheer. Concord, like accord, often stresses agreement between persons, but it is far more positive in its implications, for it suggests peace with amity rather than absence or suppression of ill will. "How comes this gentle concord in the world?" (Shak.). "Till heart with heart in concord beats" (Wordsworth). Concord also, when applied to sounds, comes close to harmony in its implications. However, it seldom (except in a technical sense in music) connotes consonance of tones, but usually the pleasant succession of tones that is the quality of melody. "The man that hath no music in himself, Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds" (Shak.).

Ana. Integration, articulation, concatenation (see corresponding verbs at INTEGRATE): congruousness or congruity, consonance, compatibility (see corresponding adjectives at CONSONANT): concurrence, agreement (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

Ant. Conflict. — Con. *Discord, strife, contention, variance, dissension: dissonance, discordance (see corresponding adjectives at DISSONANT).

2 *Symmetry, proportion, balance.

Ana. Grace, *elegance, dignity: *unity, integrity.

harry. Harass, *worry, annoy, plague, pester, tease, tantalize.

Ana. Torment, torture, rack, grill, *afflict, try: *trouble, distress: *bait, badger, hound, ride, hector: fret, gall, chafe (see ABRADE).

Con. *Comfort, solace, console: *relieve, assuage, alleviate, allay.

harsh. *Rough, rugged, scabrous, uneven.

Ana. Repellent, *repugnant, distasteful, abhorrent, obnoxious: *coarse, gross: strident, *vociferous, blatant: rigorous, strict, stringent, *rigid.

Ant. Pleasant: mild. — Con. Pleasing, agreeable, grateful, gratifying (see PLEASANT): *soft, gentle, bland, lenient, balmy.

haste, n. Haste, hurry, speed, expedition, dispatch (or despatch) come into comparison as meaning quickness or swiftness in movement or in action. Haste in precise use implies quickness or swiftness in persons rather than in machines, vehicles, methods of transportation, or the like; thus, a business that requires haste demands that the persons concerned move or act swiftly. "She came in straightway with haste unto the king" (Mark vi. 25). But haste may imply other goads than urgency or pressure for time; it may imply intense eagerness (as, "His tongue, all impatient to speak . . . Did stumble with haste"—Shak.), or lack of due reflection and precipitancy in decision (as, "Marry in haste and repent at leisure"—Old Proverb), or the impulsion of anger (as, "I said in my haste, All men are liars"—Psalms cxvi. 11). Hurry, though often used colloquially in place of haste as the simpler term, in precise use carries a stronger implication of confusion, agitation, bustle, or the like (as, "Whoever is in a hurry, shows that the thing he is about is too big for him. Haste and hurry are very different things"—Chesterfield; "the incessant hurry . . . of daily life"—C. W. Eliot) and more frequently refers to the things which are operated or the actions which are performed with haste than to the persons concerned (thus, haste in preparation, but the hurry of preparations). Also, hurry may imply the state of mind or the need of one who demands haste as well as of the one who makes haste; as, I am in a great hurry (not haste) for the articles ordered; you need not be in a hurry to fill (or make haste in filling) my order. Speed, as here compared (see also SPEED, n., 2), usually implies mere swiftness or rapidity, primarily in motion or movement, but secondarily in action, performance, or accomplishment. Unlike haste and hurry, the term, which may be used with propriety in reference to things as well as to persons, carries no connotations of precipitancy, urgency, agitation, or the like, although it may from its original sense carry a suggestion of success; as, "the more haste the less [or in some versions, the worse] speed" (Old Proverb); "A performance [by flying albatrosses] which had the beauty of speed uncontaminated by haste" (Harper's Mag.); "Many an adult reader with trained habits of attention and concentration will absorb the contents of a book with a speed... no child can approach" (C. W. Eliot). Expedition and dispatch imply both speed and efficiency, especially in business or affairs, but dispatch carries a stronger suggestion of promptness in bringing matters to a conclusion, and expedition more often carries a hint of ease; as, they made their plans with expedition; "Sophia put her things on with remarkable expedition" (Bennett); "Serious business, craving quick dispatch" (Shak.); "There is nothing more requisite in business than despatch" (Addison); "To do everything when it ought to be done is the soul of expedition" (Scott); "The soul of dispatch is decision" (Hazlitt).

Ana. *Celerity, alacrity, legerity: rapidity, swiftness, quickness, expeditiousness (see corresponding adjectives at FAST): readiness, promptness (see corresponding adjectives at QUICK): agility, briskness (see corresponding adjectives at AGILE).

Ant. Deliberation. — Con. Slowness, leisureliness, deliberateness, dilatoriness (see corresponding adjectives at SLOW): procrastination, delaying or delay, dawdling (see corresponding verbs at DELAY).

hasten. *Speed, accelerate, quicken, hurry, precipitate.

Ant. Delay. — Con. Retard, slow, slacken, detain (see DELAY): lag, procrastinate, dally, dawdle (see DELAY).

hasty. 1 Speedy, quick, expeditious, rapid, *fast, swift, fleet.

Ana. *Agile, brisk, nimble: hurried, quickened (see SPEED, v).

Con. *Slow, deliberate, dilatory, leisurely, laggard.

2 *Precipitate, headlong, abrupt, impetuous, sudden.

Con. Considered, advised, *deliberate, premeditated, designed, studied.

hate, v. Hate, detest, abhor, abominate, loathe. Hate, the general term, implies extreme aversion, esp. as coupled with enmity or malice. "She did not hate him; she rather despised him, and just suffered him" (Thackeray). "Whom we fear more than love, we are not far from hating" (Richardson). Detest connotes violent or intense antipathy or dislike. "The mob is a monster I never could abide... I detest the whole of it, as a mass of ignorance, presumption, malice, and brutality" (Smollett). "I mortally detest cards" (Fielding). Abhor suggests profound (as it were, shuddering) repugnance. "A woman... waxing too womanly, and swelling from tears and supplications to a scene, [was] of all things abhorred by him the most" (Meredith). Abominate suggests strong detestation, as of something ill-omened or shameful. "The Egyptians... lived only on the fruits of the earth, and abominated flesh-eaters" (Newton). Loathe implies utter disgust or intolerance. "Except when I am listening to their music I loathe the whole race; great stupid, brutal, immoral, sentimental savages" (R. Macaulay). The same distinctions in implications and connotations are evident in the derivative nouns hate, hatred (for a distinction between these terms see HATE, n., 2), detestation, abhorrence, abomination, loathing, when they name the feeling of one who hates, detests, etc. Ana. *Despise, condemn, scorn, disdain: *disapprove, deprecate.

Ant. Love. — Con. *Like, enjoy, relish, fancy, dote on or upon: respect, esteem, admire (see under REGARD, n.). hate, n. 1 Hatred, abhorrence, detestation, abomination, loathing. See under HATE, v.

Ana. *Antipathy, aversion: animosity, rancor, hostility, *enmity: despise, contempt, scorn, disdain (see under DESPISE).

Ant. Love. — Con. Affection, *attachment: admiration, respect, esteem, *regard: reverence, veneration (see under REVERE).

2 Hate, hatred are not always interchangeable although they agree in denoting intense, settled dislike for a person or thing that causes one either to avoid him (or it) scrupulously or to be his (or its) bitter enemy. Hate is always the preferable term when the emotion is thought of in the abstract as the diametrical opposite of love, or when the term is used without reference to particular individuals. "Love you cannot help, and hate you cannot help; but contempt is—for you—the sovereign idiosyncrasy..." (Galsworthy). "It [the emotion of some satires] is... not really hate at all, but spite; and it takes a very remarkable poet, like Pope... to elevate malice into hate" (Day Lewis). In concrete use, hate is seldom found outside of poetry except when contrasted with love, also in concrete use; it then always denotes the object of one's hate; as, "the scum of men, the hate and scourge of God" (Marlowe). "My only love [Juliet] sprung from my only hate [the Capulets]" (Shak.). Hatred is the preferable term when the emotion referred to is actually experienced and is therefore personal and individual in character; hate is definable because men are in agreement concerning its distinguishing marks, but hatred escapes exact definition because its implications, other than that of intense dislike, can be gathered only from the context or with reference to its object. Usually it implies in addition one or more emotions such as antipathy, aversion, rancor, vindictiveness, resentment, or fear; as, he had a deep-seated hatred of aristocrats; a violent hatred of restrictions on his freedom; "a healthy hatred of scoundrels" (Carlyle). "It was apparent that his [Galsworthy's] special type of satire had its roots not in hatred but in sympathy. His wrath was an inverted love" (Bliss Perry). "His hatred is the coward's revenge for being intimidated" (Shaw). Hatred also is often used in reference to its effect on the one who is hated; in such cases, the nature of the emotion is not stressed, but its power to harm. "He sowed doubtful speeches, and reaped plain, unequivocal hatred" (Lamb); "Battered by hatred, seared by ridicule" (J. E. Flecker). In concrete use, hatred usually denotes a particular instance, as of obsession by the emotion of hatred or of suffering as a result of another's hatred; as, given to violent hatreds; the victim of human hatreds; "a family famous for its hatreds" (Disraeli).

hateful. Hateful, odious, abhorrent, detestable, abominable are sometimes used with little distinction. But hateful more frequently applies to that which excites actual hatred; odious, to that which is excessively disagreeable, or which awakens offense or repugnance. "Why shouldn't we hate what is hateful in people, and scorn what is mean?" (Thackeray). "Between these two natures, so antipathetic, so hateful to each other, there was depending an unpardonable affront" (Stevenson). "Our blind poet, who in his later day stood almost single, uttering odious truth" (Wordsworth). "There was something more odious to him in her friendship than her hatred" (Thackeray). That is abhorrent which outrages one's sense of what is just, right, honorable, or decent. "She [his wife] was his property... To me it is a view that has always been abhorrent" (Galsworthy). That is detestable which deserves scorn or contempt; as, hypocrisy is more detestable than shamelessness. "Dancing is nowhere the passion that it is with us; if it were, the French, who dance detestably, would perhaps dance better" (Brownell). That is abominable which is so abhorrent as to deserve execration. "On board ship ready to sail away from this abominable world of treacheries, and scorns and envies and lies" (Conrad). "All the living conditions were abominable" (Cather).

Ana. *Antipathetic, unsympathetic, averse: repellent, *repugnant, obnoxious, distasteful.

Ant. Lovable: sympathetic. — Con. Congenial, compatible, *consonant: *amiable (sense 1): attractive, alluring, taking, charming (see under ATTRACT).

haunt or hant, n. Ghost, spirit, specter, shade, revenant, spook, *apparition, phantasm, phantom, wraith, fetch.

have. 1 Have, hold, own, possess, enjoy are here compared as verbs which mean to produce, control, retain, or the like, as one's own. Have is the most general term, implying any of a multitude of reasons for regarding the thing had as one's own; as, he has considerable property; they have five children; we have no cow at present; to have opinions on a subject; she has many friends; they are going to have a baby; he has no French; we shall have some trouble with it. Hold implies stronger control over than have and usually suggests a grasp upon, an occupancy of, a bond between, or the like; thus, "to have friends" implies a mere amicable relationship but "to hold one's friends" implies either the reducing of them to subjection or the retaining of their affection; "to have an opinion" implies merely the existence of that opinion, whereas "to hold an opinion" usually suggests its assertion; so, to hold certain securities; to hold extensive properties in New York State. "Once did she hold the gorgeous East in fee" (Wordsworth); "The Breton seized more than he could hold; the Norman took less than he would have liked" (H. Adams); "the receptive imagination...holds fast the visions genius creates" (C. W. Eliot). Own implies a natural or legal right to hold as one's property and as under one's full control; as, to own a house; to own some good securities; to own several horses. "When a child is old enough, he should...be allowed to own books" (B. Russell); some parents treat their children as if they owned them. Possess is preferred in law to own as implying one's having full title and right to a particular property, to the exclusion of everyone else; thus, a husband and wife might say that they own a piece of land when legally only the husband possesses (or has possession of) it. In general use, possess differs from own in being referable to other things than property, such as a characteristic, a quality, a power, a faculty; as, to possess contentment; "the States possessed the power to exclude or admit them [slaves]" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "that astonishingly retentive memory which we possessed as little boys" (Inge); "the great medicinal value possessed by this water" (V. Heiser). Enjoy, as here compared (see also LIKE), implies the having of something as one's own or for one's use with all its benefits and advantages; in this sense, there is no necessary connotation of pleasure or delight in having or using, but as a matter of fact the word, except in law, often carries a hint if not a definite suggestion of it; as, "During his lifetime he enjoyed a distinguished reputation for the excellence of his sermons" (T. S. Eliot); "While man enjoyed...an unlimited freedom to be wicked" (H. Adams); classes that enjoy certain rights and privileges. "Possession...Act, fact, or condition of a person's having such control of property that he may legally enjoy it to the exclusion of all others having no better right than himself" (Webster's New Int. Dict., 2d Ed.).

Con. Want, *lack, need.

hazardous. Precarious, jeopardous, risky, *dangerous, perilous.

Ana. Venturous, venturesome, *adventurous: chancy, chance, haphazard, happy-go-lucky, *random.

Con. Secure, *safe.

haze, n. Haze, mist, fog, smog, brume agree in denoting an atmospheric condition which deprives the air near the earth of its transparency. Haze applies to such a condition as is caused by the diffusion of smoke, dust, or any light vapor through the air in such a way as to impede but not obstruct the vision and to convey no (or practically no) impression of dampness; as, the early morning haze on a warm day in autumn; there is haze today because the wind carries the smoke from the railroad yards. Mist applies to a condition where water is held in suspension in fine particles in the air, floating or slowly falling in minute drops. A fog differs from a mist only in its greater density and in its power to cut off the vision. A fog differs from a cloud in being near to the ground. "Not the thin glassy mist of twenty minutes ago, but a thick, dense, blinding fog that hemmed in like walls of wadding on every side" (Hugh Walpole). Smog [a blend of smoke and fog] is a recent American coinage for a fog made heavier and darker by the smoke of an industrial city; as, a Pittsburgh smog. Brume, a rare poetic term, applies to a fog or heavy mist, especially one that occurs in winter or in the very early spring; as, "The drifting brume" (Longfellow); "It was an orchard with blossoming trees—that much I could see through the brume" (Buchan).

In their figurative use, haze suggests vagueness or lack of clear definition of thought or feeling (as, "That he [Gilbert Murray as translator] should...blur the Greek lyric to the fluid haze of Swinburne"—T. S. Eliot); mist applies to that which can be only dimly apprehended because of its remoteness (as, "The origin of detergents is...lost in the mists of antiquity"—A. C. Morrison) or to that which prevents exact knowledge or clear understanding (as, "Times...half shrouded in the mist of legend"—Freeman); fog implies an obscuring of the mental or spiritual vision or of that which can be detected only by such vision (as, the fog of ignorance in which so many live; "Life and its few years— A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun"—L. W. Reese).

head or headman. *Chief, leader, chieftain, commander, captain, master.

headlong. *Precipitate, impetuous, abrupt, hasty, sudden.

headstrong. Ungovernable, *unruly, intractable, refractory, recalcitrant, willful.

Ana. Perverse, *contrary, forward, wayward; stubborn, *obstinate, pigheaded, stiffnecked.

Con. Submissive, *tame, subdued: docile, tractable, amenable, biddable, *obedient.

headway. Pace, *speed, velocity, momentum, impetus.

Ana. Advance, progress (see under ADVANCE, v.): *motion, movement.

heal. *Cure, remedy.

healthful. Healthful, healthy, wholesome, salubrious, salutary, hygienic, sanitary come into comparison when they mean conducive or beneficial to the health or soundness of body or mind. Healthful is now preferred to healthy as the term carrying this sense, but often in the past and to some extent still, the latter word has taken the place of the former even among informed writers and speakers; as, a healthful climate (cf. "one of the healthiest climates in England"—Bennett); healthful recreation (cf. "The French boy gets healthy recreation"—Grandgent); sound sleep is healthful (cf. "All mothers wish their children to sleep, because it is...healthy"—B. Russell). "The second fruit of friendship is healthful and sovereign for the understanding" (Bacon). Nevertheless, healthy is being displaced by healthful in this sense (for chief current sense of the former word see HEALTHY, 2). Wholesome (see also HEALTHY, 2), as here compared, is not only a more homely word than healthful but it carries an even stronger suggestion of a capacity for producing, or of the actual production of, a good effect physically, morally, intellectually, or the like; as, wholesome food; to provide wholesome, well-balanced meals; books that are wholesome reading; the influence of such companions is not wholesome. "Mathematics...is a wholesome discipline because it requires a high degree of concentration and because it shows so inexorably the difference between right and wrong" (Grandgent). Salubrious now applies chiefly to climate, air, or the like, that is pleasantly invigorating yet devoid of harshness or extremes. Because the term is now so often used in the advertising of summer and winter resorts, it is falling into disuse among fastidious writers and speakers. "Hail, calm acclivity, salubrious spot!" (Browning). Salutary implies a tonic, corrective, or similarly beneficial effectiveness; often it is applied to that which is in itself unpleasant; as, salutary advice; "Idle ladies and gentlemen are treated with salutary contempt" (Shaw). "The use of force in education should be very rare. But for the conquest of fear it is, I think, sometimes salutary" (B. Russell). Hygienic suggests reference to hygiene, or the science which deals with the means and the rules of promoting physical or mental health, especially of the public. The term therefore commonly implies use of the approved means or obedience to the approved rules because they are conducive to health; as, to instruct children in the hygienic care of mouth and teeth; stuffy schoolrooms are not hygienic. Sanitary implies reference to any or all measures taken or that can be taken to guard against infections or other conditions that promote disease. The term therefore usually implies the promotion of health, especially public health, through interference with causes that bring about disease, epidemics, and the like; as, sanitary plumbing; sanitary regulations; the sanitary care of foods; drainage of swamps and similar sanitary measures. In the United States, sanitary is sometimes used in place of healthful but with a stronger emphasis upon effectiveness. "Solitary communion with Nature does not seem to have been sanitary or sweetening in its influence on Thoreau's character" (J. R. Lowell).

Ana. *Beneficial, advantageous, profitable: remedying or remedial, correcting or corrective (see corresponding verbs at CORRECT): helping or helpful, aiding (see corresponding verbs at HELP).

Con. Deleterious, detrimental, noxious, *pernicious.

healthy. 1 *Healthful, wholesome, salubrious, salutary, hygienic, sanitary.

Ana. & Con. See those at HEALTHFUL.

2 Healthy, sound, wholesome, robust, hale, well agree in meaning having or manifesting health of mind or body or indicative of such health. Healthy may imply the possession of full vigor and strength of body or mind or it may merely imply freedom from any signs of disease or other morbid condition; as, a healthy body; a healthy boy; "during a healthy and active life" (C. W. Eliot); "I [the physician] went along to keep everybody healthy" (V. Heiser). Often the term applies not to that which has health but to that which manifests one's health or vigor or serves as a sign of it; as, "he had a healthy color in his cheeks" (Dickens); she has a healthy appetite; "a healthy craving for the sap and savour of a more personal, national art" (Binyon). Sound even more strongly implies the possession of perfect health or the absence of all defects, and therefore suggests not even the slightest sign of disease, morbidity, or the like; as, a sound mind in a sound body; "The other [man] compact, broad and sturdy of limb...full of sound organs functioning vigorously all the time" (Conrad); "That child is...much too emotional to be ever really sound" (Conrad); "His tastes were healthy, his wits sound" (R. Macaulay). Wholesome (see also HEALTHFUL) implies a healthiness that impresses others favorably, especially as indicative of a person's physical, mental, and moral soundness, or often more specifically of a person's balance or equilibrium; as, "thankful [for]...his mother, so sane and wholesome" (D. H. Lawrence); "They [scientific studies] promote...a wholesome dislike of sophistry and rhetoric" (Inge). Robust implies the antithesis of all that is delicate; it usually connotes manifest vigor of health as shown in muscularity, fresh color, a strong voice, an ability to work long and hard, and the like; as, exercise tends to develop robust boys and girls; a man of robust constitution; he is in robust health; to speak in a robust voice. Hale, which is a close synonym of sound, is in current use applied chiefly to elderly or aged persons who not only show no signs of infirmity or senility but manifest qualities of men in their prime; as, he is hale and hearty at 85; "Pete Gurney was a lusty cock. Turned sixty-three, but bright and hale" (Masefield). Well, which is commoner as a predicative than as an attributive adjective, is more or less a noncommittal term; it merely implies freedom from disease or illness of any sort and so does not necessarily suggest soundness or robustness; as, is your father well?; he is always well; she has never been a well person.

Ana. *Vigorous, lusty, energetic: *strong, sturdy, stalwart, tough, tenacious.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ant. Unhealthy. — Con. *Sick, ill: infirm, frail, feeble, *weak.

heap, v. Heap, pile, stack, shock, cock, mass, bank come into comparison as verbs when they mean to bring together into a more or less compact group or collection a number of things, and as nouns when they denote the group or collection so assembled. Heap is the least definite in its implications; it usually, however, implies a moundlike shape and more or less careless or fortuitous arrangement; it may or may not imply a personal agent, an assemblage of like things, close packing, or a large quantity; as, throw all the discarded clothes into a heap; heap the sand in this corner of the lot; the miser gloated over his heaps of coins; the wind heaps the leaves under the garden wall. Pile, in discriminating use, implies the laying of one thing or one layer on top of another in orderly formation; it usually, but not invariably, implies a personal agent, and an assembling of like things or things of approximately the same size or shape; as, to pile sheets according to their sizes; a pile of silver dollars; to pile logs; a pile of bricks. Stack, like pile, implies orderly and compact arrangement and the assembling of like things; it differs from it in almost invariably suggesting personal agency and a particular shape or form and in having a more restricted range of reference. One stacks hay, straw, grain in the sheaf, and the like, into a conical or a four-sided, round-cornered formation, the latter usually with a sloping top; one stacks firewood when one arranges the pieces neatly into a rectangular pile; one stacks arms, when one sets up rifles (now often three), so that they form a pyramid; so, haystack or hay in the stack; a stack of fagots or lumber. So strongly does stack suggest care in arrangement that it carries specific connotations in some of its applications; thus, to stack cards is to arrange them secretly for cheating; a stack is in Great Britain a measure of stacked coal or firewood equal to four cubic yards. Shock and cock are the narrowest of these terms. Shock is used only of sheaves of grain, as of wheat, rye, or oats, or in the United States stalks of maize, or Indian corn, which are stacked upright with butt ends resting on the ground. "When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock" (J. W. Riley). Cock is used with reference to hay, turf, dung, and the like, stacked in a conical pile; as, a cock of hay; to cock the manure. Mass (as here compared: see mass, n. under BULK) usually suggests amorphousness; it also implies either a capacity in the things which are brought together for cohering with or adhering to each other so as to form a blended or fused whole or a highly compact or dense agglomerate, or an external process which forces them to cohere or adhere; thus, a pasty substance which is a mixture of various ingredients and is used in making pills, troches, and the like, is called a mass by pharmacists; some flowers, like violets, tend to grow in masses or to mass themselves in growing; to mass colors in a painting or in stained-glass windows is to combine the various colors used in any one significant portion of the whole so that though they remain distinct in study of detail they seem to flow into each other and give a unitary effect (often contrasting with that of the other portions) when the painting or window is viewed in perspective. Mass, therefore, usually implies integration but it may be a physical, a spiritual, an emotional, an intellectual, or a purely aesthetic integration; as, to mass one's arguments; "compounding the American people into one common mass" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Dense masses of smoke hung amid the darting snakes of fire" (Meredith). "A vine, remarkable for its tendency, not to spread and ramble, but to mass and mount" (Cather). Bank (the verb is often followed by up) is used chiefly, but not exclusively, in reference to substances which when affected by moisture, freezing, or the like, form or, in extended use, seem to form, into compact masses or which can be massed and shaped; as, to bank up the snow on each side of the path; to bank up a sand pile; to build a snow bank; cloud banks. "The wisest heads in Rome, seeing the clouds banking in the North, had clamoured for the employment of the ablest of Roman commanders" (Buchan).

Ana. *Accumulate, amass, hoard: collect, assemble, *gather.

Con. *Scatter, disperse, dissipate, dispel.

heap, n. Pile, stack, shock, cock, mass, bank. See under HEAP, v.

Ana. *Aggregate, aggregation, conglomerate, conglomeration: collection, assemblage (see under GATHER).

hear, Hear, hearken, hark, listen, list, attend are here compared as meaning to perceive or apprehend through the ears. Hear is both an intransitive and a transitive verb; the others, except in some archaic use, require the addition of to (or unto) when they take an object. Hear, except in extended use, always implies the actual sensation and the response of the auditory nerves to a stimulus; as, he no longer hears well; did you hear that sound? "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard . . . the things which God hath prepared for them that love him" (1 Corinthians ii. 9). Hear may also imply a giving one's ear to something, so that one may be informed, may learn, may judge, may answer fittingly, or the like; in this use, the implication of perception through the auditory sense is often obscured and sometimes lost; as, Judge Blank heard the case of Brown vs. Jones; he has not heard how his son is getting along; I hear that you are going abroad; the Lord heard his prayer. Hearken and hark (usually hearken to or hark to, except in imperatives), now chiefly literary or poetic terms, imply a voluntary exercise of one's auditory sense. Hearken usually also implies compliance or obedience as the end of this act; hark, the appreciative or understanding hearing of that to which one gives ear. "Hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes" (Deuteronomy iv. 1). "Those who possess this inner voice are ready enough to hearken to it, and will hear no other" (T. S. Eliot). "Hark, hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings" (Shak.). Listen is now the common term for the conscious or voluntary effort to hear, especially to hear what is being said; list is its archaic form, still frequently found in poetry; as, the recital of his experiences bored her, but she listened patiently until the end; "the disease of not listening, the malady of not marking" (Shak.). "Great Napoleon Stops his horse, and lists with delight" (Emerson). Listen, like hear in extended use, does not always imply actual hearing or audition; in such cases it usually connotes either thoughtful consideration or a yielding to an argument, a proposal, an appeal, or the like, whether it has been advanced orally or in writing; as, children should listen to their parents' advice; "supposing that the Greeks had listened to . . . proposals. . . to abolish nude statues" (H. Ellis). Attend stresses a concentration of the mind in listening; it implies a following with the intelligence as well as with the ears. "My son, attend to my words; incline thine ear" (Proverbs iv. 20). "We hunted for the lost pistol among the bushes, I with little hope of finding it, while he attended to the bird voices, and frequently asked me to stand or lie still" (Hudson). Though listening was the original and is still a frequent implication in this sense of attend, it has come to be subordinated to the implication of concentration; hence, attend may imply close application to any task requiring mental concentration; as, he was not a good bridge player, for he found it hard to attend to the game; it is impossible, he says, to attend at the same time to driving a car and to a conversation.

hearing. Hearing, audience, audition, although they also agree in meaning the act of listening especially with attention, are here compared only in the sense of a formal opportunity to be heard by a person or persons having authority to question or the power of decision. Hearing is not only the general word, but also a technical term. In legal use, it designates a formal listening by a judge or tribunal to the arguments and proofs offered either in interlocutory proceedings or in a preliminary examination in a criminal case; however, only in equity practice is it applicable to a trial. It is also used in government and politics for a formal opportunity offered to citizens to state their views on proposed legislation or administrative action, or to present their objections to assessments on property, or to give evidence in a legislative or other investigation. Audience is now more often used of a hearing that is granted as a favor or mark of esteem than of one that can be demanded as a right; therefore, it is used particularly in reference to interviews by appointment granted by a sovereign, a high-ranking ecclesiastic, especially the pope, or a diplomatic representative of high standing. "The French ambassador upon that instant Crav'd audience; and the hour, I think, is come To give him hearing" (Shak.). "I had an audience... with the Spanish Minister" (Disraeli). Audition, which has only recently come into use in this sense, is applicable to a hearing by expert judges of a singer, a musician, a public speaker, an actor, or the like, in order to test the merits of his performance with, usually, a view to his possible employment; as, operatic or radio auditions.

heave, v. Raise, *lift, hoist, elevate, boost, rear.

heavenly. *Celestial, empyrean.

Con. Hellish, *infernal: *earthly, earthy, terrestrial, mundane, worldly, mortal, sublunary.

heavy, adj. Heavy, weighty, ponderous, cumbrous, cumbersome, hefty. That is heavy, literally, which is denser and more compact in substance or larger in size or amount than the average of its kind or class and so weighs much more in proportion; as, lead is a heavy metal; a heavy stone; a heavy child for his age; a heavy silk; heavy bread. Figuratively, that is heavy which is charged with something that weighs down the senses or the spirits or that the mind or the body finds difficult to bear or endure; as, "there came through the open door the heavy scent of the lilac" (Wilde); "there was the crushing sense... of having been put down as a tiresome and heavy young man" (A. C. Benson); "When a great writer... creates a speech of his own which is too clumsy to be flexible and too heavy to be intimate" (H. Ellis).

Oftentimes, also, heavy is applied to the heart, the mind, the body, weighed down with grief, worry, weariness, overwork, or the like; as, "the old minister's heart was often heavy in his breast" (Deland); "when he was not too heavy with fatigue" (M. Austin). At other times, the term merely implies a lack of lightness, vivacity, grace, or some other quality which enlivens and stimulates. "Compared with her, other women were heavy and dull... they had not that something in their glance that made one's blood tingle" (Cather). That is weighty, literally, which is actually and not merely relatively heavy; as, the larger trucks will carry the weighty packages; "as weighty bodies to the centre tend" (Pope). Figuratively, that is weighty which is highly important or momentous (as, weighty matters of state; weighty questions for consideration) or which produces a powerful effect or exerts an impressive influence (as, weighty arguments; a weighty speech; a weighty speaker). "There were also weighty reasons of statecraft to influence him" (Buchan). That is ponderous, literally, which is exceedingly heavy because of its size or its massiveness; as, a ponderous shield; a ponderous machine; a ponderous door. "The sepulchre... Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws" (Shak.). That is ponderous, figuratively, which is unduly intricate, involved, complicated, labored, or the like; as, "his ponderous work on the Fairy Mythology of Europe" (Meredith); ponderous jests. "I have heard mathematicians groaning over the demonstrations of Kelvin. Ponderous and clumsy, they bludgeoned the mind into a reluctant assent" (A. Huxley). That is cumbrous or cumbersome, literally, which is so heavy and so bulky that it is difficult to deal with, as in moving or carrying. "The only currency in circulation was of iron, so cumbrous that it was impossible to accumulate or conceal it" (G. L. Dickinson). "Its space was pretty well occupied with the two beds, and the cumbrous furniture that had been bought for a larger house" (Arch. Marshall). "The cumbersome old table with twisted legs" (Dickens). Figuratively, both words are applicable to that which is both ponderous and unwieldy. "He is the Philistine who upholds and aids the heavy, cumbrous, blind, mechanical forces of society" (Wilde). That is hefty (a colloquial term) which one estimates as heavy or weighty, as by holding in one's hands or by measuring with one's eyes; as, a hefty chair; she has grown hefty since I saw her last. Ana. Solid, hard, *firm: oppressing or oppressive, weighing down or upon, depressing (see corresponding verbs at DEPRESS).

height. Height, stature, elevation, altitude mean the distance a thing rises above its base, or the level on which it stands, or the vertical distance between a given level taken as a base and a thing that is above it. Height may be used with reference to anything that can be so measured, whether high or low by any standard of comparison; as, letters not more than one-twentieth of an inch in height; the tree rises to a height of one hundred feet; the airplane reached the unprecedented height of twelve miles. It may be used interchangeably with any of the other words, but it is not so explicit. Stature, except in its figurative sense, is confined to animal bodies, especially to the human body when fully developed; as, he is six feet in stature; malnutrition in childhood often prevents a person from reaching his full stature in maturity. Elevation is applicable chiefly to things which are raised or are thought of as raised; as, an airplane designed to attain an elevation (more precise than height) of seven miles; the sun reaches its highest elevation at noon; Pikes Peak has an elevation of 14,108 feet. Elevation and altitude, however, may suggest determination or reckoning of height by angular measurement; in such cases, although they often connote height so great as to be otherwise incalculable, they are not restricted to what is pre-eminently or even comparatively high; as, the altitude of the triangle formed by the ground and shells fired at an elevation of 45° varies with the distance covered by the individual shells. Otherwise, altitude is applicable only to things which are extremely and not relatively high; as, the altitude of Mars; the altitudes of the Himalayas.

heighten. Enhance, *intensify, aggravate.

Ana. *Exalt, magnify, aggrandize: elevate, *lift, raise: *improve, better.

Helot. *Serf, slave, bondslave, bondsman, bondman, peon, thrall, villein, vassal.

help, v. 1 Help, aid, assist and their corresponding nouns help, aid, assistance are often used with little distinction as meaning (for the verbs) to furnish another person or thing with what is needed, as for the accomplishment of work or the attainment of an end, or (for the nouns) the support so furnished. All usually, but not invariably, imply co-operation or a combination of effort. Help, however, carries a stronger implication of advance toward the end or objective than do the others; as, every little helps; you are hindering rather than helping; a drug that helps one to sleep; please help me over the fence; the food shortage in Germany helped the Allies. Aid strongly suggests the need of help or relief and therefore sometimes imputes weakness to the one aided and strength to the one aiding. "But this she knows... That saints will aid if men will call" (Coleridge). "Cannonballs may aid the truth But thought's a weapon stronger; We'll win our battles by its aid" (C. Mackay). Assist, which seldom loses its etymological implication of standing by, distinctively suggests a secondary role in the assistant or a subordinate character in the assistance; thus, a deputy assists (better than aids) his superior; a good light assists the eyes in reading. "Every additional proof that the world is a closely interwoven system... assists religious belief" (Inge).

Ana. *Support, uphold, back, champion: *benefit, profit, avail, boot, bestead: forward, further, promote, *advance.

Ant. Hinder. — Con. Impede, obstruct, block, bar (see HINDER): *frustrate, thwart, foil, baffle, balk: *embarrass, discomfit: harm, hurt, *injure.

hereditary. Congenital, inborn, inherited, *innate, inbred.

Ana. Transmitted, conveyed (see CARRY): *inherent, constitutional, intrinsic, ingrained.

heredity. *Inheritance.

heretic, n. Heretic, schismatic, sectarian, sectary, dissenter, nonconformist come into comparison as denoting a person who from the point of view of a given or understood church or religious faith is not orthodox in his beliefs. Heretic applies to one who teaches and maintains doctrines that are contrary to those which are actually taught by the church or faith to which he belongs or has belonged; as, the precursors of Luther were for the most part regarded as heretics; "He drew a circle that shut me out— Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout" (Markham). Schismatic applies to one who (often unjustifiably or contentiously) separates from, or especially provokes division (or schism) in, a church or communion, usually by differing on a minor point or points of doctrine; thus, from the point of view of the Roman Catholic Church, those Eastern Christians who seceded to form the Orthodox Church are schismatics, whereas Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, and other leaders of the Reformation, are heretics; to the Church of England, the early Puritans and Quakers were schismatics. Sectarian and sectary applied originally, especially in Great Britain, to a member of a heretical or schismatical body, but the former term now applies chiefly to the member of any religious denomination or sect. Sectary, which is now chiefly historical, more than sectarian, implies membership in a sect that is relatively small and composed of ardent, and often by connotation, narrow-minded and bigoted, partisans; as, the passing of the bill by Parliament was advocated both by churchmen and by sectarians; "Collectivist movements within Christianity have proceeded almost entirely from the Anabaptists and other sectaries" (Inge). Dissenter applies to one who separates himself

(without the implication of causing a division or break conveyed by schismatic) from an established church, specifically from the Church of England; nonconformist is ordinarily synonymous with dissenter, but the term has been applied in England to men who refused to accept religious doctrines or to follow religious practices that are imposed by the state, or Established, Church; in this sense, many of the 2000 clergymen who refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity in 1662 were regarded as nonconformists; Roman Catholics in England (as a class) have been held to be nonconformists rather than dissenters, since they did not accept the Church of England at any time. Nevertheless, the terms are often used interchangeably; as, "Wesley was not a schismatic, or even, in the doctrinal sense, a dissenter. He desired, not to secede from the Established Church, but to fill it with new life" (Atlantic Monthly); "The English and Scotch Nonconformists have a great horror of establishments and endowments for religion" (Arnold).

Ana. Freethinker, deist, unbeliever (see ATHEIST): *skeptical, agnostic: *renegade, apostate.

heretical. *Heterodox.

heritage. Heritage, inheritance, patrimony, birthright are synonymous terms when they denote something which one receives or is entitled to receive by succession, as from a parent or predecessor. Heritage is not only poetical or elevated but it is also the most widely applicable of these words, for it may apply to anything that is passed on not only to one's heir or heirs but to the generation or generations that succeed, as a tradition, a right, a trade, the effect of a cause, or the like; as, "[Livy] made the average Roman realize the grandeur of the past and the magnitude of his heritage" (Buchan); "our neglect of the magnificent spiritual heritage which we possess in our own history and literature" (Inge); "But the war had left its heritage of poverty. . . of disease, of misery, of discontent" (R. Macaulay). Inheritance strictly applies to that which passes from parent to children, whether it be money, property, traits of character, or the like (as, "My father's blessing, and this little coin is my inheritance" — Beaumont & Fletcher); but the term may be used in heritage when such descent is literally or figuratively implied (as, "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children" — Proverbs xiii. 22). Inheritance, but not heritage, may also apply to the fact of inheriting or to the means by which something passes into one's possession; as, to come into possession of a property by inheritance (not heritage); "the power of regulating the devolution of property by inheritance or will upon the death of the owner" (Justice Holmes). Patrimony applies strictly to the money or property inherited from one's father, but is also used (especially figuratively) in the more general sense of ancestral inheritance; as, "to reave the orphan of his patrimony" (Shak.); "Content. . . to leave his patrimony not worse but something better than he found it" (Quiller-Couch). Birthright is now more often used in its extended sense (see RIGHT) than in its original sense of inheritance, or the property, goods, privileges, or rank which belong to one by reason of one's birth. But in this sense birthright is often more specific than inheritance, because it usually applies only to that which belongs to the first-born son by the law of primogeniture; as, "And Jacob said [to his older brother Esau], Sell me this day thy birthright. And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit shall this birthright do to me. . . ? and he sold his birthright unto Jacob" (Genesis xxv. 31-33).

hermaphrodite, hermaphroditic. *Bisexual, androgynous, epicene.

hermit. Eremit, anchorite, *recluse, cenobite.

Con. *Religious, monk, friar, nun: *ascetic, mystic.

heroism. Heroism, valor (or valour), prowess, gallantry are synonymous terms when they mean conspicuous courage or bravery as displayed in conduct or behavior, especially in conflict. Heroism, the strongest term, in discriminating use implies superlative, often transcendent, courage or bravery, not only as exhibited by deeds of daring in the presence of danger, as in a battle, a fire, or a wreck at sea, but in carrying through without submitting or yielding an eminently arduous but exalted enterprise, such as an exploration, or in the same spirit fulfilling a superhumanly high purpose where the odds are against one, such as the conquest of self or the institution of a great moral reform. "Acts of heroism are in the very essence of them but rare: for if they were common they would not be acts of heroism" (Bentham). "The characteristic of genuine heroism is its persistency. All men have wandering impulses, fits and starts of generosity. . . The heroic cannot be the common, nor the common the heroic" (Emerson). Valor, in earlier use, was often applied to the quality of mind, as distinct from the manifestation of that quality in action. "My valour is certainly going. . . I feel it oozing out" (Sheridan). In current use commonly, and in past use occasionally, both the possession of a high degree of courage and the exhibition of that quality, especially in fighting, are implied; as, to be awarded a medal for valor in action. In contrast with heroism, valor implies illustrious rather than superlative courage or bravery, it carries a far weaker implication of a persistent struggle against odds but a stronger one of fearlessness and audacity in conflict with a powerful enemy. "Real valour consists not in being insensible to danger, but in being prompt to confront and disarm it" (Scott). "Wherever valour true is found, True modesty will there abound" (W. S. Gilbert). Prowess, which is now a literary term in its original sense, differs from valor chiefly in its greater emphasis upon brilliant achievements or exploits in arms. "How insignificant a thing. . . does personal prowess appear compared with the fortitude of patience and heroic martyrdom" (Wordsworth). "Chevaliers were seldom intellectually brilliant in the mediaeval romances [romances], and even the 'Chansons de Geste' liked better to talk of their prowess than of their wit" (H. Adams). In current loose use, prowess oftentimes loses its basic implication of distinguished skill and bravery in arms and means little more than distinguished skill; as, prowess in debating or in athletics. Gallantry far more than valor, its close synonym, stresses mettle and spirit as well as courage and an almost gay indifference to danger or hardship. "Few augured the possibility that the encounter could terminate well for. . . the Disinherited Knight, yet his courage and gallantry secured the general good wishes of the spectators" (Scott).

Ana. Bravery, intrepidity, dauntlessness, doubtiness (see corresponding adjectives at BRAVE): *courage, tenacity, resolution, mettle, spirit: *fortitude, pluck, grit, guts, sand.

hesitancy. *Hesitation.

Ana. Reluctance, averseness, indisposedness or indisposition (see corresponding adjectives at DISINCLINED): faltering, wavering, vacillation (see corresponding verbs at HESITATE).

Con. Determination, *decision: resolution, tenacity, spirit, *courage: backbone, pluck, grit, guts, sand, *fortitude.

hesitant. Reluctant, loath, averse, indisposed, *disinclined.

Ana. *Fearful, afraid, apprehensive: diffident, *shy.

bashful; recoiling, finching, blenching, shrinking (see RECOIL).

Con. *Eager, avid, keen: resolute, steadfast, stanch (see FAITHFUL).

hesitate. Hesitate, waver, vacillate, falter agree in meaning to show irresolution or uncertainty. Hesitate, the general term, usually implies a pause or other sign of indecision before one makes up one's mind what to do, say, choose, or the like; as, "I have for many months hesitated about the propriety of allowing...any part of my narrative to come before the public eye" (De Quincey); "When delivering a speech to pour it out in a copious stream, without pausing to take breath or hesitating over a word" (Hudson). Waver, as here compared (see also SWING, 2), implies hesitation after a decision has been reached and so usually connotes weakness or retreat; as, "Let us hold fast...without wavering" (Hebrews x. 23); the front line which had been advancing rapidly wavered under the heavy fire. "You waver in your convictions" (Jefferies). Vacillate implies prolonged hesitation resulting from one's inability to reach a fixed or final decision; the term therefore connotes alternate decision and indecision or a shifting in opinions, choices, or the like. "He may pause, but he must not hesitate,—and tremble, but he must not vacillate" (Kuskin). "He had vacillated between various substitutes for Oswald up to the very moment when he named the four upon whom he decided finally" (H. G. Wells). Falter suggests a wavering in purpose or action that is evident or is made evident in trembling, the breaking of the voice, or other signs of fear or nervousness; as, "with voice That did not falter though the heart was moved" (Wordsworth); "Neither to change, nor faller, nor repent" (Shelley); "His eyes did not flinch and his tongue did not falter" (Conrad).

Ana. Balk, boggle, stick, stickle, scruple, *demur, shy, fluctuate, oscillate (see SWING).

hesitation. Hesitation, hesitancy are often used interchangeably as meaning a hesitating. But hesitation more commonly applies to the act or fact, or to a sign of hesitating; as, to accept without hesitation; "without hesitation Flora seized her father round the body and pulled back" (Conrad); "She drove without any uncertainty or hesitation as to her route" (Deland). Hesitancy, on the other hand, applies to the feeling or the mood of one who hesitates; as, to feel great hesitancy about accepting; she never experiences hesitancy when called upon for assistance. "To [Henry] James's intimates...these elaborate hesitancies...were like a cobweb bridge flung from his mind to theirs" (E. Wharton).

Ana. *Uncertainty, doubt, dubiety, dubiousity, mistrust; procrastination, delaying or delay, dawdling (see corresponding verbs at DELAY).

Con. Resolution, spirit, mettle, *courage, tenacity; *confidence, assurance, self-possession, aplomb.

heterodox. Heterodox, heretical come into comparison when they mean not in conformity with orthodox beliefs or teachings. That is heterodox which is at variance with accepted doctrines (especially religious or scientific doctrines), interpretation (as of the Bible, the Constitution, or the like), or any view regarded as authorized by reason, revelation, tradition, or convention; as, Milton's heterodox opinions on divorce and the episcopacy; Darwin's contemporaries were slow in accepting his heterodox theory of the origin of species. That is heretical which is not only heterodox, but is regarded as erroneous and as destructive of truth; as, "a great Christian society defending itself against heretical anarchy from within" (Belloc); heretical books; the propagation of heretical doctrines; Galileo's writings championing the heterodox Copernican theory of the solar system were condemned by the Inquisition as heretical.

Ant. Orthodox.

heterogeneous. *Miscellaneous, motley, promiscuous, assorted.

Ant. Homogeneous. — Con. Uniform, identical, alike, akin, analogous, comparable, parallel (see SIMILAR).

hew. Chop, *cut, carve, slit, slash.

Ana. Cleave, rive, split (see TEAR).

hide, n. *Skin, pelt, fell, rind, bark, peel.

hide, v. Hide, conceal, screen, secrete, cache, bury, ensconce agree in meaning to withdraw or to withhold from sight or observation. Hide (the general term) and conceal are often interchangeable. But hide may or may not suggest intent (as, "Let me go, that I may hide myself in the field"—1 Samuel xx. 5; the snow hides all the ground), or a putting into a place out of the range of others' sight (as, to hide the money under a mattress; "He hid somewhere in his grimy little soul a genuine love for music"—Kipling). Conceal, on the other hand, more often implies intention (as, "Hidden things that had never been concealed, that had merely been dropped into forgotten corners and out-of-the-way places, to be found a long while afterward"—E. M. Roberts), or effective hiding (as, "Sophia had held that telegram concealed in her hand and its information concealed in her heart"—Bennett), or a refusal to divulge (as, "I am glad to be constrain'd to utter that Which torments me to conceal" Shak.). Screen implies a hiding or concealment of someone (or something) in danger of being seen or known by interposing between him (or it) and others a screen, curtain, or other device which shelters and prevents discovery; as, "Wildevve screened himself under a bush and waited" (Hardy); "The prominence afforded to them [unemployment and other causes of a depression] helps to screen the great fundamental source of trouble, the lack of any conscious equitable government of industry" (J. A. Hobson). Secrete, as here compared, implies a depositing, often by stealth, in a place screened from view or unknown to others; as, to secrete smuggled goods in a cave; squirrels secrete their winter supply of nuts. Cache implies an even more carefully chosen hiding place than secrete, for it usually implies protection from thieves, from the elements, and the like: in current use it often suggests secure storage more than concealment; as, the explorers took only enough food and ammunition for the three days' trip, the rest they cached in pits dug for that purpose. Bury implies a covering with (or in) something that hides or conceals or serves as a hiding place; as, to bury one's face in one's hands; "his intention had been to bury the incident in his bosom" (E. Wharton). Ensconce, in earlier use, implied a placing oneself securely in hiding; as, "She shall not see me: I will ensconce me behind the arras" (Shak.). The term now usually means to establish oneself snugly or comfortably, commonly with no idea of concealment; as, to ensconce oneself in an armchair before a cosy fire.

Ana. Cloak, mask, *disguise, dissemble: *suppress, repress.

Con. Expose, parade, flaunt, display, exhibit, *show: emerge, loom, *appear.

high. High, tall, lofty agree in meaning above the average in height. High, the general term (opposed to low), implies marked extension upward; the term is applied chiefly to things which rise from a base or foundation (as, a high hill; a high building) or are placed at a conspicuous height above a lower level, such as a floor or the ground (as, a high ceiling; a high-arched bridge). Tall (often opposed to short) applies to that which rises or grows high as compared with others of its kind, especially when its breadth or diameter is small in proportion to its height; as, a high (not tall) hill; a high (or tall) tree; a tall (better than high) pole; a tall (not high) man. Lofty is often poetical for high, but it usually implies even greater and more imposing altitude; as, a lofty mountain peak; a lofty pinnacle; lofty clouds; "the loftiest star of unascended heaven" (Shelley). High alone of these words is used to express degree or intensity; as, high speed, high power, high color, high seasoning; cf. a high wind, a high fever. Figuratively, high connotes distinction, elevation, sometimes pride or arrogance; as, "Heaven's high King" (Milton); "an high look and a proud heart" (Psalms ci. 5); "She... thought him cold, High, self-contain'd, and passionless" (Tennyson). "Nobody else could utter those two words as he did, with such gravity and high courtesy" (Cather). Lofty suggests moral grandeur or dignity; as, "exultation... Solemn, serene and lofty" (Shelley); "That lofty musing on the ultimate nature of things which constitutes, for Pascal, 'the whole dignity and business of man'" (A. Huxley). The term may also imply (especially as applied to persons) haughtiness or superciliousness; as, she is greatly disliked because of her lofty airs. Tall is now rarely figurative except in slang or in colloquial use, when it often implies exaggeration or departure from strict truth; as, he is given to tall stories or to tall talk. In older and now practically obsolete English, tall implied qualities not necessarily associated with height, such as comeliness (as, "he was a tall proper man"—Henry More), deftness (as, a man tall of his hands) and doughtiness or sturdiness (as, "The old fellow's spirit is as tall and as gallant as ever"—Irving). Ana. Elevated, lifted, raised, reared (see LIFT, v.): *deep, profound, abysmal: heightened, enhanced, intensified (see INTENSIFY): increased, augmented (see INCREASE, v.). Ant. Low.

hind, adj. Hinder, rear, *posterior, after, back.

Ant. Fore, front.

hinder, adj. Hind, rear, *posterior, after, back.

Ant. Front, fore.

hinder, v. Hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar, dam agree in meaning to put obstacles in the way of a person or thing or of his or its action. To hinder (etymologically, to put or keep behind) is to check or hold back someone or something in action or about to act, move, start, or the like: the term usually stresses harmful or annoying delay or interference with progress; as, "From your affairs I hinder you too long" (Shak.); "[the artist's] education is... hindered rather than helped by the ordinary processes of society which constitute education for the ordinary man" (T. S. Eliot). Sometimes, however, hinder definitely implies prevention; as, the rain hindered their going. To impede (etymologically, to entangle the feet) is to impose upon a person or thing that is moving, in action, in progress, or the like, something that slows him or it up, as by clogging, hampering, or fettering: the term seldom suggests the stopping of movement or progress, but it commonly implies difficulties so great that movement or action are painfully slow or nearly impossible; as, "around their tattooed limbs they often wore coiled brass rings or bands, which in time became so tight that they impeded the circulation" (V. Heiser); "the teaching of mathematics is... impeded by the use of Roman symbols" (Grandgent); "He... placed his hand on hers, impeding the rapidity of her embroidery needle" (R. Macaulay). To obstruct is to hinder free or easy passage: it implies interference with something in motion or in progress or obstacles in the path or channel; thus, fallen trees may be said to obstruct the highways, or to obstruct traffic, at various points; so, the recalcitrant senators succeeded in obstructing legislation for several days; the tall building obstructed the light from the west; the view was obstructed by several tall trees. To block (or block up) is to obstruct so effectively as to close up all means of egress or ingress and to prevent all passage for a time; as, shifting sand blocked the entrance to the channel; to block a child's ambition by indifference or discouragement. "In these wild places... a snow-storm... does not block the King's highways and paralyze traffic as [in] London" (Jeffries). To bar is to block or to prohibit passage, ingress, or egress; as, "a long freight train... barred the passage along the road" (S. Anderson); "that route is barred to steamers" (Kipling). Sometimes the implication of prohibition is so strong that there is no hint of blocking. "The law of arms doth bar The use of venom'd shot in war" (Buller). To dam (often dam up) is to obstruct with obstacles that prevent a continued flow, as of water, emotion, or the like, and so provide no outlet or exit; as, fallen trees dammed up the brook; "The strait pass was damm'd With dead men" (Shak.); dammed-up emotion. Ana. *Arrest, check, interrupt: *hamper, fetter, clog, trammel, shackle, manacle, hog-tie: *restrain, inhibit, curb, check, snaffle: baffle, balk, *frustrate.

Ant. Further. — Con. *Advance, forward, promote: *speed, accelerate, quicken.

hint, n. Occasion, *opportunity, time, chance, break.

hint, v. Intimate, insinuate, imply, *suggest.

Ana. Allude, advert, *refer.

Con. Voice, utter, *express, vent: declare, *assert, affirm, aver.

hire, n. *Wage, wages, pay, salary, stipend, fee, emolument, screw.

hire, v. 1 *Employ.

Con. Fire, discharge, *dismiss, cashier, sack.

2 Hire, let, lease, rent, charter come into comparison when they refer to the taking or engaging of something or the granting the use of something for a stipulated price or rate. Because some of these words are referable only to the act of the owner and some only to the act of the one who engages, and because they vary in their applications, they are not always true synonyms. In very precise use, hire and let are complementary yet opposite terms, the former meaning to engage the use or occupancy of something at a price or rate, and the latter meaning to grant its use or occupancy for a stipulated return; as, we hired the house for the summer after having some difficulty in persuading the owner to let it. "Sometimes a family would hire them [Norfolk wherries, or barges], more generally a group of young men from the City or from the Universities. They let [idiomatic for were let] at a good price" (Arch. Marshall). Nevertheless hire, especially when used of persons or, by implication, their services, may be employed in either sense; as, to hire a servant; to hire oneself (often with out) as a servant; to hire workers by the day; men willing to hire themselves out at any wage. In most discriminating use, lease means to let on a lease, that is, on a contract by which the owner conveys to another for a given term, and usually at a given rate, certain land, buildings, or similar property. "The lands in America [in Colonial days]...are in general not tenanted nor leased out to farmers" (Adam Smith). In current English, lease is often employed in the sense of to hire on a lease, but this use is not approved by all authorities; as, they have leased the house from Mr. Blank for three years. Etymologically and in long-continued good use, rent implies the payment in money (or payment in kind) for the use of land and the buildings thereon. As long as this idea is stressed, the verb may denote either to hire or to let a property; as, they rent their house from the college; the college rents these houses only to professors. In American, but rarely if ever in British, use, rent (in the sense of either hire or let) is employed in reference to various commodities; as, to rent books from a circulating library; to rent an automobile for the summer. Charter strictly means to hire (a ship or vessel) by charter party, that is, by a contract similar to a lease whereby the use of a ship is given for a certain time and the safe delivery of its cargo is promised; as, "It was impossible to charter a ship for the purpose" (Irving). In extended use, charter is also used of vehicles, especially public vehicles or similar means of transportation; as, to charter a bus or an airplane.

Ana. Secure, obtain, *get, procure. engage, contract, *promise.

hireling, adj. *Mercenary, hack, hackney, venal.

Ana. Servile, menial, *subservient: *mean, abject, sordid.

history. History, chronicle, annals, as here compared, agree in meaning a written record of events important in the life or career of a race, a nation, an institution, or the like. A history is more than a mere recital of what has occurred; in the modern conception, at least, it requires order and purpose in narration, but not necessarily a strictly chronological order nor a common definitely defined purpose. Usually, also, it is thought of as an interpretation of events especially in their causal relationships. It may exhibit fullness and completeness, or, on the other hand, selection of details, especially when a single aspect is considered or a thesis is to be proved; as, Macaulay's History of England; Justin McCarthy's History of Our Own Times. A chronicle is a recital of events in chronological order without any attempt at interpretation or, usually, literary style; its chief function is to record events; as, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Annals is not always clearly distinguishable from chronicle except in its emphasis upon the progress or succession of events from year to year. The term may or may not imply a discursive treatment or a continued narrative, for some of the ancient annals are merely records of important events in each year of the time covered; thus, the annals of the Four Masters, a 17th-century work by Irish scholars, begins with A.M. [anno mundi, or year of the world] 2242 and ends with A.D. 1616. However, in the selection of titles for modern historical works, these distinctions are not always observed, for chronicle and annals are sometimes chosen as less formal or pretentious than history or because chronicle stresses narrative quality and annals the selection of noteworthy events.

In their extended or figurative senses, only history and annals are synonymous. Both of these words designate more or less shifting abstractions. History usually signifies the known past, or the sum total of events that are remembered because recorded by historians, evidenced by documents, monuments, remains, or the like; as, nothing like this has happened hitherto in the history of man. "A land without ruins is a land without memories—a land without memories is a land without history" (A. J. Ryan). Annals most often signifies the sum total of events, with their dates, that have become fixed in the mind because of the momentousness, often tragic momentousness, of those events; as, "The short and simple annals of the poor" (Gray); "happy the people whose annals are blank" (Carlyle). Chronicle, on the other hand, is often applied to something concrete, as a person or thing that records, relates, or manifests events as they happen. "Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?...let them be well used; for they are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time:...you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live" (Shak.).

histrionic, adj. *Dramatic, theatrical, dramaturgic, melodramatic.

Ana. Acting, playing, impersonating, personating (see ACT, v.).

Ana. *Carry, bear, convey: *receive, admit, take: house, lodge, *harbor, shelter. *include, comprehend.

3 *Have, own, possess, enjoy.

Ana. Control, direct, manage, *conduct.

hole, n. Hole, hollow, cavity, pocket, void, vacuum come into comparison only when they mean an open or unfilled space in a thing. Hole may apply to an opening in a solid body that is or that suggests a depression or an excavation (as, "Those holes Where eyes did once inhabit"— Shak.; a hole in the ground) or to one that passes through the material from surface to surface (as, to look through a hole in the wall; a hole in a garment). Hollow, which etymologically implies opposition to solid, strictly suggests an unfilled space within a solid object, usually, but not necessarily, one that has a surface opening; as, a cave is a hollow in a rock; a nest in the hollow of a tree trunk. The term, however, is often applied to a depression in a surface (as, the ground was not quite smooth, but had many little heights and hollows), and specifically to a deep and usually narrow valley, such as a gully or ravine. "I hate the dreadful hollow behind the little wood" (Tennyson). Cavity is a somewhat more learned word than hollow with much the same implications as the latter in its strict sense. The words are often used interchangeably, but cavity is preferred in scientific and professional use; as, a cavity in a tooth; the abdominal cavity. Pocket is often employed in place of cavity for an abnormal or irregular formation, such as a bubblelike one in a substance or a sacklike one in a body; it is particularly referred to one that is a source of danger, especially in possessing the tendency to hold or to collect a foreign substance, such as dirt, air, pus, and the like; as, a pus pocket in the lungs; a pocket in a casting; an air pocket in a pipe supposedly full of liquid interferes with the flow of the latter. "We found many persons at work . . . searching for veins and pockets of gold" (B. Taylor). Void applies to any apparently empty space, especially one of marked extent or, figuratively, of conspicuous duration, whether in a thing that is normally continuous (as, voids in a wall where the windows and doors are to be) or between things that are normally separate (as, the immense void between the earth and the nearest of the planets). "We suffer when we have time to spare and no printed matter with which to plug the void" (A. Huxley). Vacuum, in its strictest sense, applies to space entirely devoid of matter; more commonly, however, it is applied to the space within an enclosed vessel in which by mechanical means the air has been practically (though seldom completely) exhausted. In its figurative use, the term applies to a condition or situation which resembles a true vacuum in its emptiness of all that normally should fill it or exert influence on anyone or anything that remains in it. "You are not asked, as you are by so many novelists, to concern yourself with the fortunes of two or three people who live in a vacuum . . . but with the fortunes of all the sorts and conditions of men who make up the world in which we all live" (Maugham). "He felt a sort of emptiness, almost like a vacuum in his soul" (D. H. Lawrence).

Ana. *Aperture, orifice, interstice: perforation, puncture, bore, prick (see corresponding verbs at PERFORATE): slit, slash, cut (see CUT, v.).

holiness. Holiness, sanctity are very close synonyms which are often used without distinction to mean either the state or the character of one who is spiritually perfect or of that which is sacred or hallowed. Holiness more often implies spiritual perfection, whether intrinsic and essential (as, the holiness of the Lord) or acquired by effort (as, the holiness of a saint), than it does sacredness, although the latter implication is not uncommon. "And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it" (Isaiah xxxv. 8). "Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, for ever" (Psalms xciii. 5). Sanctity may be used either as denoting saintliness, or the holiness attained by a saint (as, to die in the odor of sanctity; "a few of them [bishops] were men of eminent sanctity" —Burke), or the quality of being sacred, or by law (especially by natural or divine law) immune from violation, as, "the sense of the dignity of human nature is an even more civilized feeling than the sense of the sanctity of human life" (Brownell); "There is no greater sanctity in the right to combine than in the right to make other contracts" (Justice Holmes).

Ana. Sacredness, divineness or divinity, spirituality, blessedness, religiousness (see corresponding adjectives at HOLY): devoutness or devotion, piousness or piety (see corresponding adjectives at DEVOUT): *goodness, virtue, rectitude.

hollow, adj. Empty, *vain, nugatory, otiose, idle.

Ana. & Con. See those at EMPTY, adj. 2.

hollow, n. Cavity, *hole, pocket, void, vacuum.

Ana. Excavation, digging (see corresponding verbs at DIG): *gulf, chasm, abyss: orifice, *aperture.

holy. Holy, sacred, divine, spiritual, religious, blessed are here compared chiefly as epithets applied to persons or things associated with religion or worship and therefore either regarded with special reverence or veneration or thought of as having a character apart from that which is material or secular. Their choice is often a matter of idiom rather than of meaning inherent in the term. Holy (for sense of holy as full of holiness, see HOLINESS) usually implies some quality or some attribute in the thing itself which makes it either suitable for use in worship or an object of veneration. As the strongest of these terms in its suggestion of a claim upon one's reverence, it is the only one directly applied to the Supreme Being in praise or laudation (as, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty"—Revelation iv. 8); it also forms a part of some titles of the godhead or of a person of the Trinity (as, the Holy Trinity; the Holy Spirit; the Holy Redeemer). It is also applied to some persons or group of persons as a mark of highest reverence or esteem; as, the Holy Family (i.e., Mary, Joseph, and Jesus); the Holy Father (i.e., the Pope); the Holy Synod (i.e., the governing body in some Orthodox churches). The term is variously applied, as in the names of the central Eucharistic service of Christian churches (as, Holy Communion; the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass), in the names of places and things associated with the life and death of Christ (as, the Holy Land; the Holy Cross), in the names of material things that are blessed for use in religious services (as, holy water; holy bread), in the names of days or periods of time set apart for pious observance (as, a holy day; Holy Week). These illustrate the chief but not the only uses of holy as an epithet: in more general use, the word is often chosen when one wishes to impute to that which is so described some inherent character that dissociates it from that which is mundane, material, or transitory, as, "So holy and so perfect is my love" (Shak.); "All is holy where devotion kneels" (Holmes). Sacred (as here compared: see also SACRED, 2) differs chiefly from holy in implying a character given to a thing by blessing, dedication, consecration to religion or worship or to the uses of religion or worship, or by its being devoted wholly to such ends or uses: the term therefore usually suggests an opposition to that which is profane or which exists for profane uses; thus, the vessels used in a Eucharistic service are preferably called sacred vessels; the vestments worn in church services are called sacred vestments; sacred (as opposed to profane) history is Biblical history or history dealing with Biblical characters or Biblical events; "sacred literature" (as opposed to "profane literature") sometimes is equal in its denotation to any or all of the books of the Bible, and sometimes to any or all of the books such as the Bible, the Talmud, the Koran, etc., which are regarded by various religions as sources of revealed truth; so, a sacred writing; Sacred Writ; sacred music; sacred and profane love. In more general use, sacred applies chiefly to that which one treasures as a thing apart, not to be violated or contaminated by being put to vulgar or low uses or associated with vulgar or low ends. "When they saw all that was sacred to them laid waste, the Navajos lost heart. They did not surrender; they simply ceased to fight" (Cather). Divine, in its oldest and most definite sense, implies either the character of deity or an origin from or an association with deity; thus, "divine being" implies both a difference from "human being" and from "angelic being" and the possession of the nature or essence of deity (as, the belief that Christ is both human and divine); a divine right is one that comes from God; divine service is a service having for its end the worship of God. In its weaker senses, divine may suggest a supernatural or a superhuman character or origin, or, in hyperbolic use, a perfection that is above that which is found on earth; as, "that mighty orb of song, The divine Milton" (Wordsworth); "the strains... of divinest music" (F. W. Farrar); "By what magic was it that this divine sweet creature could be allied with that old churl!" (Meredith). Spiritual implies an opposition in character or in quality to that which is bodily, material, earthy, or mundane: it may suggest incorporeal existence (as, angels are conceived of as spiritual beings; the spiritual part of man) or independence of that which is physical or sensible (as, a spiritual marriage; spiritual as opposed to earthly love), or a definite relation to the soul or spirit in its aspiration toward or dependence on God or in its perception of eternal values (as, "the responsibility of human nature, not merely on the moral side, but equally on the spiritual side"—C. Mackenzie; "The emotion of Morris is not more refined or more spiritual [than that of Marvell]; it is merely more vague"—T. S. Eliot). Spiritual in several legal and theological phrases is more or less equivalent to ecclesiastical and in this sense usually implies an opposition to temporal or civil; thus, in British use, a spiritual lord, or lord spiritual, is a bishop or archbishop of the Church of England who has a right to sit in the House of Lords; so, the spiritual versus the temporal power. Religious (for the application of this term to persons, see DEVOUT) implies an opposition to secular and a relation of some kind to religion; thus, religious history (cf. sacred history, above) is the history of a religion or religions; religious literature is not the same as sacred literature (see above) but has a character that is determined by religion or by religious belief or feeling; religious music, unlike sacred music, is not necessarily suitable for use in services or prayer, for, although it includes sacred music, the term may also apply to music not composed for church use, but animated by feeling or prompted by themes associated with religion. "He stated that his discourses to people were to be sometimes secular, and sometimes religious, but never dogmatic" (Hardy). "Except for the nominal subjects of the legends, one sees nothing religious about them; the medallions, when studied with the binocle, turn out to be less religious than decorative" (H. Adams). Blessed, which etymologically means consecrated, is literally used in the phrase "the Blessed Sacrament" (i.e., the Eucharist, or the sacrament which involves the rite of consecration). But that phrase usually also suggests a supremely sacred and love-inspiring character, and it is that connotation rather than the implication of consecration which obtains in the phrases our Blessed Lord and the Blessed Virgin. In its derived senses, blessed means beatified; that is, supremely happy because enjoying the sight of God in heaven (as, the blessed spirits in heaven) or, in Roman Catholic usage, so designated because, having gone through the process called beatification (the second step toward canonization), one has been adjudged worthy of veneration; as, the Blessed Isaac Jogues (now a canonized saint). So, in general use, blessed sometimes means worthy of particular veneration, love, or the like. "We have no green vegetables here in winter, and no one seems ever to have heard of that blessed plant, the lettuce" (Cather).

Ana. Hallowed, consecrated, dedicated (see DEVOTE): adored, worshiped, venerated, revered, revered (see REVERE): *devout, pious, religious.

honest. *Upright, just, conscientious, scrupulous, honorable.

Ana. Truthful, veracious (see corresponding nouns at TRUTH): candid, open, plain, *frank: *straightforward, aboveboard, forthright: *fair, equitable, dispassionate, objective.

Ant. Dishonest. — Con. Mendacious, lying, untruthful, deceitful (see DISHONEST).

honesty. Honesty, honor (or honour), integrity, probity agree in meaning uprightness as evidenced in one's character and actions. Honesty implies refusal to lie, steal, defraud, or deceive under any circumstances; as, you can rely on his honesty; he is a man of scrupulous honesty; "in business matters it [New York in the 1870's] exacted a limpid and impeccable honesty" (E. Wharton); "this crisis will be surmounted if the Church has the faith and courage, and, above all, the common honesty, to face it candidly" (Inge). Honor, as here compared (see FAME), adds to honesty the implication of high-mindedness or a nice sense of allegiance to the standards of one's profession, calling, or position; as, business honor is the foundation of trade; "I could not love thee, dear, so much, Lov'd I not honour more" (Lovelace); "The fourth generation of Ralstons had nothing left in the way of convictions save an acute sense of honour in private and business matters" (E. Wharton). Integrity implies such rectitude that one is incorruptible or incapable of being false to a trust or a responsibility or to one's own standards; as, "his unimpeachable integrity as treasurer of a widows' and orphans' fund" (N. Hawthorne). "The poet's sense of responsibility to nothing but his own inner voice, is perhaps his only way of preserving poetic integrity against the influences of a perverse generation" (Day Lewis). Probity stresses tried or proved honesty or integrity; as, "That sort of probity which such men as Bailey possess" (Keats); "as a man of indisputable probity... Geake was entrusted with many odd jobs of this kind [collecting rents]" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. Veracity, *truth, verity: uprightness, justness, conscientiousness, scrupulousness (see corresponding adjectives at UPRIGHT): candidness or candor, openness, plainness, frankness (see corresponding adjectives at FRANK): reliability, trustworthiness, dependability (see corresponding adjectives at RELIABLE): rectitude, virtue, *goodness.

Ant. Dishonesty. — Con. Untruthfulness, deceitfulness, mendaciousness or mendacity (see corresponding adjectives at DISHONEST): guile, duplicity, *deceit.

honor or honour, n. 1 Glory, renown, *fame, celebrity, éclat, reputation, repute, notoriety.

Ana. Esteem, respect, *regard, admiration: reverence, veneration, worship, adoration (see under REVERE): prestige, credit, authority, *influence, weight.

Ant. Dishonour. — Con. *Disgrace, disrepute, shame, ignominy, infamy.

2 Honor (or honour), homage, reverence, deference, obeisance are here compared as words meaning respect or esteem shown another as his due or claimed by him as a right. Honor may apply to the recognition of one's title to great respect or esteem or to any expression or manifestation of such respect and esteem; as, to hold every good and conscientious man in high honor; he declined the honor that was offered him. Homage (as here considered: see ALLGIANCE, 1) adds to honor implications of accompanying praise or tributes of esteem, especially from those who owe allegiance or service; as, "All these are... Thy gentle ministers, who come to pay Thee homage, and acknowledge thee their Lord" (Milton). In its extended use, the term carries a stronger implication of a worshipful attitude than honor carries; as, "To the poetry of Byron the world has ardently paid homage" (Arnold); " 'They say I'm handsome.' 'You're lovely, Bella!' She drank in his homage" (Meredith). Reverence (as here considered: see also REVERENCE) implies profound respect mingled with love or devotion; as, "In general those parents have the most reverence who deserve it" (Johnson); "What a sweet reverence is that when a young man... almost chides himself for longing to bring her [his beloved] close to his heart" (N. Hawthorne). Deference implies such respect for the person or his position, or such reverence for his personality, or such honor for his years or achievements, or the like, that one courteously yields or submits one's own judgment, opinion, or preference to his; as, the arrangements for the flower show were altered out of deference to the wishes of the duchess; "A certain deference, not to say servility, to the heads of colleges is perhaps necessary to a physician that means to establish himself here" (Gray); "a carriage [i.e., a bearing] which, while it indicated deference to the court, indicated also habitual self-possession and self-respect" (Macaulay); "An attitude of hostility to aristocracy because it was aristocracy, was as incomprehensible to him as an attitude of deference" (Galsworthy). Obeisance implies a show of honor or reverence by some act or gesture that indicates submission, humility, or the like; as, "The Spanish prince was welcomed... by a goodly company of English lords, assembled to pay him their obeisance" (Prescott). Sometimes, the term is used in place of one of the other words in this group to suggest abject humiliation on the part of the one who pays honor or reverence; as, "a throne to which conquered nations yielded obeisance" (Steele).

Ana. Recognition, acknowledgment (see corresponding verbs at ACKNOWLEDGE): adulation, *compliment: tribute, panegyric, eulogy, *encomium.

Con. Contempt, disdain, scorn, despite (see under DESPISE).

3 *Honesty, integrity, probity.

Ana. Uprightness, justness, honorableness, scrupulousness, conscientiousness (see corresponding adjectives at UPRIGHT): *truth, veracity: straightforwardness, forthrightness (see corresponding adjectives at STRAIGHTFORWARD): rectitude, virtue (see GOODNESS).

honorable or honourable. 1 Honorable (or honourable), honorary are sometimes not clearly distinguished. Honorable commonly applies to that which is worthy of honor, as in being noble, high-minded, or the like; as, an honorable calling; honorable service; an honorable man. It is also used as a prefix to the names of some persons of distinction, such as members of parliament or of congress, mayors, certain scions of the nobility, and the like (as, Honorable T. B. Reed; the Honorable Herbert Asquith), and as a merely courteous appellation in speaking of an opponent in a debate, controversy, and the like (as, my honorable colleague says...). Honorary regularly and honorable occasionally apply to that which is conferred, awarded, or given as an honor; as, an honorary degree; honorable mention; an honorary title. Honorary (but not honorable) is also used before a title of an office, or the like, which is held without emolument or without responsibility for services; as, the honorary president of a society.

Ana. Respected, esteemed, admired (see corresponding verbs under REGARD, n.): illustrious, eminent, distinguished (see FAMOUS).

2 *Upright, just, scrupulous, conscientious, honest.

Ana. Trustworthy, *reliable, dependable: noble, virtuous, righteous, *moral, ethical.

Ant. Dishonorable.

hop, v. *Skip, bound, curvet, lope, lollap, ricochet.

hope, v. *Expect, look, look for, await.

Ana. Aspire, *aim, pant: yearn, *long, hunger, thirst, pine: *rely, trust, depend, count, bank, reckon: anticipate, *foresee, foreknow, divine.

Ant. Despair (of): despond.

hopeful. Hopeful, optimistic, roseate, rose-colored are here compared as meaning having or showing confidence that the end or outcome will be favorable or for the best. Hopeful, which is often used in distinction from sanguine (see CONFIDENT) usually implies some ground, often reasonably good grounds, for one's having hope: it therefore typically, but not invariably, suggests confidence in which there is little or no self-deception or which is the result of a realistic consideration of the possibilities; as, "the air of youth, Hopeful and cheerful" (Milton); "I may (without being too... sanguine) affirm... that... my affairs were never in so fair and hopeful a way" (Ludlow); "I am hopeful of purification [in politics], but not sanguine" (J. R. Lowell). Optimistic usually implies a temperamental confidence that all will turn out for the best: unlike hopeful, it often, but far from commonly, suggests a failure to consider things closely and realistically or, even, a willingness to be guided by illusions rather than by facts; as, "the optimistic or sentimental hypothesis that wickedness always fares ill in the world" (J. Morley); "The barren optimistic sophistries Of comfortable moles" (Arnold). Sometimes, however, the term carries a suggestion not of weakness but of a fundamental faith in the triumph of good or right. "There is a species of discontent which is more fervently optimistic than all the cheerfulness the world can boast" (A. Repplier). Roseate and rose-colored, in their figurative senses only, imply the optimism of an abounding cheerful temperament which enables such a one to see persons, events, situations, and the like, "through rose-colored spectacles," that is, in their most attractive and alluring aspects. The terms definitely imply illusion or delusion and therefore connote an element of falsity, though not necessarily intentional falsity; as, "A persuasive person who could depict the merits of his scheme with roseate but delusive eloquence" (G. Smith); a rose-colored view of the world's future.

Ana. Expecting, hoping, awaiting (see EXPECT): anticipating, foreseeing, divining (see FORESEE): sanguine, sure, *confident, assured.

Ant. Hopeless, despairing. — Con. *Despondent, desperate, forlorn: pessimistic, *cynical.

hopeless. Despairing, *despondent, desperate, forlorn.

Ana. Dejected, depressed, melancholy, sad (see corresponding nouns at SADNESS): gloomy, glum, morose (see Sullen): acquiescent (see COMPLIANT).

Ant. Hopeful. — Con. Optimistic, roseate, rose-colored (see HOPEFUL): *confident, assured, sanguine, sure.

hopelessness. Despair, despondency, desperation, forlornness. See under DESPONDENT.

Ana. Dejection, depression, melancholy, gloom (see SADNESS).

Ant. Hopefulness. — Con. Optimism (see corresponding adjective at HOPEFUL): *confidence, assurance, aplomb: *courage, spirit, tenacity, resolution.

horde, n. 1 *Tribe, sib, clan, sept.

2 Mob, throng, *crowd, crush, press, rout.

horizon. Purview, ken, compass, reach, *range, scope, sweep, radius, orbit, gamut.

Ana. *Limit, bound, confine, term, bourn, end: spread, stretch, amplitude, *expanse.

horrendous. Horrific, *horrible, horrid.

horrible. 1 Horrible, horrid, horrific, horrendous agree in meaning inspiring horror or abhorrence. Horrible (see also FEARFUL, 2) is the general term for that which inspires horror; as, "some... horrible form, Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason" (Shak.); "wrongs and shames, Horrible, hateful, monstrous, not to be told" (Tennyson). Horrid, often practically synonymous with horrible, sometimes carries a stronger implication of inherent or innate offensiveness or repulsiveness; as, "This emperor... from Rome retired To Capreae... with purpose there His horrid lusts in private to enjoy" (Milton); "some horrid beliefs from which... human nature revolts" (Bagehot). In modern colloquial usage the word is often weakened to a general term of aversion; as, horrid weather; horrid little boys. Horrific (see also FEARFUL, 2), a somewhat bookish term, stresses the power to horrify; as, "She was a brave narrator... her voice sinking into a whisper over the supernatural or the horrific" (Stevenson). Horrendous is rarely used except in producing a literary effect, such as the suggestion of extreme frightfulness, an apt rhyme for tremendous or stupendous, or an onomatopoeic rhythm; as, "Dammings most dreadful... Execrations horrendous, Blasphemies stupendous" (E. Hooker).

Ana. Abhorrent, abominable, detestable, *hateful: *repugnant, repellent, obnoxious: *offensive, repulsive, revolting, loathsome.

Ant. Fascinating. — Con. *Pleasant, pleasing, grateful, gratifying: attractive, alluring, charming, enchanting, taking (see under ATTRACT).

2 Horrific, shocking, appalling, *fearful, awful, dreadful, frightful, terrible, terrific.

Ana., Ant., & Con. See those at HORRIBLE, 1.

humane. Humanitarian, *charitable, benevolent, philanthropic, altruistic.

Ana. Compassionate, *tender, warmhearted: gentle, lenient, mild (see SOFT): clement, merciful, tolerant, *forbearing: kindly, *kind, benign, benignant.

Ant. Barbarous, inhuman: atrocious. — Con. Savage, cruel, fell (see FERCE): merciless, relentless, implacable (see GRIM).

humanitarian. Humane, benevolent, philanthropic, *charitable, altruistic.

humanities. *Literature, belles-lettres, letters.

humble, adj. Humble, meek, modest, lowly are here compared as meaning lacking all signs of pride, self-assertiveness, or the like, either in spirit or in outward show. All are applicable to persons and their attitudes and manners, and all but meek may also be applied to homes, occupations, interests, and the like. Humble may suggest a virtue that consists in the absence of pride in oneself or in one's achievements and, in religious use, a consciousness of one's weakness and a disposition to ascribe to the Supreme Being any credit for what one is or what one does that is meritorious; as, "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble" (James iv. 6); "Knowledge is proud that he has learned so much; Wisdom is humble that he knows no more" (Cowper). In current usage, humble often connotes undue self-depreciation or humiliation, sometimes verging on abjectness; as, "She is humble to abjectness" (De Quincey). As applied to a person's circumstances, humble suggests low rank, or poverty, or insignificance; as, a man of humble extraction; "a humble Mexican family" (Cather); "he regarded no task as too humble for him to undertake" (A. Huxley). Meek also, especially in Christian use, may imply a virtue evident not only in the absence of passion or wrath, but in a consistent mildness or gentleness of temper; as, "a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price" (1 Peter iii. 4). In current use, however, the term so often additionally suggests spiritlessness or undue submissiveness that even when it is employed without derogation these ideas are often connoted. "Stephen's face grew serious. . . 'I'm sorry I upset you.' Oh, so he was going to be meek and Christian! Tony wasn't going to stand that either" (Arch. Marshall). "Meek, humble, timid persons, who accept things as they are. . . who are cautious, prudent, and submissive, leave things very much as they find them" (A. C. Benson). Modest is now often preferred to humble in describing a person who takes no credit to himself for what he is or for what he does; the term usually connotes a lack of boastfulness or show of conceit, but it does not necessarily imply, as humble often does imply, a deep conviction of one's unworthiness or inferiority. "The model of an eighteenth-century parish priest. . . just, modest. . . loved and esteemed by all" (H. Ellis). As applied to things, such as a home, a position, a price, and the like, modest suggests neither extreme lowness nor the opposite, but a reasonable and often unobtrusive medium between extremes; as, to live in modest circumstances; "the terms [for a room] were modest, but the respectability was prodigious" (Bennett). Lowly is often indistinguishable from humble except in its lack of derogatory connotations such as abjectness, sense of inferiority, or the like; as, "Surely he scorneth the scornors: but he giveth grace unto the lowly" (Proverbs iii. 34); "Thy heart The lowliest duties on herself did lay" (Wordsworth).

Ana. Submissive, subdued (see TAME): resigned, acquiescent, *compliant.

Con. *Proud, arrogant, insolent, haughty, lordly, overbearing, disdainful: vain, vainglorious, proud (see under PRIDE, n.): pompous, ostentatious, pretentious, *showy.

hurry, v. *Speed, quicken, precipitate, hasten.

Ana. Impel, drive, *move.

Ant. Delay. — Con. Retard, slow, slacken, detain (see DELAY): procrastinate, lag, loiter, dally, dawdle (see DELAY).

hurry, n. *Haste, speed, dispatch, expedition.

Ana. Swift, rapidity, expeditiousness, quickness, speediness (see corresponding adjectives at FAST): *celerity, alacrity, legerity: flurry, *stir, bustle, pother, ado.

hurt, v. *Injure, harm, damage, impair, mar, spoil.

Ana. *Afflict, torture, torment: *trouble, distress: *wrong, oppress, persecute, aggrieve.

hurt, n. *Injury, harm, damage, mischief.

Ana. *Pain, ache, pang, throe, twinge, stitch: *injustice, wrong, tort, grievance.

husbandry. Farming, *agriculture.

husk, v. Husk, hull, shell, shuck (or shock) agree in meaning to divest something, especially a vegetable or nut, of its covering or envelope. Husk implies the removal of the outer envelope (called husk or husks), originally of certain grains, seeds, or nuts, but now usually, especially in the United States, of the leafy outer covering of an ear of Indian corn; thus, a husking bee is a gathering of the neighbors to help a farmer in husking his corn at harvest time. Hull originally implied the removal of the pods or similar envelopes of peas, beans, and the like, but in current use, shell is more often applied to this process; as, to shell peas or Lima beans. Hull, on the other hand, is now used to imply the removal of the calyx or leafy circle out of which some berries grow (as, to hull strawberries) or the removal of the tough outer covering of a grain of corn, of rice, or the like. Shell is applicable not only to vegetables with a pod but also to nuts and to mollusks, or the like, which are covered by a hard shell; as, to shell peanuts; to shell pecans; to shell oysters. Shuck, or the dialect form shock, is now rarely used except colloquially or locally. It sometimes takes the place of husk in reference to Indian corn, but it is usable, where shell is the preferred term, to imply the removal of pods, nutshells, and the shells of mollusks; as, to shuck corn; to shuck chestnuts; to shuck oysters. It is also applicable to the removal of anything which suggests an outer envelope; as, to shuck off one's clothes before taking a swim.

husky. *Muscular, brawny, sinewy, athletic, burly.

Ana. Stalwart, stout, *strong, sturdy, tough: *powerful, puissant, potent, forceful.

hussy or huzzy. *Wench, minx, baggage.

huzza. Hurrah, root, cheer, *applaud.

hygienic. Sanitary, *healthful, healthy, wholesome, salubrious, salutary, hymeneal. Nuptial, marital, connubial, conjugal, *matrimonial.

hymn. Hymn, laud, psalm, canticle, antiphon, anthem, canon are comparable when they mean a sacred song, especially one used in a religious service. Hymn, though historically applied to any rhapsodic poem of praise or worship, is in popular (as distinguished from scholarly) English commonly restricted to a song suitable for use in worship, especially one adapted to congregational singing. In this application, it often suggests supplication or thanksgiving as its motive, as well as praise or adoration. Laud, a somewhat literary word, means distinctively a hymn of praise. Psalm usually, and canticle in older liturgical use (especially in the canonical hours), both imply a Biblical source; the former is applied to any of the songs which comprise the Old Testament Book of Psalms, and the latter to other Biblical hymns of praise such as the Magnificat (the response of the Virgin Mary to Elizabeth's salutation: Luke i 46-55) or the Benedictic (the song of the three children in the fiery furnace: Daniel iii. 57 ff. D. V.). Only the Benedictic is designated a canticle in the Book of Common Prayer, but the term is often applied to other Biblical hymns of praise, including some psalms, and to the Te Deum. Psalm is sometimes used of any more or less spontaneous hymn (or poem) that represents the outpouring of the heart in praise, in supplication, or the like. "When ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue" (1 Corinthians xiv. 26). Antiphon designates a piece of verse or prose sung responsively as part of a liturgy. Anthem, which is etymologically a corrupt form derived from the same root as antiphon, no longer implies responsive singing. It is applied to a type of hymn that has a musical setting suitable for choral rather than congregational singing. "To Psalms and Hymns we may aspire, If Anthems are too high" (C. Wesley). In extended use, it is also applied to any serious or impassioned song of praise or glorification, as of a hero or of one's country; as, the national anthem. Canon is a technical term of the Orthodox and other Eastern churches, applied to a long liturgical hymn consisting of several parts (often nine), each of which follows the structure of an ode.

hypercritical. Captious, caviling, carping, censorious, faultfinding, *critical.

Ana. Finical, fastidious, fussy, pernickety, squeamish, particular (see NICE).

hypersensitivity, hypersensitiveness. *Susceptibility, allergy, anaphylaxis.

hypochondriac, hypochondriacal. *Melancholic, melancholy, atrabilious.

hypocrisy. Hypocrisy, sanctimony (or sanctimoniousness), pharisaism, cant, canting, as here compared, mean the pretense or affectation of being more virtuous or more religious than one actually is. The same differences in implications and connotations are found in their corresponding adjectives, hypocritical (or, rare, hypocritic), sanctimonious, pharisaical (or pharisaic), canting. Hypocrisy and hypocritical, the most inclusive of these terms, imply an assumption of goodness, sincerity, piety, or the like, by one who is either not good, sincere, or pious, or is actually corrupt, dishonest, or irreligious. "I thought where all thy circling wiles would end— In feigned religion, smooth hypocrisy" (Milton). "Be hypocritical, be cautious, be Not what you seem but always what you see" (Byron). "Archer's New York tolerated hypocrisy in private relations; but in business matters it exacted a limpid and impeccable honesty" (E. Wharton). "Much of the religiosity which unwise parents delight to observe in their children is . . . innocent hypocrisy" (Inge). Sanctimony and sanctimonious, once terms of approbation implying personal holiness, are now exclusively terms of opprobrium implying an affectation or merely outward pretense of such holiness or of piety; as, he took pleasure in comparing the sanctity of the early Christians with the sanctimony of many modern churchgoers; the preacher urged his flock to seek holiness but to take care lest they fall into sanctimony; sanctimonious professions of faith. Pharisaism (literally, the beliefs and practices of the Pharisees, the strictest sect of ancient Jews, who were insistent on close and unflinching observance of the written law and of traditional ceremonies and rites), and pharisaical imply a stern and censorious attitude to the manners and morals of others, or a conviction of one's own moral superiority, or both (cf. Luke xviii. 10-14): the term frequently suggests sanctimony or, less often, out-and-out hypocrisy; as, the self-righteousness of many leaders of reform movements had brought upon them and their followers the accusation of pharisaism; "Of all the Pharisaisms of the day, our Churchgoing seems to me the masterpiece" (Pusey); "the assured, the positive, the Pharisaical temper, that believes itself to be impenetrably in the right and its opponents indubitably in the wrong" (A. C. Benson). Cant (as here compared: see also JARGON) and canting (both noun and adjective) commonly imply the use of religious or pietistic language or phraseology in such a way as to suggest sanctimony or hypocrisy rather than genuine holiness or deep religiousness; often, however, especially in current use, the terms suggest reference not only to such outward indications of sanctimony and hypocrisy, but to the state of mind or the attitude of one who is so pharisaical, or so deeply convinced of his righteousness or holiness, that he is unaware that he is displaying his religion in a mechanical or perfunctory rather than in a sincere manner and in a spirit of arrogance rather than of humility; as, canting preachers; a canting assumption of one's righteousness. "What he [Byron] called the cant of the great middle part of the English nation...revolted him....'Come what may,' are his own words, 'I will never flatter the million's canting in any shape'" (Arnold). "The whole spiritual atmosphere was saturated with cant...an affectation of high principle which had ceased to touch the conduct, and flowed on in...insincere and unreal speech" (Froude). "One of those rare artists...who, by virtue of some inward grace, constantly flowing through the intellect, purge the mind of cant" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. Dissimulation, duplicity, guile, *deceit: *pretense, pretension, make-believe, make-belief.

hypocritical. Sanctimonious, pharisaical, canting. See under HYPOCRISY.

Ana. Unctuous, oily, sleek, *fulsome: feigned, affected, assumed, simulated, shammed, counterfeited, pretended (see ASSUME).

Con. Genuine, veritable, bona fide, *authentic: *sincere, heartfelt, wholehearted, whole-souled, unfeigned.

hypostatize. Reify, externalize, materialize, incarnate, *realize, actualize, embody, objectify, substantiate, substantialize.

hypothesis. Hypothesis, theory, law are often interchangeable in general use. In the technical senses in which they are here considered, however, they are rigidly discriminated by the scientists and philosophers who employ them precisely. In general, the terms denote an inference from data gathered by observation and experiment that is offered as a formula to explain the abstract and general principle that lies behind them as their cause, their method of operation, their relation to other phenomena, or the like. In such usage, hypothesis implies tentativeness in the inference because of insufficient evidence or of the impossibility of obtaining further evidence. In such cases, hypothesis applies to a well-founded conjecture that serves as a point of departure for scientific discussion or as a tentative guide for further investigation or as the most reasonable explanation of certain phenomena now available. "A scientist says in effect—'Observation shews that the following facts are true; I find that a certain hypothesis as to their origin is consistent with them all'" (Jeans). "The resemblance to electric polarization is very close; it is in fact so close that it would not be foolish at all to make the hypothesis that the iron contains not only electrons but also tiny corpuscles of some subtle magnetic fluid" (Karl K. Darrow). "In the last chapter I proposed the hypothesis that a pure poetry exists, employing the term 'lyric' to describe poems which 'consist of poetry and nothing else'" (Day Lewis). Theory, in general use, often means little more than hypothesis or conjecture (as, "'let us sit quiet, and hear the echoes about which you have your theory.'" 'Not a theory; it was a fancy'"—Dickens; "In the course of my work in Egypt, I had formulated certain theories of my own about plague, and could not reconcile them to the findings of the Commission"—V. Heiser), but in the precise technical sense in which it is here considered, it presupposes much more supporting evidence than hypothesis does, a much wider range of application, and greater likelihood of truth. It is not always obvious when hypothesis and when theory should be used, the former being preferred by some scientists as the more modest in its claims, the latter being preferred by others as suggesting such confidence in the reliability of the inference and its supporting evidence as to imply that it deserves acceptance; thus, the Darwinian explanation of the origin of species is regarded by some as a hypothesis, but is more often designated as the "theory of evolution." "That exact verbal expression of as much as we know of the facts, and no more, which constitutes a perfect scientific theory" (T. H. Huxley). "In 1905 Einstein crystallised these concepts and hypotheses in his theory of light-quanta, according to which all radiation consisted of discrete bullet-like units, which he called 'light-quanta' at the time, although we now call them 'photons'" (Jeans). "There was also a nascent theory of sound waves; and out of it there grew...a tremendous mathematical doctrine of waves which nowadays has almost come to dominate the physics of these times" (Karl K. Darrow). Law (as here considered: for fuller treatment see PRINCIPLE) emphasizes certainty and proof and therefore applies to a statement of an order or relation in phenomena that has been found to be invariable under the same conditions; as, in philology, Grimm's law is a statement of the regular changes which the stops, or mute consonants, of the primitive Indo-European consonant system have undergone in the Teutonic languages. However, since even so-called "laws" are open to disproof or alteration by the discovery of contradictory or additional evidence, the term is often changed in the course of time to theory; for example, what has long been known as Newton's law of gravitation is currently being revised as a result of Einstein's discoveries and is now designated by careful scientists as Newton's mathematical theory of universal gravitation.

Ana. Conjecture, surmise, guess (see under CONJECTURE, v.): inference, deduction, conclusion (see under INFER).

hypothetical. Conjectural, *supposed, supposititious, reputed, putative.

Ana. *Theoretical, speculative, academic: *doubtful, dubious, problematical, questionable.

Con. *Certain, inevitable, necessary, apodictic: proved, tested, tried, demonstrated (see PROVE).

hysteria. Delirium, frenzy, *mania.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

I

icon or elkon, ikon. *Image, portrait, simulacrum, effigy, statue, photograph, mask.

iconoclast. *Rebel, insurgent.

icy. Glacial, arctic, gelid, *cold, frosty, frigid, freezing, cool, chilly.

Ant. Fiery.

idea. Idea, concept, conception, thought, notion, impression are here compared as meaning something which exists in the mind as a representation of that which it apprehends or comprehends, or as a formulation of an opinion, a plan, a design, or the like. Idea is the most comprehensive and widely applicable of these terms: it may be used of an image of something at one time or another actually perceived through the senses, or of something never perceived but visualized from bits of information (as, to describe one's idea of a penthouse; his idea of heaven does not correspond to that of most persons), or of something that is the clearly or vaguely defined product of fancy, imagination, inventive power, or the like (as, "he...invented a new kind of buoy which was found by the authorities to be excellent in idea, but impracticable"—H. Ellis; "one of those accepted ideas, which are always wrong, that China is and was a country of immovable and unchanging traditions"—Binyon); it may denote a mere supposition (as, "I had no idea that the law had been so great a slavery"—Austen), or a good or practical solution or suggestion (as, "A very clever point that...You are really full of ideas"—Shaw; "all it [the government] desired was ideas"—V. Heiser), or a ridiculous or preposterous suggestion (as, "Mr. Elton in love with me! What an idea!"—Austen). Concept applies in logic to the idea of a thing which the mind conceives after knowing many instances of the genus, species, or other category, and which is devoid of all details except those that are typical or generic; as, the concept of a horse, a table, a mountain; "the author of 'Mein Kampf' has abolished the whole concept of the citizen as we have known it from the days of Pericles" (D. Thompson). In more general use, the term applies to any formulated and widely accepted idea of what a thing should be; as, "[prose and verse demand] a different concept of what the writer should aim at and what avoid" (Quiller-Couch); "We find among the Greeks germinal concepts which are a vital part of modern thought" (Buchan). Conception is often used in place of concept in this latter sense; in fact, it is sometimes preferred by those who wish to keep concept as a technical term of logic. However, conception so strongly suggests the activity of the mental power of conceiving, or of bringing into existence, an idea of something not yet realized or not yet given outward form, that it often implies not only the exercise of the reflective powers but of the imagination as colored by feeling: the term therefore more often applies to a peculiar or an individual idea than to one held by men as a whole or by an entire class, profession, or the like; as, compare Poe's conception of poetry as "the rhythmical creation of beauty" with the Aristotelian conception of it as the imitation of human actions "according to probability and necessity"; "What I needed was...some clear conception of the meaning of existence" (L. P. Smith). Conception is also, especially in literary and art criticism, the preferred term for the idea or design conceived by the writer or artist in advance, or in company with his giving it expression or form; as, Dante's boldness of conception; the dramatist's power to express his conception with frankness and daring; "the conception comes through the actual execution" (S. Alexander). Thought applies either to an expressed or to an unexpressed idea, especially one that comes into the mind as a result of meditation, reasoning, or contemplation; as, a penny for your thoughts; a child's thoughts about God; the book is full of noble thoughts; he had not a thought of disaster. Notion often adds to idea's implication of vagueness the suggestion of caprice or whim, or of half-formed or tentative purpose or intention; as, "I had no notion that he liked me so very much" (Austen); "One never does form a just idea of anybody beforehand. One takes up a notion, and runs away with it" (Austen); "modest, sober, cured of all Her notions hyperbolic" (Cowper). Impression, as here compared (see also IMPRESSION, 1), commonly applies to an idea which comes into the mind as the result of an external stimulus; as, I should like to know your first impressions of this book; "Poetry...aims at the transmission...of impressions, not facts" (Lowes); "Looking out over the steep hills, the first impression is of an immense void like the sea" (Jefferies).

Ana. *Opinion, view, belief, conviction, sentiment: theory, hypothesis, *law.

ideal, adj. *Abstract, transcendent, transcendental.

Ana. Utopian (see AMBITIOUS): surpassing, peerless, *supreme.

Ant. Actual.

ideal, n. Pattern, exemplar, *model, example, paradigm, beau ideal, standard, mirror.

Ana. Archetype, *prototype: *truth, verity: perfection, *excellence.

identical, identic. 1 Selfsame, *same, very, equivalent, equal, tantamount.

Ana. Correspondent, correlative, convertible (see RECIPROCAL).

Ant. Diverse. — Con. *Different, disparate, divergent: *distinct, separate, several.

2 Alike, like, uniform, parallel, *similar, akin, analogous, comparable, homogeneous.

Ana. Matching, equaling (see MATCH): agreeing, squaring, tallying, jibing, corresponding (see AGREE).

Ant. Different.

identification. *Recognition, apperception, assimilation.

Ana. Perception, *discernment, discrimination, clairvoyance, divination: image, percept, *sensation.

identify. Identify, incorporate, embody, assimilate come into comparison when they mean to bring (one or more things) into union with another thing. Identify always involves the idea of a union of things that are identical, or the same; it may further imply either an actual union, as by making one thing (sometimes things) the same as another, or merely a theoretical union by mentally apprehending one thing as identical with the other. Thus, a man who identifies his interests with those of his neighbors may be said consciously to change his interests so that they are in conformity with those of his neighbors; on the other hand, a man who identifies his own enrichment with the impoverishing of others may be said merely to view the two things as identical. This latter use frequently connotes confusion in thought or self-deception. "There is not much difference between identifying oneself with the Universe and identifying the Universe with oneself" (T. S. Eliot). Incorporate implies a union of one or more things with another, or of different things, so that when blended, fused, or otherwise united they constitute a uniform substance, a single body, or an integral whole; as, fertilizers should, in general, be incorporated with the soil; that which is learned is of no value until it is incorporated into one's stock of knowledge; writers often unwittingly incorporate the ideas of others in their own work. Embody (see also REALIZE, 1) is more restricted in its range of application than incorporate, because it can be used only when one or more things are made part of another thing that is a body or independent unit, such as an organized structure, a group, or a system. "Yet so much of these treaties has been embodied into the general law of Europe" (J. Mackintosh). "He is the greatest artist who has embodied, in the sum of his works, the greatest number of the greatest ideas" (Ruskin). "It is obvious that those whose wishes and opinions were embodied in the [Eighteenth] Amendment meant to stop the whole [liquor] business" (Justice Holmes). Assimilate (see also ABSORB, 1) falls short of identify because it does not always imply the actual fusion or blending, or when self-deception is connoted, the actual confusion, of two things. Like identify, however, assimilate implies the making of two or more things exactly alike, either actually or in thought; thus, to assimilate one's beliefs to those of another is merely to cause the former to become the same as the latter; to identify one's beliefs with those of another is to make them one and indistinguishable as well as the same; the prefix "af-" is a form of "ad-" assimilated in Latin before "f," as in "affectus" for "adfectus." "Our manufacturing class was assimilated in no time to the conservative classes" (H. G. Wells). "The assimilation of men to machines... is hardly likely to give us a just standard of values" (B. Russell).

Ana. Fuse, blend, merge (see MIX): *mistake, confuse, confound.

idiom. 1 Dialect, *language, speech, tongue.

Ana. Jargon, patois, cant, argot (see DIALECT).

2 Expression, locution, *phrase, collocation.

idiosyncrasy. *Eccentricity.

Ana. Peculiarity, individuality, distinctiveness or distinction, characteristicness or characteristic (see corresponding adjectives at CHARACTERISTIC): manner, way, *method, mode: mannerism, affectation, *pose.

idiot. Imbecile, moron, *fool, simpleton, natural.

idle, adj. 1 *Vain, nugatory, otiose, empty, hollow.

Ana. Fruitless, bootless, *futile, vain: *ineffective, ineffectual, inefficacious: trivial, paltry, *petty, trifling. Con. Significant, pregnant, meaningful (see EXPRESSIVE): profitable, *beneficial, advantageous.

2 *Inactive, inert, passive, supine.

Ana. Indolent, fainéant, *lazy, slothful: dawdling, dallying, lagging, procrastinating (see DELAY).

Ant. Busy. — Con. Industrious, diligent, assiduous, sedulous (see BUSY): employed (see EMPLOY, 2).

idolize. *Adore, worship.

Ana. Dote on or upon, love, *like: venerate, *revere, reverence.

Con. *Despise, condemn, scorn, disdain: *hate, abhor, detest, loathe, abominate.

if, if provided are both used to introduce conditional clauses. When merely a condition (that is, a possibility which may or may not be true) is expressed, if is the usual conjunction; as, "If this counsel... be of men, it will come to nought" (Acts v. 38). When the clause which follows names a stipulation or proviso, provided is the preferred form; as, "It is not hard to know God, provided one will not force oneself to define him" (Arnold).

ignite. Kindle, enkindle, *light, fire, inflame.

Ant. Stifle: extinguish.

ignoble. *Mean, sordid, abject.

Ana. *Base, low, vile: churlish, boorish, loutish (see under BOOR): *petty, puny, paltry, measly, trivial: abased, debased, degraded (see ABASE).

Ant. Noble: magnanimous. — Con. Lofty, *high: sublime, glorious, *splendid: illustrious, eminent, distinguished (see FAMOUS).

ignominy. Infamy, shame, *disgrace, opprobrium, dishonor, disrepute, obloquy, odium, scandal.

Ana. Humiliation, degradation, abasement (see corresponding verbs at ABASE): contempt, scorn, disdain, despite (see under DESPISE): mortification, chagrin (see corresponding adjectives at ASHAMED).

Con. Honor, glory (see FAME): respect, esteem, admiration, *regard.

ignorant. Ignorant, illiterate, unlettered, uneducated, untaught, untutored, unlearned, nescient agree in meaning not having knowledge. One is ignorant who is without knowledge, whether in general or of some particular thing; as, "a very superficial, ignorant, unweighing fellow" (Shak.); "the disputants on both sides were ignorant of the matter they were disputing about" (H. Ellis). One is illiterate, in the strict interpretation of that term, who is without the necessary rudiments of education. In the eighteenth century this term often implied ignorance of Latin or Greek; as, "an illiterate Portuguese friar, who understood no language but his own" (Fielding); "The word illiterate, in its common acceptation, means a man who is ignorant of those two languages [Greek and Latin]" (Chesterfield). In somewhat later and still current use, illiterate often implies a failure to attain a standard set for the educated or cultivated man; as, "You might read all the books in the British Museum (if you could live long enough), and remain an utterly illiterate, uneducated person" (Ruskin). In current English, both in Great Britain and in America, the term when directly applied to a person usually implies inability to read or write the English language or another language (as, illiterate voters); when applied to words or corruptions of words, grammatical constructions, and the like, it implies violation of the principles which govern the usage of educated men or a status far below that of the standard English of the day; thus, most authorities would stigmatize the expression "awful nice" as illiterate. The word, however, is often used merely as a contemptuous description of a person, an utterance, a letter, etc., that shows little evidence of education or cultivation (as, his speech is positively illiterate), or who shows inability to read and understand. "It is common knowledge that our professional students and candidates for the Ph.D. are illiterate. One thing you learn very quickly in teaching students at the loftiest levels of education is that they cannot read" (R. M. Hutchins). One is unlettered who is without the learning that is to be gained through the knowledge of books. Often it implies mere knowledge of how to read and write, but the absence of facility in both reading and writing (as, unlettered peasants); sometimes, however, it implies general ignorance or illiteracy (as, "His [Prince Hal's] addiction was to courses vain, His companies [companions] unlett'r'd, rude and shallow"—Shak.). One is uneducated, untaught, untutored, or unlearned who either has had no training in the schools or under teachers or whose ignorance, or crudeness, or general lack of intelligence suggests such a lack; none of the words, however, is used with great precision or in a strict sense; as, among uneducated men; untaught savages; "Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind" (Pope); plays which make no appeal to the unlearned. Nescient seldom applies directly to persons, but rather to their minds, their natures, and the like, or to abstractions such as humanity, or mankind, or nature. In such use the term implies invincible ignorance of all that is not apparent to the senses or apprehensible by the intellect; as, "Most men are not intended to be any wiser than their cocks and bulls—duly scientific of their yard and pasture, peacefully nescient of all beyond" (Ruskin).

Ana. *Rude, crude, raw, callow, green: simple, ingenuous, unsophisticated, naïve (see NATURAL).

Ant. Cognizant (of something): conversant: informed.
— Con. *Learned, erudite, polymathic, scholarly: conscious, *aware.

ignore. Disregard, overlook, slight, *neglect, omit, forget.

Ana. Blink, *wink (at): evade, elude, *escape, avoid, shun, eschew.

Ant. Heed (a warning, a sign, a symptom, etc.): acknowledge (sense 2).

ikon. Variant of ICON.

ilk. Kind, sort, *type, nature, description, character, stripe, kidney.

ill, adj. 1 *Bad, evil, wicked, naughty.

Ana. See those at EVIL.

Ant. Good.

2 *Sick.

Ant. Well.

ill, n. *Evil, bale.

Ant. Good.

illation. Ratiocination, *inference.

Ana. *Deduction, induction: reasoning, reflection, cogitation, deliberation, speculation, thinking (see corresponding verbs at THINK): *reason, understanding.

illative. Ratiocinative, inferential. See under INFERENCE.

illimitable. Boundless, *infinite, uncircumscribed, eternal, sempiternal.

Ana. Endless, never-ending, *everlasting, interminable.

illiterate, adj. Unlettered, uneducated, untaught, *ignorant, untutored, unlearned, nescient.

Ant. Literate. — Con. Taught, instructed, educated, schooled (see TEACH).

ill-mannered. *Rude, uncivil, ungracious, impolite, discourteous.

Ana. Boorish, loutish, churlish (see under BOOR).

Ant. Well-bred.

ill-treat. Maltreat, mistreat, *abuse, misuse, outrage.

Ana. *Wrong, oppress, persecute, aggrieve: *injure, harm, hurt.

illuminate, illumine or illumine. Illuminate, illumine, illumine, light, lighten, enlighten, illustrate are here compared as meaning literally or figuratively to fill with light or to throw light upon. Illuminate implies the use of a bright light or of something comparable to it in such a way that what is dark is made bright or what is complicated, obscure, or vague, is made perfectly clear; as, "The oblique band of sunlight . . . illuminated her as her presence illuminated the heath" (Hardy); "The greatest truths are perhaps those which being simple in themselves illuminate a large and complex body of knowledge" (S. Alexander); "He longed . . . to hear more about the life of which her careless words had given him so illuminating a glimpse" (E. Wharton). Illumine is chiefly, and illumine, as here compared, is always, literary or poetical for illuminate; as, "What in me is dark illumine" (Milton); "no lurid fire of hell or human passion illumines their scenes" (C. W. Eliot); "When yond same star . . . Had made his course to illumine that part of heaven Where now it burns" (Shak.); "The beams yet filter through, illumining the wide spaces beneath" (Hudson). Light, lighten, and enlighten carry a stronger implication of providing with light for clear seeing than of throwing a light upon. Light is the most consistently literal of these terms, though it often carries a suggestion of brightening the way of one who otherwise might stumble or go astray; as, the room was brilliantly lighted; "All our yesterdays have lighted fools. The way to dusty death" (Shak.). "Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise" (Pope); "The old man scratched a match, the spark Lit up the keyhole of a door" (Amy Lowell). Lighten, as here compared, usually implies the presence of something comparable to an inner light or glow that shines outwardly; as, "Lighten our darkness, we beseech thee, O Lord" (Book of Common Prayer); "Lighten my spirit with one clear heavenly ray" (J. Davies). In current usage, enlighten is rare in the literal sense of lighten (as, "The quick smile had enlightened [her face]" — Stevenson), but it is far more common than lighten when filling with intellectual or spiritual light is implied. Sometimes the term implies that one has been supplied with information necessary to the understanding of something (as, "In her simplicity she did not know what it [her mistake] was, till a hint from a nodding acquaintance enlightened her" — Hardy), sometimes it implies sufficient education and experience to enable one to meet all needs and (especially in the adjective enlightened) to remove all traces of superstition, prejudice, or intolerance (as, "the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence" — Ch. Just. Taney; "What, still there! in this enlightened age too, since you [ghosts] have been proved not to exist!" — Shelley). Illustrate (see also EXEMPLIFY) is now used less often than in the past in a sense approaching that of illuminate, but it still occurs in the writings and speech of those learned or sensitive writers who have a fine feeling for the specific quality of words. As compared to illuminate, it suggests the shedding of luster rather than of light, embellishment rather than elucidation, distinct exhibition rather than a bringing into view; as, "The poet or philosopher illustrates his age and country by the efforts of a single mind" (Gibbon); "Narrow of vision but steadfast to principles, they [the American Puritans] fronted life resolutely, honouring and illustrating the supreme worth of freedom" (A. Repplier).

Ana. *Light, inflame, fire, kindle, enkindle: elucidate, *explain: illustrate, *exemplify.

Ant. Darken, obscure. — Con. Complicate, involve (see corresponding adjectives at COMPLEX).

illusion. *Delusion, mirage, hallucination.

Ana. *Imagination, fancy, fantasy, phantasy: *sensation, percept, image.

illusory. *Apparent, seeming, ostensible.

Ana. Chimerical, fanciful, visionary, *imaginary, fantastic: delusory, delusive, *misleading, deceptive.

Ant. Factual: matter-of-fact.

☞ Do not confuse illusory with delusory.

illustrate. 1 Enlighten, *illuminate, illumine, illumine, light, lighten.

Ana. *Adorn, embellish: expose, exhibit, display, *show: *reveal, disclose, discover.

Ant. Dim.

2 *Exemplify.

Ana. Elucidate, interpret, *explain, expound: vivify, enliven (see QUICKEN): demonstrate, manifest, *show.

illustration. Example, *instance, case, sample, specimen.

illustrious. Eminent, distinguished, renowned, noted, celebrated, *famous, famed, notorious.

Ana. Glorious, *splendid, resplendent, sublime: outstanding, signal, striking, conspicuous (see NOTICEABLE).

Ant. Infamous. — Con. Ignoble, *mean, abject:

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

ignominious, disgraceful, shameful, infamous, dishonorable, scandalous (see corresponding nouns at DISGRACE).

ill will. *Malice, malevolence, malignity, spite, despotism, spleen, grudge.

Ana. Animosity, antipathy, rancor, animus, hostility, *enmity: *hate, hatred.

Ant. Good will: charity.

image. 1 Image, simulacrum, effigy, statue, icon (or eikon or ikon), portrait, photograph, mask are here compared only as meaning a lifelike representation, especially (but not exclusively) of a living being. Image (see also SENSATION, 1), in its earliest English sense, denotes a sculptured, cast, or modeled representation, as of a god, a sacred or saintly person, or the like, especially one intended for the veneration of the people. The term is also applicable to a representation of a person made in wax, clay, or other plastic substance, as for use in a museum, waxworks, or the like, or by a sorcerer who wishes to injure or destroy the person through attack on his image; in such cases, however, simulacrum (see also IMPOSTURE) is often used. Effigy is now commonly limited to images as sculptured (especially on sepulchral monuments as in medieval cathedrals) or engraved (especially on coins), and to the phrase "to burn (or hang) in effigy." In the latter use, effigy often implies a crude simulacrum in clothes similar to those worn by the original which serves merely as an object on which is inflicted the sort of punishment (burning or hanging) which he is supposed to deserve; as, in some parts of England, Guy Fawkes is burned in effigy each fifth of November. Statue applies not only to any image for use in a church but to any sculptured, cast, or modeled representation of the entire figure (as distinguished from a bust or head) of a living or dead person, set up in a conspicuous (often a public) place as a reminder of a person's virtues or achievements or as a memorial or monument; as, a colossal statue of Christ on the peak of a high mountain overlooking the harbor; an equestrian statue of Washington. Icon specifically designates the type of representation of Christ, the Virgin Mary, or a saint, used in Orthodox churches and homes. Because of a literal interpretation of the Second Commandment ("Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image...")—Exodus xx. 4), an icon is never a statue but is a painting, a mosaic, or a bas-relief. "The walls were studded with little ikons of saints, each one with its guttering lamp before it" (Buchan). Portrait always implies pictorial representation, especially of the figure or of the face of a person; it may be used of such a representation as is executed by drawing, photographing, engraving, or, in its now common specific sense, by painting; as, the Gilbert Stuart portraits of Washington; the latest portrait of the chief justice of the Supreme Court. Photograph (except in its extended sense of an exact representation, one devoid of all imaginative additions) applies only to a portrait that is made by means of a camera and sensitive plates or films. Mask, as here compared, applies only to a sculptured face (or face and neck) or to a molded copy of a face made in wax or plaster; thus, a death mask is a copy made very soon after a person has died, especially a cast or impression taken directly from the face of the dead person.

Ana. *Reproduction, copy, duplicate, facsimile, replica: *form, figure, shape.

2 Percept. *sensation.

Ana. *Idea, concept, impression, conception, notion: fabrication, figment (see FICTION): phantasy, *fancy, fantasy.

imaginable. *Imaginative, imaginal, imaginary.

Ana. Realized or realizable, conceived or conceivable, imagined, envisaged, envisioned (see corresponding verbs at THINK).

Ant. Unimaginable, unconceivable.

imaginal. *Imaginative, imaginable, imaginary.

imaginary, adj. 1 Imaginary, fanciful, visionary, fantastic (or fantastical), chimerical, quixotic are synonymous adjectives when they are applied to conceptions (or, in some instances, to the persons who form the conceptions) and mean unreal or unbelievable and out of keeping with things as they are (or conceiving such unreal or unbelievable things). That is imaginary which is fictitious and purely the product of an active or, especially, an excited imagination; as, "Imaginary ills and fancied tortures" (Addison); "those nervous persons who may be terrified by imaginary dangers are often courageous in the face of real danger" (H. Ellis). That is (or, less often, one is) fanciful which (or who) indicates a giving rein to the power of conceiving or producing things that have no real counterpart in nature or in fact. "In Wales he found a cottage perfectly roofed with fern... Had a painter put this in a picture, many would have exclaimed: 'How fanciful!'" (Jefferies). "Rousseau's fanciful image of primitive man, uncontaminated by science or art, undepraved by thought" (Grandgent). That is visionary which, although it seems real and practical to the one who conceives it, is usually the product of a dream or vision or of an unrestrained imagination and is incapable of realization; as, visionary schemes for world conquest; "Goldsmith had long a visionary project, that... he would go to Aleppo, in order to acquire a knowledge... of any arts peculiar to the East, and introduce them into Britain" (Boswell); "This was a visionary scheme... a project far above his skill" (Swift). One is visionary who is given to such dreams, visions, and fancies, and inspired by the hopes they arouse. "If a man happens not to succeed in such an enquiry, he will be thought weak and visionary" (Burke). That is fantastic (see also FANTASTIC, 2) which is, or now more often, seems, extravagantly fanciful or queer and hence incapable of belief or, sometimes, approval. "In words, as fashions, the same rule will hold; Alike fantastic, if too new, or old" (Pope). "His strange coming, his strange story, his devotion, his early death and posthumous fame—it was all fantastic" (Cather). That is chimerical which is wildly or fantastically visionary or unreal. "An universal institutional Church is as chimerical an idea as an universal Empire" (Inge). That is (or one is) quixotic which (or who) is motivated by extravagantly chivalrous devotion to visionary ideals; as, "His moral attitude to his fellow creatures was that of one who was... quixotically high-minded" (J. M. Robertson); "To insist upon clemency in the circumstances would... have required quixotic courage" (Buchan). "The economic notion that our present population... can live on this island [Great Britain] and produce by their work a real income that will give them a rising standard of comfort and leisure, is utterly quixotic" (J. A. Hobson).

Ana. *Fictitious, fabulous, mythical, legendary, apocryphal: ideal, transcendent, transcendental, *abstract: utopian (see AMBITIOUS): delusory, delusive (see MISLEADING): illusory, seeming, *apparent.

Ant. Real, actual.

2 *Imaginative, imaginal, imaginable.

imagination. Imagination, fancy, fantasy, phantasy are here compared as denoting either the power or the function of the mind by which mental images of things are formed, or the exercise of that power as manifested in poetry or other works of art. The meanings of all of these terms have been greatly influenced by changing psychological and aesthetic theories with the result that in the past they have often carried implications or connotations (sometimes denotations) not observable in their current use. Imagination is not only the most inclusive of these terms, but, especially in present aesthetic use, it is the freest from derogatory connotations. As an inclusive term it may apply either to the power of forming images of things once known but now absent (often called the reproductive imagination) or to the power of forming images of things never seen (or never seen in their entirety), or actually nonexistent, or incapable of actual existence (often called the productive, inventive, constructive, or creative imagination). The term in the sense of reproductive imagination suggests the use of memory as well as of the image-making power; as, to recall the past in one's imagination; her face haunted his imagination. In the sense of productive imagination, it usually suggests either a new combination of elements found in one's experience, or an ability to conceive of that which is seen in fragments or on the surface as a complete, perfected, and integral whole; as, a man of no imagination is less likely to feel physical fear; with imagination enough to see the possible consequences. "And as imagination bodies forth The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen Turns them to shapes and gives to airy nothing A local habitation and a name" (Shak.). "It is only through imagination that men become aware of what the world might be" (B. Russell). "Facts... give us wherewithal to think straight and they stimulate the imagination; for imagination, like reason, cannot run without the gasoline of knowledge" (Grandgent). Fancy, a contraction from the earlier fantasy or phantasy (see also FANCY, 2, for all three words), like its original forms, once denoted what is now called the reproductive imagination. Much earlier in their histories all these words, but especially fancy and fantasy, denoted a whimsical or fantastic notion, a sense now frequently associated with fancy (see FANCY, 2). By gradual intermingling of these ideas fancy acquired its now common meaning of the power to conceive and give expression to images that are far removed from reality or that represent purely imaginary things. "She saw, with the creative eye of fancy, the streets of that gay bathing-place [Brighton] covered with officers" (Austen). "The world which any consciousness inhabits is a world made up in part of experience and in part of fancy" (J. W. Krulch). In aesthetic use, since the late 18th century the tendency has been to make imagination and fancy antithetical. Imagination is often used to designate the power of representing the real (or that which gives an illusion of reality) in its entirety and organic unity and, usually, in its ideal or universal character; fancy, the power of inventing the novel and unreal by recombining the elements found in reality. So interpreted, imagination represents men not only in their outward but in their inward life, and produces a Hamlet; fancy presents them in alien surroundings, or essentially changed in their natural physical and mental constitution, and produces centaurs and Brobdingnagians. "The imagination, or shaping or modifying power; the fancy, or the aggregative and associative power" (Coleridge). Fantasy now takes the place of fancy in naming the power of unrestrained (often extravagant or delusive) fancy or its exhibition in art. "[Readers]... live a compensatory life of fantasy between the lines of print" (A. Huxley). Phantasy, as here compared (see FANCY, 2), seldom occurs in modern use except in its technical sense of the image-making power in general.

Ana. Invention, creation (see corresponding verbs at INVENT): conceiving or conception, realizing or realization (see corresponding verbs at THINK).

imaginative. Imaginative, imaginal, imaginable, imaginary are not synonymous adjectives but they are sometimes confused because of their verbal likeness. Imaginative applies to that which is the product of the imagination or has a character indicating the exercise or the power of the imagination; thus, imaginative writings are often distinguished from historical, expository, argumentative, and similar types of writing; an imaginative poet is one whose imagination heightens a thing or brings out its fine and almost imperceptible essence. "It is a common fallacy that a writer... can achieve this poignant quality by improving upon his subject-matter, by using his 'imagination' upon it and twisting it to suit his purpose. The truth is that by such a process (which is not imaginative at all) he can at best produce only a brilliant sham" (Cather). Imaginal, an old and until recently obsolete word meaning of the imagination or within the conceptive powers of the imagination, has been revived, especially by psychologists, to fill the need for an adjective which refers to the imagination only as a function of the mind (rather than as a creative power), or to images as the mental representations which follow a sensation of any sort; thus, a person belongs to one imaginal type rather than to another because of his tendency to have sensory images of a particular kind (visual, tactile, auditory, or the like). Imaginable often means little more than conceivable, but in careful use, it implies that the thing so qualified can be seen or apprehended in a clear mental image; as, "St. Thomas was perhaps of all the apostles the one most easily imaginable in the present" (C. Mackenzie). Imaginary (for fuller treatment see IMAGINARY, 1) implies existence only in the imagination; as, imaginary woes; "Imaginary Conversations," a book by Walter Savage Landor giving imaginary dialogues and imaginary letters between famous persons of long ago.

Ana. Imagining, fancying, realizing, conceiving (see THINK): creative, inventive (see corresponding verbs at INVENT).

Con. *Prosaic, prosy, matter-of-fact.

imagine. Conceive, fancy, realize, envisage, envision, *think.

Ana. *Invent, create: fabricate, form, fashion, shape, *make: *conjecture, surmise, guess.

imbecile. Idiot, moron, *fool, simpleton, natural.

imbibe. *Absorb, assimilate.

Ana. *Receive, take, admit, accept: *soak, saturate, steep, impregnate: *permeate, pervade, penetrate, impenetrate: acquire, obtain, *get.

Ant. Ooze, exude.

imbue. Inoculate, leaven, ingrain, *infuse, suffuse.

Ana. *Inform, inspire, fire, animate: impregnate, saturate, *permeate, pervade.

imitate. *Copy, mimic, ape, mock.

Ana. Impersonate, personate (see ACT, v.): simulate, feign, counterfeit (see ASSUME): *caricature, burlesque, parody, travesty.

immature. Immature, unmaturing, unripe, unmellow (or unmellowed), unfledged agree in meaning not fully developed. Except for this denial of full development, the terms agree in implications and connotations with the affirmative adjectives mature, maturing, ripe, mellow, full-fledged discriminated at MATURE.

Ana. Crude, callow, green, *rude: *premature, precocious, untimely: childish, *childlike.

Ant. Mature. — Con. Matured, ripe, mellow, adult, grown-up, full-fledged (see MATURE, adj.).

immediate. *Direct.

Ana. *Nearest, next: intuitive, *instinctive.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Mediate (knowledge, relation, operation, etc.): distant (relatives, etc.).

immediately. *Directly, instantly, instantaneously, forthwith, straightway, at once, anon, right away.

immense. Vast, *enormous, huge, gigantic, giant, gigantuan, colossal, mammoth, elephantine, titanic, herculean, Cyclopean, Antaeon, Gargantuan, Brobdignagian.

Ana. Tremendous, prodigious, stupendous, *monstrous: *large, big, great.

immerse. *Dip, submerge, duck, souse, dunk.

Ana. Drench, *soak, saturate, sop, impregnate: *infuse, imbue, ingrain: engross, absorb (see MONOPOLIZE).

immigrant, n. 1 *Stranger, alien, foreigner, outlander, outsider, émigré.
2 *Emigrant.

immigrate. Emigrate. See under EMIGRATE.

immigration. Emigration. See under EMIGRATE.

imminent. *Impending.

Ana. Threatening, menacing (see THREATEN): likely, *probable, possible: *inevitable, ineluctable, inescapable, unavoidable: expected, awaited (see EXPECT).

Con. *Distant, remote, far-off: *doubtful, dubious, questionable, problematical.

☞ Do not confuse imminent with immanent.

immobile. *Immovable, immotile, immotive.

Ant. Mobile.

immoderate. Inordinate, *excessive, exorbitant, extreme, extravagant.

Ana. *Profuse, lavish, prodigal, exuberant: superabounding, teeming, overflowing (see TEEM).

Ant. Moderate. — Con. Temperate (see MODERATE, adj.): restrained, curbed, checked, inhibited (see RESTRAIN): reasonable, *rational.

immoral. Immoral, unmoral, nonmoral, amoral may all be defined briefly as not moral, yet they are not often interchangeable and are frequently confused, largely because the implications and connotations of the second element are not the same in each compound, but partly also because the meanings of unmoral and amoral are still not fully established. Immoral describes the opposite extreme of that which is moral, or ethically good because in accordance with accepted ethical principles or the dictates of one's conscience; it therefore may be translated as ethically wrong and unjustifiable, or sinful. "How immoral to impose it [the oath to support the Constitution] on them [judges], if they were to be used as the... knowing instruments for violating what they swear to support!" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Immoral is often used narrowly to imply illicit sex relations: then it is equal to licentious and lascivious; as, immoral women; to lead a life of immorality. Sometimes immoral implies reference not to a code or one's conscience, but to one's judgment of what is right or proper under the circumstances. "It is one of the worst and most unintelligent forms of immorality for two people who irritate each other to expose themselves to misery and anger by living together" (R. Macaulay). Unmoral is probably the most loosely used of these words. The best modern writers tend to restrict it, however, to persons (or sometimes to the acts of such persons) who are not moral in the sense that they cannot, because of age, or imbecility or insanity, distinguish right from wrong; thus, idiots are unmoral persons whose acts can neither be described as moral nor immoral. "Reynard, like Gulliver, is... pleasing to the child... children being by nature pitiless and unmoral" (A. Repplier). Sometimes the word is about equal to conscienceless. "She was as inconsequent and unmoral, this little, flashing, suffering, pretty creature, as the sparkle of sunshine on a rippling wave" (Deland). Nonmoral implies that the thing so qualified cannot be described as moral in any sense of that word, for it is neither good nor bad ethically and it does not demand any judgment of its rightness or wrongness; as, breathing, walking, eating, and sleeping are nonmoral physical acts. Amoral originally carried practically the same meaning as nonmoral. Careful modern writers, however, tend to distinguish the two. Nonmoral is preferred when the word which is qualified names a thing which is by common consent outside the sphere in which moral distinctions apply; amoral is preferred when applied to something not customarily or universally exempted from moral judgments; as, perspective is a nonmoral element in the art of painting; the painter contended that his representation of the nude was amoral. "To make it appear as though wars were not fought by individuals... but either by impersonal and therefore wholly non-moral and impassible forces, or else by personified abstractions" (A. Huxley). "To the idea of poetry as exclusive, esoteric, a-moral, the private affair of the poet... I should oppose the idea of poetry as catholic, diverse in function, moral, everyone's business" (Day Lewis). When applied to persons or their acts, amoral diverges in its meaning from unmoral, for it implies, not inability to distinguish right and wrong, but indifference to, or neglect of, or even defiance of, moral standards, sometimes because of absence of moral principles, sometimes for the sake of one's ends; as, "amoral megalomaniacs" (Current History); "she was theoretically anti-social and amoral" (H. G. Wells). "Bismarck... is without doubt a great man, but some of his great acts were not so much immoral as... a-moral" (S. Alexander).

Ana. *Licentious, lewd, lascivious, libertine, libidinous, lecherous, wanton, lustful: *abandoned, profligate, dissolute, reprobate: obscene, gross, ribald (see COARSE).

Ant. Moral: chaste, pure.

immortal. Immortal, deathless, undying, unfading, fadeless, amaranthine agree in meaning not subject to death or decay and, hence, everlasting. With the exception of immortal, all of these words are found chiefly in poetic use and are distinguishable especially in their connotations and applications. In its strictest sense, immortal implies little more than exemption from liability to death and, therefore, is rarely applied literally to anything other than the soul, or spirit, of man. "Such harmony is in immortal souls; But whilst this muddy vesture of decay Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it" (Shak.). In freer use, immortal often equals eternal ("Immortal gods, I crave no pelf"—Shak.); more frequently it keeps close to the strict sense in being applied to something comparable to the soul in that it lives on in fullness of vigor after its maker, possessor, or the like, has died; as, the immortal epics of Homer; "'tis verse that gives Immortal youth to mortal maids" (Landor). "Oh may I join the choir invisible Of those immortal dead who live again In minds made better by their presence" (G. Eliot). Deathless also implies incapacity for death; in modern use it is seldom applied to the soul but, especially in the work of discriminating writers, to immaterial things that transcend the limitations of mortal existence; as, "Truth's deathless voice" (Shelley); "Art's deathless dreams" (Shelley); "Virtue crowned with glory's deathless meed" (Wordsworth). Undying is applied chiefly to emotions or passions marked by such intensity or vitality as to be or to seem incapable of extinction while life lasts; as, undying love; undying hatred; "a Patriot's heart, warm with undying fire" (Wordsworth). Unfading and fadeless often come close to undying in meaning, but they connote persistence of brightness or bloom rather than of intensity; as, unfading recollections; fadeless memories. In so far as they differ, unfading usually stresses a fact and fadeless an incapacity for decay. "True Charity... Thrives against hope, and in the rudest scene, Storms but enliven its unfading green" (Cowper). "Love's brightest roses on the scaffold bloom, Mingling with freedom's fadeless laurels" (Shelley). Amaranthine, derived from amaranth, a mythical everlasting flower, is used rarely outside of poetry. Sometimes it stresses deathlessness, sometimes fadelessness, but usually it also connotes richness of beauty; as, "the only amaranthine flower on earth is virtue" (Cowper); "Iona's Saints... Garlands shall wear of amaranthine bloom" (Wordsworth).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ana. *Everlasting, never-ending, endless.

Ant. Mortal. — Con. Transitory, fleeting, fugitive, ephemeral, evanescent, *transient.

immotile. Immobile, *immovable, immotive.

immotive. *Immovable, immobile, immotile.

immovable or unmovable. Immovable (or the less frequent unmovable), immobile, immotile, immotive come into comparison when they mean incapable of moving or being moved. Except for this denial of power, the terms otherwise carry the implications and connotations of the affirmative words as discriminated at MOVABLE.

Ant. Movable.

immunity. *Exemption.

Ant. Susceptibility, allergy.

immure. *Imprison, incarcerate, jail, intern.

Ana. Confine, circumscribe, *limit, restrict.

Con. Liberate, *free, release.

impact, n. Impact, impingement, collision, clash, shock, concussion, percussion, jar, jolt, brunt come into comparison when they mean a forcible or enforced contact between two (sometimes more) things, especially a contact so violent as to affect seriously one or the other or all of the persons or things involved. Impact, though it often means this and no more, may be used more generally to imply contact between any two things, one of which at least is driven or impelled in the direction of the other and produces definite impressions on it, though not necessarily a physical impression or one that results in injury; as, the impact of a hammer upon a nail; a target constructed to resist the impact of a bullet; to live in an age where every mind feels the impact of new ideas. "Bashville... seized the door to shut him out; but Cashel forced it back against him, sent him reeling some paces by its impact..." (Shaw). "It is not electricity which we see, it is the air rendered incandescent by the vehemence of the impacts of the electrons against its molecules" (Karl K. Darrow). Impingement often means little more than impact, but distinctively it may imply an even sharper or more forcible impression than impact (as, the impingement of sound waves on the tympanum, or eardrum) or may carry, as impact does not, a suggestion of encroachment (as, the impingement of scientific theories upon religious beliefs). Collision implies the coming together of two (or, sometimes, more) things (one of which, usually both or all, must be in motion) with such force that both (or all) are more or less damaged or their progress is seriously impeded. "In the path of the revolving stable [to whose roof the narrator clung in a flood] loomed suddenly the house of our neighbor, Mrs. Fenn. To avoid being hurled off by the inevitable collision, I leaped into the air at the precise moment of impact" (V. Heiser). "His uneasiness grew by the recollection of the forty tons of dynamite in the body of the

'Ferndale'; not the sort of cargo one thinks of with equanimity in connexion with a threatened collision" (Conrad). Collision may be used, though such use is somewhat infrequent, when the things which come together so as to seriously affect one another are immaterial rather than physical entities; as, the frequent collision of scientific and religious ideas in the nineteenth century; "The collision of contrary false principles" (Warburton). Clash (etymologically, the sharp discordant sounds produced by the impact, often repeated impact, of two or more bodies, especially metallic bodies) is often used in preference to collision when two or more things come into contact with one another with such force that noises of crashing and jangling are more apparent than the destruction or ruin wrought; as, the clash of swords in battle; "the clash of cymbals, and the rolling of drums" (Macaulay). Clash, also, is used more often of immaterial things, such as beliefs, theories, and ideas, which are irreconcilable, incompatible, etc., and lead to violent conflict, controversy, and the like; as, a clash of creeds; "In Le Misanthrope... there is... a clash... between the high-strung demands of Alceste and the unbending reasonableness of the social standard" (S. Alexander). "An appeal to the workers and employers to be good boys and not paralyze the industry of the nation by the clash of their quite irreconcilable interests" (Shaw). Shock denotes the effect, as of shaking, rocking, agitating, stunning, or the like, produced by an impact or collision. As here compared, it may imply a physical, mental, or emotional effect, but in every case it carries a strong suggestion of something that strikes or hits with force and often with violence; as, "He stood the shock of a whole host of foes" (Addison); "the shock Of cataract seas that snap The three-decker's oaken spine" (Tennyson); "The soft shock Of wizened apples falling... Upon the hilly rock" (Millay); "For strong emotion, however, the shock of sudden external stimulus is necessary" (H. Ellis). Concussion is found more often than shock in learned and technical use: it also usually suggests the physical effect produced by the impact of a blow upon a hitting of, or a collision with something material yet not necessarily solid or substantial; as, "Its [a dress form's] hardness was not that of wood, which responds to concussion with living vibration" (Cather). In the common phrase "concussion of the brain" the term implies a condition of lowered functional activity of the brain resulting from a blow or fall upon the head. Percussion implies a more deliberate or intentional striking, knocking, tapping, or the like, for the sake of something produced by the impact of such a stroke, knock, or tap, such as a sound, an explosion, a vibration, or the like; thus, percussion instruments in an orchestra are those played by striking, such as a drum, a gong, cymbals, bells, a tambourine, and the like; a percussion bullet contains a substance that is exploded by percussion; a doctor by percussion (that is, by tapping or striking the chest or abdomen) discovers by the sounds produced the condition of a patient's lungs or abdominal organs. Jar applies to the painful and disturbing, but not necessarily injurious, shaking suffered as a result of a collision, clash, shock, or concussion; as, the fall gave him a jar, but nothing worse; we felt only the jar of the earthquake. Jolt carries a stronger implication of jerking out of place than of shaking and therefore carries a clearer suggestion of loss or near-loss of balance; as, to receive a jolt when the car ran over a hole in the road; the stern criticism gave him the first jolt he had ever had. Brunt once denoted, and still to a certain extent denotes, the force or shock of something which assails one as with a blow, an attack, or an assault (as, "Bearing the first brunt of the enemy's attack"—Wellington; "Grindal... bore the whole brunt of the queen's displeasure"—Hallam). The term now more often denotes either the major part of such a shock or, even more frequently, the chief stress or strain imposed upon one by a crisis, or a situation or condition beyond one's control; as, to bear the brunt of his parents' support; the brunt of the defense fell on civilians rather than on the trained soldiers.

Ana. Hitting or hit, striking or stroke, smiting, slapping or slap (see corresponding verbs at STRIKE): beating, pounding, buffeting (see BEAT, v.).

impair. Damage, mar, *injure, harm, hurt, spoil.

Ana. *Weaken, enfeeble, debilitate, sap, undermine, disable, cripple: *deface, disfigure, disfigure: *deform, distort, contort, warp.

Ant. Improve, amend: repair. — Con. Better, ameliorate (see IMPROVE).

impalpable. *Imperceptible, insensible, intangible, inappreciable, imponderable.

Ana. Tenuous, rare, slight (see THIN, adj.): attenuated, extenuated, rarefied (see THIN, v.).

Ant. Palpable. — Con. *Perceptible, sensible, tangible, appreciable, imponderable.

impart. *Communicate.

Ana. *Share, participate, partake: *distribute, dispense, divide: convey, *transfer: instill, inculcate, *implant: imbue, inoculate, leaven, *infuse.

impartial. *Fair, equitable, unbiased, objective, just, dispassionate, uncolored.

Ana. Disinterested, detached, aloof, *indifferent.

Ant. Partial. — Con. Influenced, swayed, affected (see AFFECT).

impassable. Impassable, impenetrable, impervious, impermeable agree in meaning not admitting passage through. Impassable applies chiefly to stretches of land, water, or the like, which cannot be passed over or crossed because of some insuperable difficulty or obstruction; as, the river is impassable in the rainy season; the road between here and the city is impassable since the storm blew down the trees; "this ocean of snow, which after October is impassable" (Evelyn); "The gulf is the difference between the angelic and the diabolic temperament. What more impassable gulf could you have?" (Shaw). Impenetrable applies chiefly to that which is so dense or so thick that not even the thinnest shaft (as of light, air, etc.) can find its way through; as, an impenetrable fog; impenetrable gloom or darkness; "this gentleman was impenetrable to ideas" (P. Colum); "Professor [Gilbert] Murray has... interposed between Euripides and ourselves a barrier more impenetrable than the Greek language" (T. S. Eliot). Often, however, impenetrable is preferred to impassable when implying an exceedingly dense growth that prevents passage; as, an impenetrable thicket; an impenetrable forest. Impervious implies impenetrability but it is used more often in its extended than in its literal sense. Literally, it now applies chiefly to substances or materials whose surfaces have been finished or treated so that they are airtight, watertight, soundproof, or the like; as, "No surface coating has ever been found which is impervious to sun, wind and rain" (C. C. Furnas). When applied to persons, or their minds or hearts, impervious usually implies complete resistance to that which attempts entrance; as, "Impervious to threats or prayers or tears" (Hewlett); "We become impervious to new truth both from habit and from desire" (B. Russell); "so soaked with the preserve [i.e., preserving fluid] 'good form' that we are impervious to the claims and clamour of that ill-bred creature—life!" (Galsworthy). Impermeable implies impenetrability (either natural or artificially acquired) by a fluid such as water or gas, and incapacity for becoming soaked or permeated; the term applies chiefly to substances such as some clays which do not absorb water, to cloths treated so as to be rainproof, or to materials which do not admit the passage of air, light, gas, and the like; as, impermeable rocks; gas pipes should be made of an impermeable metal; impermeable roofing.

Ant. Passable.

Do not confuse impassable with impassible.

impassible. Insensitive, *insensible, anesthetic.

Do not confuse impassible with impassable or with impassive.

impassioned. Impassioned, passionate, ardent, fervent, fervid, perferd agree in meaning actuated by or manifesting intense feeling. Impassioned, though applicable to persons, is far more often found in current use in reference to utterance or artistic expression or to the mood or mental state which evokes such utterance or expression. The word usually implies intensity without violence, and feeling of such depth, sincerity, and potency that it passes naturally and inevitably from the person into his expression. "Poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge; it is the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all Science" (Wordsworth). "The letters... are written by this master of impassioned recollection in a style so musical, so magical and moving, that the experiences he recounts become our own" (L. P. Smith). Passionate, on the other hand, always implies vehemence and, often, violence of emotion; when the latter idea is suggested, the word also may connote loss of rational guidance or wasteful diffusion (sometimes even perversion) of emotional power; as, a passionate (usually better than impassioned) harangue; a passionate reformer; passionate (not impassioned) partisanship. "Passionate feeling is desirable, provided it is not destructive" (B. Russell). "To match mere good, sound reasons, against the passionate conclusions of love is a waste of intellect bordering on the absurd" (Conrad). Ardent differs from passionate largely in its freedom from derogatory implications and in its connotations of qualities suggestive of flame or fire. It is the preferred word when vehemence is implied and the intense feeling expresses itself in eagerness, zeal, enthusiasm, acts of devotion, and the like; as, an ardent desire for the truth; an ardent supporter of liberal ideas; an ardent lover; ardent love. "Heredity in man is hardly the simple thing that many of the ardent eugenisists would have us believe" (C. C. Furnas). Fervent also implies a quality of fire, but it suggests a fire that glows rather than one that bursts into flame. Hence, though it implies strength and depth of feeling, it more often suggests steadiness than vehemence and inward quiet rather than outward activity. It is applicable chiefly to wishes, prayers, hopes, or the like, that are heartfelt or devout but it is also applied to an emotion (or to a person feeling such an emotion) that is free from turbulence, as of sexual desire or of personal ambitions; as, fervent thanks; fervent good wishes; a fervent Christian; fervent prayers. "Jane's feelings, though fervent, were little displayed" (Austen). "The Gods approve The depth, and not the tumult, of the soul; A fervent, not ungovernable, love" (Wordsworth). Fervid, like impassioned, is applied more to moods and expressions than to persons; in contrast to impassioned, however, it sometimes suggests more obvious, more warmly expressed, and, often, more spontaneous emotion. "Who could help liking her? her generous nature, her gift for appreciation, her whole-hearted, fervid enthusiasm?" (L. P. Smith). Frequently, it carries a strong suggestion of feverishness which distinguishes it sharply from fervent, to which it is etymologically allied; thus, servent thanks suggest the depth and sincerity of the emotion which prompt them; fervid thanks suggest profuseness or an overwrought state of mind. "Was it because his fervid manner of love-making offended her . . . ?" (Bennett). Perfervid, however, always carries an implication of too great emotional excitement or of overwrought feelings; it far more than fervid casts doubt upon the sincerity of the emotion that is displayed with vehemence. "To court their own discomfiture by love is a common instinct with certain perfervid women" (Hardy).

Ana. Vehement, *intense: *deep, profound: *sentimental, romantic, maudlin.

Ant. Unimpassioned. — Con. Dispassionate, uncolored, objective (see FAIR, adj.).

Impassive. Impassive, stoic, phlegmatic, apathetic, stolid denote in common unresponsive, or but slightly responsive, to something that might be expected to excite emotion or interest, or to produce a sensation. The distinctions to be drawn between these adjectives hold true also of their corresponding nouns, impassivity or impassiveness, stoicism, phlegm, apathy, stolidity. One is impassive who feels or shows no emotion or sensation, without necessary implication of insusceptibility. "His majestic impassivity contrasting with the overt astonishment with which a row of savagely ugly attendant chiefs grinned and gaped" (Shaw). "Under their impassive exterior they preserve . . . emotions of burning intensity" (G. P. Lathrop). One is stoic who is indifferent to pleasure or (esp.) pain; the word frequently suggests unflinching fortitude. "Not only the cataclysm of a world, but also the stoic and indomitable temper that endures it" (Lowes). Phlegmatic implies a temperament or constitution in which emotion is hard to arouse, or, when aroused, is moderate or restrained. "Cold and phlegmatic must he be who is not warmed into admiration by the surrounding scenery" (C. Waterton). "His fervid manner of love-making offended her English phlegm" (Bennett). Apathetic, in its earliest philosophical use implying "the extinction of the passions by the ascendancy of reason" (W. Fleming), now usually implies either a remiss and culpable indifference, or such a preoccupation with a particular depressing emotion (as care, grief, or despair) or bodily pain as makes one insensible to other emotion or pain, and deficient in, or devoid of, the usual human interests. "There is only one alarming aspect of our national debt . . . the apathy and ignorance of the American public with regard to it. The common attitude is . . . why should an ordinary citizen add the national debt to his other workaday worries" (H. Scherman). "The dull apathy of despair" (Wilde). "An uncomplaining apathy displaced This anguish; and, indifferent to delight, To aim and purpose, he consumed his days, To private interest dead, and public care" (Wordsworth). Stolid implies heavy, dull, obtuse impassivity or apathy, or utter blankness of countenance mirroring or suggesting such quality; often, specifically, impassive, mechanical, plodding, unquestioning, unresourceful adherence to routine. "Stolid Saxon rustics, in whom the temperature of religious zeal was little . . . above absolute zero" (A. Huxley). "The stolidest mask ever given to man" (Meredith). "[One] who said, 'I won't have any soup, steward, I'll have the fish,' was met by a stolidly reproving glance. 'The soup is being served, sir'" (V. Heiser).

Ana. *Cool, composed, collected, imperturbable: reserved, taciturn, *silent, reticent: callous, *hardened, indurated: *insensible, insensitive.

Ant. Responsive. — Con. *Tender, compassionate, sympathetic, warm, warmhearted.

⚠ Do not confuse impassive with impassible.

Impassivity or impassiveness. Apathy, stolidity, phlegm, stoicism. See under IMPASSIVE.

Impatient. Impatient, nervous, nervy, unquiet, restless, restive, uneasy, fidgety, skittish, feverish, hectic, jumpy, jittery come into comparison only when they mean manifesting signs of unrest or an inability to keep still or quiet. Impatient implies an inability to bear delay, opposition, discomfort, undue prolixity, and the like, with composure: it therefore connotes, as a rule, not physical but mental or emotional unrest, and may suggest unrestrained eagerness, extreme irritableness, brusqueness, testiness, intolerance, or the like; as, "So tedious is this day As is the night before some festival To an impatient child that hath new robes" (Shak.); "Cease your contention, which has been too long; I grow impatient" (Pope); "When we pursue the ulterior significance of the colours into yet wider regions. . . I fear the august common sense of the Occident becomes affronted and impatient" (Binyon). Nervous or often, in informal British use, nervy, implies unsteadiness of nerves, and a proneness to excitability: the word may suggest any one of various causes, such as disease, or temperament, or anxiety; as, a nervous (or nervy), fretful woman; "you and I, whose ordinary daily talk maintains its slow or hurried, nervous or phlegmatic . . . but always pedestrian gait" (Lowes); "Becoming more nervous as the gloom increased" (Hudson). Unquiet, though applicable to anything that is not quiet, is commonly used with a strong implication of prolonged or conspicuous agitation or of troubling or disturbing distractions that hinder one's peace of mind or soul or prevent concentration: the word is applicable both to the person and to the thing which troubles him; as, these unquiet times; "Unquiet meals make ill digestions" (Shak.). Restless (whose basic term is ultimately a Teutonic word meaning bed, grave, stopping place) usually implies constant and more or less aimless motion or activity: often, specifically, it connotes mental agitation (as, "our heart is restless, until it repose in Thee"—St. Augustine, transl. by Pusey; "indubitably not happy . . . restless and disquieted, his disquietude sometimes amounting to agony"—Arnold), or eagerness to change (as, "He was restless and dissatisfied with his life"—S. Anderson), or continuous or unceasing movements to and fro or back and forth (as, the restless sea; a restless crowd; a restless drumming on the table with his fingers; "he was as restless as a hyena"—De Quincey). Restive (ultimately from a Latin verb meaning to stay back, withstand, resist) not only has no etymological connection with restless, but in its earlier and stricter senses implies an unwillingness to move (see CONTRARY, 2); however, it has so long been confused with restless even by good writers that it is now an acceptable, if not a universally approved, synonym. Even in the sense here considered it implies impatience under attempts to restrain, to control, or, especially, to keep attentive, and suggests either inability to keep still or to persist in what one is doing. "He did right to preach to women: men would not have listened to him. As it was, Miss Joy Blewins, and Mrs. M'Murphy, were restive" (Meredith). "They were all becoming restive under the monotonous persistence of the missionary" (Cather). "As restive and dissatisfied as a party of 7 bridge-players" (Eddington). Uneasy usually implies restlessness born of anxiety, doubt, uncertainty, or insecurity; as, he is uneasy over business conditions; an uneasy conscience; an uneasy sense that all was not well with his family; "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown" (Shak.). "So we come down, uneasy, to look, uneasily pacing the beach. These are the dykes our fathers made: we have never known a breach" (Kipling).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Fidgety implies restless movements resulting from nervousness, boredom, or uneasiness of mind: it usually suggests an inability to keep one's hands, feet, or body still or to settle down to any definite task or occupation; as, toward the end of the day, the pupils become fidgety; "He declared if I was fidgety he should have no comfort" (Burney). Skittish (etymologically, capering) applies especially to horses: the term usually implies restiveness, or impatience of restraint, and a dancing backwards and forwards in or as if in a fright; as, they never allowed their daughter to ride a horse known to be skittish. The term is applied to persons (or to things that are personified) whose movements or actions suggest those of a skittish horse; in such use, skittish may connote extreme liveliness and frivolity (as, a young skittish widow), unsteadiness or undependableness (as, "skittish fortune" —Shak.; "they are...jealous of each other—fearful, timid, skittish" —John Adams), or extreme coyness (as, "Name not yourself her lover, but her friend. How many skittish girls have thus been caught?" —Dryden). Both feverish and hectic, as here considered, imply an underlying and disturbing excitement that makes for restlessness, or incapacity for ease, quiet, or calm. Feverish suggests the hotness, rush, or intensity of a high fever; as, "Work...pressed forward with the same feverish haste" (H. Adams); "his life...broken by feverish business trips across the ocean" (Van W. Brooks); "the world has become a laboratory where immature and feverish minds experiment with unknown forces" (Buchan). Hectic (literally, feverish, as in a wasting disease), on the other hand, implies an excitement created as by the need of hurry, the pressure of activities, or the like; usually it suggests conditions that exhaust one or rob one of capacity for keeping oneself calm or keeping one's activities under steady control; as, "even Death moves swiftly in hectic, high-stepping New York" (Lucas); all the students found examination week a hectic time; hectic preparations for a big dinner. Jumpy and jittery (both colloquial, somewhat slangy terms) imply extreme nervousness that exhibits itself in tremulous, uncertain movements. Jumpy, however, usually suggests a fearful or apprehensive mood, and lack of control over one's temper as well as over one's muscles (as, the refugee children are still jumpy though it is now some time since they left England); jittery suggests domination not only by fears but by recollections that destroy one's nervous control and impair one's mental stability; as, soldiers still jittery from their experiences under heavy fire; "the chief factor in making children jittery is jittery parents" (Time).

Ana. Fretful, querulous, *irritable, snappish, waspish: *eager, anxious, avid, keen: impetuous, *precipitate, headlong, hasty, sudden, abrupt.

Ant. Patient. — Con. Composed, imperturbable, unruffled, *cool: *calm, serene, tranquil, placid.

impeach. Indict, incriminate, criminate, *accuse, charge, arraign.

Ana. Condemn, denounce, blame, censure (see CRITICIZE): try, test, *prove.

Con. *Exculpate, vindicate, exonerate, acquit, absolve.

impeccable. Impeccable, faultless, flawless, errorless are often used with little distinction in the sense of absolutely correct and beyond criticism. Impeccable, in modern usage, usually applies to something with which no fault can be found, or which is irreproachably correct; as, "The only impeccable writers are those that never wrote" (Hazlitt); "her logical process is impeccable" (Grandgent); "in impeccable sureness of hand he [Okio, the Japanese artist] has scarcely a rival" (Binyon). Faultless is often used in place of impeccable without loss, but it is sometimes preferred when the emphasis is upon the absence of defect or blemish of any kind rather than upon technical correctness; as, "Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see, Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be" (Pope). Its distinctive implication, however, is often that of insipidity or tediousness; as, "Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null, Dead perfection, no more" (Tennyson). Flawless applies especially, but not exclusively, to natural products in which no cracks, blemishes, or the like, can be detected (as, a flawless diamond; a flawless flower), to character, reputation, or the like, which is admittedly perfect or unblemished (as, to sacrifice one's flawless reputation by a single act), to a work of art or its execution (as, a flawless lyric; the flawless technique of the pianist). Errorless usually implies absence of all mistakes, especially of such mistakes as are technically regarded as errors; thus, an errorless baseball game may not involve flawless playing.

Ana. Inerrant, unerring, *infallible: *correct, accurate, precise, right, nice: *perfect, entire, whole, intact.

Con. *Deficient, defective: *superficial, shallow, uncritical, cursory: culpable, *blameworthy.

impede. *Hinder, obstruct, block, bar, dam.

Ana. Clog, *hamper, fetter, trammel, shackle, manacle, hog-tie: *embarrass, discomfit, disconcert, rattle, faze: thwart, baffle, balk, *frustrate.

Ant. Assist: promote. — Con. *Advance, further, forward: *help, aid.

impediment. *Obstacle, obstruction, bar, snag.

Ana. *Difficulty, hardship, rigor, vicissitude: barrier, *bar: handicap (see ADVANTAGE, 1).

Ant. Aid, assistance: advantage (sense 1).

impedimenta. *Baggage, luggage.

impel. Drive, *move, actuate.

Ana. Compel, constrain, *force: *provoke, excite, stimulate: *incite, instigate, foment: goad, spur (see corresponding nouns at MOTIVE).

Ant. Restrain. — Con. Curb, check, snaffle, inhibit (see RESTRAIN).

impending. Impending, imminent come into comparison as meaning highly likely to occur very soon or without further warning. Impending carries a strong implication that the thing which is likely to occur forecasts itself long enough ahead by some ominous or threatening signs as to keep one in suspense; as, an impending storm; an impending dismissal; not so ill that he was unaware of his impending death; "Th' impending woe sat heavy on his breast" (Pope); "his face...gave me no clue to the character of the impending communication" (Conrad). Imminent, the stronger term, applies to that (especially danger, misfortune, etc.) which threatens to happen immediately, or is on the point of happening; as, "Three times to-day You have defended me from imminent death" (Shak.); discovery was imminent; "The one thing plain was that a new war was imminent, and he longed for Brutus and Cassius, now exiles beyond the sea" (Buchan).

Ana. *Close, near, nigh: approaching, nearing (see APPROACH, v.): likely, *probable: threatening, menacing (see THREATEN).

impenetrable. Impervious, impermeable, *impassable.

Ana. *Close, dense, compact, thick: solid, hard, *firm: compacted, concentrated, consolidated (see COMPACT, v.): callous, *hardened, indurated: obdurate, adamant, *inflexible.

Ant. Penetrable. — Con. *Soft, mild, gentle, lenient: indulgent, merciful, clement, *forbearing, tolerant.

impenetrate. Interpenetrate, penetrate, *permeate, pervade, impregnate, saturate.

Ana. *Enter, pierce, probe, penetrate: invade, entrench (see TRESPASS): drench, *soak, sog.

imperative. Peremptory, imperious, *masterful, domineering.

Ana. Commanding, ordering, bidding (see COMMAND, v.): magisterial, authoritative, *dictatorial, dogmatic, oracular: arbitrary, autocratic, despotic (see ABSOLUTE).

Con. Supplicating or supplicatory, entreating, imploring, beseeching, begging (see corresponding verbs at BEG): mild, gentle, lenient, *soft.

imperceptible. Imperceptible, insensible, impalpable, intangible, inappreciable, imponderable come into comparison when they mean incapable of being apprehended by the senses or intellect in form, nature, extent, degree, or the like, even though known to be real or existent. Except for this denial of apprehensibility, these terms carry the same implications and connotations as the affirmative adjectives discriminated at PERCEPTIBLE; as, the imperceptible movement of the earth; "he grew into the scheme of things by insensible gradations" (H. G. Wells); "the almost impalpable beauties of style and expression" (Prescott), "we shall consider that more subtle and intangible thing, the soul which he [Augustus] sought to build up in his people" (Buchan); that inappreciable particle of an element called an atom; the imponderable factors, such as temperament and mental stability, which make or mar a promising career.

Ant. Perceptible.

imperial. *Kingly, regal, royal, queenly, princely.

Ana. Majestic, august, stately, noble, *grand: sovereign, *dominant.

⚠ Do not confuse imperial with imperious.

imperious. Domineering, *masterful, peremptory, imperative.

Ana. *Dictatorial, authoritative, authoritarian, magisterial, despotic, tyrannical, arbitrary, autocratic (see ABSOLUTE): lordly, overbearing (see PROUD).

Ant. Abject. — Con. Obsequious, servile, menial, *subservient, slavish: *compliant, acquiescent.

⚠ Do not confuse imperious with imperial.

impermeable. Impervious, impenetrable, *impassable.

Ana. Solid, hard, *firm: *tight.

Con. Absorbing or absorbent, imbibing, assimilating or assimilative (see corresponding verbs at ABSORB).

impersonate. Personate, play, *act.

Ana. Imitate, mimic, ape, *copy: simulate, counterfeit, feign (see ASSUME): *caricature, burlesque.

impersonator. *Actor, player, mummer, mime, performer, Thespian, trouper.

impertinent. Impertinent, officious, pragmatical (or pragmatic), meddlesome, intrusive, obtrusive come into comparison when they are applied to persons, and their acts and utterances, and mean given to exceeding, or manifesting a disposition to exceed, the bounds of propriety regarding the interposition of oneself in another person's affairs. Impertinent, as here compared (it is also the opposite of pertinent; see RELEVANT), implies a concerning oneself more or less offensively with things which are another's business or, at least, not in any sense one's own. "I told him of all that had occurred to make my former interference in his affairs absurd and impertinent" (Austen). "I should have liked to ask the girl for a word which would give my imagination its line. But how was one to venture so far? I can be rough sometimes but I am not naturally impertinent" (Conrad). Officious implies the offering, often well-meant offering, of services, attentions, or assistance that are not needed or that are unwelcome or offensive; as, " 'Twas but the officious zeal of a well-meaning creature for my honor" (Sterne); "I cannot walk home from office, but some officious friend offers his unwelcome courtesies to accompany me" (Lamb). Pragmatical (or, less often, pragmatic), now the least common of all the terms here discussed, stresses the disposition to busy oneself fussily, especially in that which is not one's own affair: it also carries a stronger connotation of self-importance or self-assurance than any of the others; as, "like some pragmatical old coxcomb represented on the stage" (Burney); "Coming to-day in this pragmatical way, when nobody sent for you" (Godwin); "Pragmatical insolence" (Scott). Meddlesome carries a stronger implication of annoying interference in other people's affairs than any of the preceding terms: it may imply the qualities of character suggested by any of the other words, but it usually also connotes a prying or inquisitive nature; as, a meddlesome old woman; the people found the government unduly meddlesome; to poke meddlesomely into another's affairs. Intrusive, as here compared, applies largely to persons, actions, words, and the like, that reveal a disposition to thrust oneself into other people's affairs or society or to be unduly curious about what is not one's concern. "Navajo hospitality is not intrusive. Eusabio made the Bishop understand that he was glad to have him there, and let him alone" (Cather). Obtrusive, as here considered, is applicable like intrusive and often carries very similar implications. Distinctively, however, it connotes objectionable actions more than an objectionable disposition, and so stresses a thrusting forward of oneself, as into a position where one can harm more often than help or where one is unduly or improperly conspicuous. "Rebels against a social order that has no genuine need of them and is disposed to tolerate them only when they are not obtrusive" (Mencken).

Ana. Insinuating, insinuatve, ingratiating (see DISARMING): interfering, meddling (see MEDDLER): arrogant, insolent (see PROUD): brazen, impudent, brash, barefaced, *shameless: *offensive, repugnant.

Con. Decent, *decorous, seemly, proper, comme il faut: reserved, reticent, *silent.

imperturbable. Composed, collected, *cool, unruffled, nonchalant.

Ana. Immobile, *immovable: serene, *calm, tranquil, placid: *complacent, self-satisfied, smug.

Ant. Choleric, touchy. — Con. Discomfited, disconcerted, rattled, fazed (see EMBARRASS): *irascible, splenetic, testy, techy.

impervious. Impenetrable, impermeable, *impassable.

Ana. Resisting or resistant, withstanding, opposing, combating (see corresponding verbs at OPPOSE): *hardened, indurated, callous: obdurate, adamant, adamant, *inflexible.

Con. Open, exposed, susceptible, sensitive, *liable, prone.

impetuous. Headlong, *precipitate, abrupt, hasty, sudden.

Ana. Impulsive, *spontaneous: vehement, *intense: forceful, forcible, *powerful: violent (see corresponding noun at FORCE): *impatient, restive, feverish, hectic: *impassioned, passionate, fervid, ardent.

Con. *Steady, even, equable: *deliberate, premeditated, considered, advised.

impetus. 1 Momentum, *speed, velocity, pace.

Ana. Energy, force, *power: impelling or impulsion, driving, moving (see corresponding verbs at MOVE).

2 *Stimulus, incitement, stimulant.

Ana. Incitive, impulse, spur, goad, *motive, spring.

impingement. *Impact, collision, clash, shock, concussion, percussion, jar, jolt, brunt.

Ana. Hitting or hit, striking or stroke, smiting (see corresponding verbs at STRIKE): encroachment, entrenchment (see corresponding verbs at TRESPASS):

*impression, impress, imprint, stamp, print.

impious. Impious, profane, blasphemous, sacrilegious agree in meaning showing marked irreverence for that which is sacred or divine. Impious usually implies extreme disrespect for God or the laws of God, or for those endowed with God-given authority, particularly as shown positively in thought or in actions; as, "Against the throne and monarchy of God, Raised impious war in Heaven" (Milton); "When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway, The post of honour is a private station" (Addison); "The impious challenger of power divine" (Cowper). Profane (see PROFANE, 1) applies to men and to words and acts that manifest not only impiety but defilement or desecration, sometimes thoughtless, and sometimes intentional, of that which is worthy of highest reverence or respect; as, "Shall I... add a greater sin By prostituting holy things to idols... What act more execrably unclean, profane?" (Milton); "then [in the Golden Age] speech profane, And manners profligate, were rarely found" (Cowper); "that such impiety may be utterly banished from these works [the building of St. Paul's Cathedral]... it is ordered that profane swearing shall be a sufficient crime to dismiss any labourer" (Sir C. Wren). Blasphemous adds to profane the implication of indignity offered directly or indirectly to the Supreme Being: in very strict use, it implies a conscious or deliberate insult; as, the blasphemous rites of devil worshipers; "We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God" (Acts vi. 11). Sacrilegious, in its strictest sense, implies the commission of a sacrilege (see PROFANATION), but in its extended sense, which is now the more common, it implies the defilement of that which is holy or sacred, as by acts of depredation, disrespect, contempt, or the like; as, the sacrilegious despoilers of ancient churches; "A most sacrilegious breach of trust" (Bolingbroke); "She saw that it was a terrible, a sacrilegious thing to interfere with another's destiny, to lay the tenderest touch upon any human being's right to love and suffer after his own fashion" (E. Wharton).

Ana. Nefarious, iniquitous, flagitious (see VICIOUS): *irreligious, ungodly, godless.

Ant. Pious: reverent. — Con. *Holy, sacred, blessed, religious, spiritual, divine.

impish. Roguish, waggish, mischievous, *playful, wanton, frolicsome, sportive.

Ana. *Saucy, pert, arch: naughty, *bad: *sly, cunning, tricky.

implacable. Relentless, unrelenting, merciless, *grim. Ana. *Inflexible, inexorable, obdurate, adamant: pitiless, ruthless, compassionless (see affirmative nouns at PITY).

Con. Yielding, submitting, capitulating (see YIELD): merciful, lenient, clement, *forbearing, indulgent, tolerant.

implant. Implant, inculcate, instill (or instil), inseminate, infix are here compared chiefly in their secondary senses, in which they agree in meaning to introduce into the mind. Implant (literally, to plant something in or as if in the soil so that it will take root and grow) usually implies teaching, and it stresses the fixedness or permanency of that which has been taught; as, "The teacher, the parent, or the friend can often do much to implant this conviction" (C. W. Eliot); "The defect in this theory lies in the fact that such a taste [for music], granting it to be elevating, simply cannot be implanted" (Mencken). Inculcate (etymologically, to tread on with the heels) implies persistent or repeated endeavor with the intent to impress firmly on the mind; as, "[she] had sedulously inculcated into the mind of her son... maxims of worldly wisdom" (Edgeworth); "Skillful, conscientious schoolmistresses whose lives were spent in trying to inculcate real knowledge" (Grandgent); "whatever happened, Newland would continue to inculcate in Dallas the same principles and prejudices which had shaped his parents' lives" (E. Wharton). Instill carries from its literal meaning (to pour in drop by drop) the implication of a gradual and gentle method of imparting knowledge: it usually suggests either a teaching that extends over a long period of time, as from infancy to adolescence, or a pupil that cannot, because of age, lack of background, or the like, take in at once that which is taught; as, "Those principles my parents instilled into my unwary understanding" (Broune); "the Viceroy plumed himself on the way in which he had instilled notions of reticence into his staff" (Kipling); "It would be useless, in early years, to attempt to instill a Stoic contempt for death" (B. Russell). Inseminate (literally, to sow as seed where it will germinate or sprout) usually implies an implanting in many minds, either as one step or as a result of a series of steps, so that the ideas take hold and govern the group, class, community, nation, or the like; as, they did not succeed in inseminating radical ideas in the minds of the workers; to uproot old falsities and to inseminate new truths. Infix (literally, to set one thing firmly or fixedly into another) implies teaching or other process that has for its end the formation of habit or the inculcation of something that will be definitely remembered; as, a teacher is often more successful in infixing the illustrative example than the illustrated principle in the minds of his pupils; "The vices which they introduced, and the habits they infix" (Lamb).

Ana. *Infuse, imbue, inoculate, ingrain, leaven: impregnate, saturate, impenetrate, penetrate, *permeate, pervade.

implement. Implement, tool, instrument, appliance, utensil, as here compared, agree in meaning any relatively simple device by means of which one engaged in a craft, trade, art, profession, or any employment involving mechanical or manual operations, is enabled to accomplish one or more of those operations. Nearly all of these words (the distinct exception is appliance) are interchangeable in their general senses, but custom and good usage have greatly restricted them in their specific and most common applications. An implement, in general, is anything that is requisite to effecting the end one has in view or to performing the work one undertakes; thus, the implements of modern warfare consist of all the weapons necessary to a well-equipped army, navy, and air force. "The sit-down strike, a relatively new implement of organized labor" (Americana Annual, 1938). In specific use, implement is the preferred term when the reference is to a contrivance for tilling the soil, such as a spade, a plow, a harrow, or a cultivator; as, farming implements; gardening implements. Historically, it is the preferred term for any of the articles which are essential to the performance of a religious service; thus, the implements of the Mass include vestments as well as chalice, paten, altar stone, and the like. It is also the preferred term for the various crude devices made from stone, wood, and earth, by primitive peoples, as weapons or for use in digging, carrying, lifting, and the like. A tool, in general, is anything that facilitates the accomplishment of the end one has in view; it is therefore something particularly adapted in its nature or by its construction to make possible or relatively easy the work one is doing; as, it is not difficult to keep house when one has the proper tools; a scholar needs foreign languages as tools. "Comparison and analysis... are the chief tools of the critic" (T. S. Eliot). In specific use, tool is the preferred term when reference is made to any of the implements used by carpenters, mechanics, or other artisans or craftsmen in accomplishing a particular kind of work, such as sawing, boring, piercing, or chipping; thus, a saw, a gimlet, an awl, a chisel, are tools. Ordinarily tool suggests manipulation by the hand; but some machines for doing work that may be accomplished more slowly by manual labor and tools are called machine tools (as, for example, the lathe). An instrument, as here compared (see also MEAN, n., 2; PAPER, 1), is, in general, any delicately constructed device by means of which work (not exclusively a mechanical operation) may be accomplished with precision. Many instruments are by definition tools, but instrument is the preferred term among surgeons, dentists, draftsmen, surveyors, artists, and the like, whose technique requires delicate tools and expertness and finesse in their manipulation. Some instruments, however, are not tools, but implements in the larger sense, for they are requisite to the effecting of one's ends, but do not necessarily facilitate any manual operations; thus, a thermometer and a barometer are recording instruments essential to the meteorologist; a telescope is an astronomical instrument; a piano, a violin, a cello are musical instruments by means of which a performer evokes musical sounds. An appliance (see also MACHINE) is in general a device which effects work but which is moved by some kind of power (such as hand power, water power, steam, or electricity), usually, but not necessarily, under the guidance of a hand; thus, a dentist's drill may be called an appliance when it is attached to a dental engine; in industry, an appliance is often distinguished from a tool, though they may both do the same kind of work, in that a tool is manipulated by hand, and an appliance is moved and regulated by machinery. A utensil is, in general, anything that is useful in accomplishing the work associated with a domestic or similar establishment, such as cooking, cleaning, and the like; it may be applied to tools used in cookery and other household work, such as eggbeaters, graters, rolling pins, brooms, mops, and the like, but it is most commonly applied to containers, such as pots, pans, pails, jars, especially those which form part of the kitchen, dairy, or bedroom equipment. Consequently, utensil, in other than household use, often means a vessel; as, the sacred utensils of a church.

Ana. *Machine, engine, apparatus, appliance: contrivance, *device, contraption, gadget.

implement, v. *Enforce.

Ana. Effect, fulfill, execute, achieve, accomplish, *perform: *realize, actualize, materialize.

implicate. 1 Imply, involve, *include, comprehend, embrace, subsume.

Ana. Connect, link, associate, relate, *join.

Ant. Dissociate. — Con. *Exclude, eliminate, rule out: *extricate, disentangle, untangle.

2 *Involve.

Ana. *Concern, affect: incriminate, criminate (see ACCUSE).

Con. *Exculpate, absolve, acquit, exonerate.

implication. Implication, inference are often used, even by careful writers, without a clear sense of their fine distinctions when they specifically refer to something that is hinted at but not explicitly stated. Implication applies only to that which is hinted, whether the writer or speaker is aware of it or not, or whether the reader or hearer recognizes it or not. When, however, the reader or hearer recognizes that which is implied and gathers from it its full significance or makes an explicit statement of it, he has drawn or made an inference; as, You misunderstood the implications of his speech, so that your inferences misrepresent his point of view; by implication (not inference) you argue that this is the only possible solution; by inference (not implication) from what you leave unsaid, I know you believe this the only possible solution; he did not perceive the implications (not inferences) of his remark; the inferences (not implications) to be drawn from his remark are inescapable.

Ana. Hinting or hint, suggestion, intimation (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST): *insinuation, innuendo.

implicit. Implicit, virtual, constructive come into comparison only when they mean being such (i.e., the thing expressed by the term qualified) by correct or justifiable inference rather than by direct statement or proof. That is implicit (as opposed to explicit) which is implied by the words, acts, appearance, character, methods, or the like, of the person or thing concerned, but is not definitely stated or expressed; as, "A good present behavior is an implicit repentance for any miscarriage in what is past" (Spectator); "the distinction between poetry and drama, which Mr. Archer makes explicit, is implicit in the view of Swinburne" (T. S. Eliot). That is virtual (as opposed to actual) which exists in essence or effect but is not actually designated, or recognized, or put forward, or regarded, as such; as, his statement is a virtual confession; "But America [i.e., the Colonies] is virtually represented. What! does the electric force of virtual representation more easily pass over the Atlantic than pervade... Chester and Durham, surrounded by abundance of representation that is actual and palpable?" (Burke); "the dictator's constant associate and his virtual chief-of-staff" (Buchan). That is constructive (chiefly a legal term: opposed to manifest) which is inferred from a text, from known acts, known conditions, or the like, and which rests therefore on an interpretation of this text, these acts, or these conditions rather than upon direct statement or direct evidence; thus, if the law explicitly gives a governor the right of removal of certain officials, he may claim the right to control and direct their official acts as a constructive power; a mere failure to obey the orders of the court may be interpreted by the judge as constructive contempt.

Ana. Implied, suggested, intimated, hinted (see SUGGEST): inferred, deduced, gathered (see INFER).

Ant. Explicit. — Con. Express, definite, specific (see EXPLICIT): expressed, voiced, uttered (see EXPRESS, v.): stated, recited, recounted, described (see RELATE).

implore. Entreat, beseech, supplicate, *beg, importune, adjure, conjure.

imponderable. Impalpable, *imperceptible, inappreciable, insensible, intangible.

Ant. Ponderable, appreciable. — Con. Weighty, consequential, important, significant, momentous (see corresponding nouns at IMPORTANCE).

import, v. *Mean, denote, signify.

Ana. *Denote, connote: involve, imply, *include, comprehend: *suggest, imply, intimate, hint: mean, *intend.

import, n. 1 Significance, *meaning, sense, acceptance, signification.

Ana. Denotation, connotation (see under DENOTE, 2): interpreting or interpretation, construing or construction (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN): drift, tenor (see TENDENCY): *implication.

2 Significance, *importance, consequence, moment, weight.

Ana. *Worth, value: purpose, intent, design, object, objective (see INTENTION): *emphasis, stress.

importance. Importance, consequence, moment, weight, significance, import come into comparison when they denote the quality, or the character, or the state of someone or something that impresses others as of great (sometimes eminent) worth, value, influence, or the like. Importance, probably the most inclusive of these terms, implies a judgment of the mind by which superior value, worth, influence, or the like, is ascribed to a person or thing; as, there are no cities of importance in this state; he always attaches importance to what seem to others trivial events; tradition gives importance to the study of the classics; "Hence flowers come to assume [in Oriental art]...an importance equal to that of figure-painting with us" (Binyon). Consequence is often used interchangeably with importance, especially in implying superior social rank or distinction (as, men of importance, or consequence) but among discriminating writers and speakers it usually implies importance because of the thing's possible or probable outcome, effects, results, or the like; as, "Woe betide him, and her too, when it comes to things of consequence...if she have not resolution enough to resist idle interference" (Austen); "He...was eager to have the Cathedral begun; but whether it was Midi Romanesque or Ohio German in style, seemed to him of little consequence" (Cather); "'To marry one of the right people...is of the greatest consequence for a happy life'" (R. Macaulay); "'to cultivate the love of truth, it is of the utmost consequence that children should study things as well as words, external nature as well as books'" (C. W. Eliot). Moment implies conspicuous or self-evident consequence; as, "enterprises of great pitch and moment" (Shak.); "a mistake of no very great moment—in fine, a mere slip" (Barham); "What was of very high moment was his [Montmorency's] first step, the summoning of the Estates of Languedoc" (Belloc). Weight implies a judgment of the relatively great importance or of the particular moment of the thing under consideration; as, the judge gave great weight to the testimony of the accused man; "In such a point of weight, so near mine honour" (Shak.); "I looked for you at dinner-time; I forget now What for; but then 'twas a matter of more weight Than laying siege to a city" (Millay). Significance and import are often used as though they were indistinguishable in meaning from importance or consequence; actually, they imply a quality or character in a person or thing which ought to mark it as of importance or consequence but which may or may not be recognized; thus, one may miss the significance (not the importance) of an occurrence; one may recognize the import (better than importance) of a piece of testimony; so, "a widespread recognition of the significance of that achievement" (H. Ellis); "the book was invested with a significance...which its intrinsic literary and philosophical merits could not justify" (A. Huxley); "a fear that the spectator might lose, in the shock of crude sensation, the spiritual import of the catastrophe" (Binyon).

Ana. Prominence, conspicuousness, saliency (see corresponding adjectives at NOTICEABLE): eminence, illustriousness, distinguishableness or distinction (see corresponding adjectives at FAMOUS): seriousness, gravity (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS): magnitude, *size, extent.

Ant. Unimportance. — Con. Pettiness, triviality, paltriness (see corresponding adjectives at PETTY).

importune. *Beg, entreat, beseech, implore, supplicate, adjure, conjure.

Ana. Tease, pester, plague, harry, *worry: hound, hector, badger (see BAIT): plead, appeal, sue (see under PRAYER).

imposing. Stately, majestic, august, noble, magnificent, *grand, grandiose.

Ana. *Showy, pretentious, ostentatious, pompous: impressive, *moving: regal, imperial (see KINGLY): monumental, stupendous, prodigious (see MONSTROUS).

Ant. Unimposing. — Con. *Contemptible, despicable, sorry, cheap, scurvy, pitiable, beggarly.

impost. *Tax, levy, excise, customs, duty, toll, assessment, rate, tariff, tribute, tithe, teind, cess.

impostor. Impostor, faker, empiric, quack, mountebank, charlatan come into comparison when they denote a person who makes pretensions to being someone or something that he is not, or of being able to do something he cannot really do. Impostor applies especially to one who passes himself off for someone else. "There is an impostor abroad, who takes upon him the name of this young gentleman, and would willingly pass for him" (Addison). However, the word often serves as a general term for anyone who assumes a title, character, or profession that is not his own. "He [Jesus] stripped the impostors in the noonday sun, Showed that they followed all they seemed to shun" (Cowper). Faker (often confused with fakir, a different word, meaning a Moslem mendicant) is a purely colloquial term applicable to one who gives himself the appearance of being what, in character, in profession, or the like, he is not; as, the accused man is not insane, he is merely a clever faker; a hypocrite is a moral or religious faker. Empiric was originally applied to one of an ancient school of physicians who derided medical science and made their personal observations and experience the basis of their medical practice. The term, by extension, now applies to any ignorant and untrained practitioner in medicine, law, or other profession. The term always suggests pretensions to knowledge and skill. "Gordon's efforts to suppress it [slave trade in the Sudan] resembled the palliatives of an empiric treating the superficial symptoms of some profound constitutional disease" (L. Strachey). Quack is the popular and contemptuous term for empiric, but it usually carries an even stronger implication of fraud or self-delusion. "Enthusiasm's [religious fanaticism is] past redemption...Not a' her quacks wi' a' their gumption Can ever mend her" (Burns). "Dishonesty is the raw material not of quacks only, but also, in great part, of dupes" (Carlyle). Mountebank and charlatan were both originally applied to an itinerant quack who mounted a platform and by his tricks and buffoonery attracted a crowd to whom he sold his remedies. In extended use, mountebank may or may not suggest quackery, but it always suggests cheap and undignified efforts (such as by buffoonery) to win attention; as, political mouniebanks. "Our Sabbaths [will be], closed with mummery and buffoon; Preaching and pranks will share the motley scene . . . God's worship and the mouniebank between" (Cowper). Charlatan now applies to any writer, speaker, preacher, or the like, who covers his ignorance, lack of skill, or the like, by pretentious, flashy, or magniloquent display. "Insolent, pretentious, and given to that reckless innovation for the sake of noise and show which was the essence of the charlatan" (G. Eliot).

Ana. Cheat, fraud, fake, humbug (see IMPOSTURE): deceiver, beguiler, misleader (see corresponding verbs at DECEIVE).

imposture, n. Imposture, cheat, fraud, sham, fake, humbug, deceit, deception, counterfeit, simulacrum come into comparison when they mean a thing which pretends to be one thing in its nature, character, or quality, but is really another. Imposture applies not only to any object but to any act or practice which is foisted upon or passed off to another as genuine, authentic, or bona fide; as, several of the gallery's paintings reputed to be the work of Rubens and Rembrandt were impostures; "the hero is as gross an imposture as the heroine" (Shaw). Cheat applies chiefly to something (sometimes to someone) that wins one's belief in its (or his) genuineness, either because one is deliberately misled or imposed upon by another or is the victim of illusion or delusion. "When I consider life, 'tis all a cheat. Yet fool'd with hope, men favour the deceit" (Dryden). "What . . . man . . . Shall prove (what argument could never yet) The Bible an imposture and a cheat!" (Cowper). "Hence, pageant history! hence, gilded cheat!" (Keats). "If I passed myself off on Miss Carew as a gentleman, I should deserve to be exposed as a cheat" (Shaw). Fraud applies to any imposture or impostor that positively reveals perversion of the truth, often criminal perversion, in the claims made for it or for him. "Many persons persisted in believing that his supposed suicide was but another fraud" (J. M'Carthy). "O fallen nobility that, over-awed, Would lip in honey'd whispers of this monstrous fraud [Louis Napoleon]!" (Tennyson). "We may take it as undisputed that Swinburne . . . did something that had not been done before, and that what he did will not turn out to be a fraud" (T. S. Eliot). The not uncommon term pious fraud applies to any imposture for the sake of a good end, especially for the advancement of religion. "The outworn rite, the old abuse, The pious fraud transparent grown" (Whittier). The term is also commonly applied to a person whose piety or zeal for religion is pretense or hypocrisy. Sham applies to any close copy of a thing, especially to one that is more or less obviously a fraudulent imitation. "A strong living Soul in him, and Sincerity there; a Reality, not an artificiality, not a Sham!" (Carlyle). "He smiled, in his worldliest manner. But the smile was a sham" (Bennett). Fake (a colloquial term) applies either to a person that represents himself as someone he is not or, more often, to a worthless thing that is represented as being something that it is not; fake differs from fraud in not necessarily implying dishonesty in these representations, for a fake may be a joke, or a theatrical device, or the like, or it may be a clear fraud; as, this testimonial is clearly a fake; one of the great fakes of all time was the Cardiff Giant; actors using fakes instead of real swords on the stage. Humbug (a colloquial rather than a literary term, much used, however, by good writers) applies to a person, or far less often a thing, that pretends or is pretended to be other, and usually more important, than he or it is, not necessarily because of a desire on the part of the person involved to deceive others, but often because he is self-deceived. "You will take to politics, where you will become . . . the henchman of ambitious humbugs" (Shaw). "What humbugs we are, who pretend to live for Beauty, and never see the Dawn!" (L. P. Smith). Deceit and deception, as here compared, both apply to something that misleads one or deludes one into taking it for what it is not. Deceit, however, usually, but not invariably, suggests the work of a deceiver, or of one (not necessarily a person) that misleads or leads astray the unwary; as, "the deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil" (Book of Common Prayer); "Thy painted baits, And poor deceits, Are all bestowed on me in vain" (Wither). Deception, on the other hand, often suggests a quality or character in the thing, which causes one to mistake it or frankly to take it as other than it really is; as, the rising and the setting of the sun are pure deceptions. "Sylph was it? or a Bird . . .? A second darted by;—and lol! Another . . . Transient deception! a gay freak Of April's mimicries! Those brilliant strangers . . . Proved last year's leaves, pushed from the spray To frolic on the breeze" (Wordsworth). Counterfeit commonly applies to a close imitation or copy of a thing, such as a coin, a postage stamp, paper money, a bond or other security, depending upon pictorial devices or engraved designs for assurance of its genuineness: the term usually also implies the passing or circulation of such an imitation as if it were genuine; as, the city is being flooded with counterfeits of five-dollar bills. The term is also applicable to any thing or, less often, to any person, that passes for something other than it actually or truly is; as, his newly purchased painting by Raphael was proved to be a clever counterfeit; "She had the illusion that she was not really a married woman and a house-mistress, but only a kind of counterfeit" (Bennett). Simulacrum may be used in place of any of the preceding words that do not carry a strong implication of deliberate deception or of intentional imposition. It implies a counterfeiting of something real, but not an attempt to pass off as real; as, "The dead-alive gape, stare, and hue of the lumpish simulacrums of a wax show" (Pall Mall Gazette). Often, however, the term applies to a person, an object, or an immaterial thing that is what he or it is supposed to be only in external appearance: it suggests lack of substance or of life or, in reference to a person such as a sovereign or ruler, a lack of all the qualities essential to his station; as, "Some spirit of life breathed into their simulacrum of a faith" (Edinburgh Review); "[George IV] nothing but a coat and a wig and a mask smiling below it—nothing but a great simulacrum" (Thackeray).

Ana. *Trick, ruse, feint, artifice, wile, stratagem, maneuver.

impotent, 1 *Powerless, impuissant.

impress, v. Touch, strike, *affect, influence, sway.

Ana. *Move, actuate: *thrill, electrify, enthrall: *provoke, excite, stimulate, galvanize, pique.

impress, n. *Impression, imprint, print, stamp.

Ana. See those at IMPRESSION, 1.

impression. 1 Impression, impress, imprint, print, stamp come into comparison as denoting the visible or otherwise perceptible trace or traces left (either literally or figuratively) by pressure on the surface or ground of something. Impression is the most widely applicable of these terms. It may be used with reference to any mark or trace, or any series or combination of marks or traces, which are produced by the physical pressure of one thing on another, as of a seal upon wax, of a foot upon mud, or of inked type or etched plate upon paper; as, in general, the first impressions made from an etcher's plate are the most valuable; the printers will make no further impressions from the old type; the detectives found a clear impression of finger tips on the handle of the door; the dentist said he must get a plaster of Paris impression of the jaw and near-by teeth before he could make the denture. But impression may also be used of any definite or distinct trace or traces left on the mind, soul, character, or memory by the impact of sensation, experience, or the like; as, the shock has left its impression on her nerves; his first impression of Paris still remains clear in his memory; the incident made no impression on his mind. Impress is often used in place of impression, especially when the reference is to any clear trace left on the character, the form, the personality, or the like, by some influence; as, his father's uprightness has left a lasting impress on his character; he reveals the impress of Keats's influence in every poem he writes; "The dusting of the white paper . . . is a symbol of the sweeping clear from the mind of all accumulated prejudice that it may receive the impress of beauty in all its freshness and power" (Binyon). Imprint carries a strong implication of sharpness, clearness, or permanence in outline. It may be used in reference to any impression left on a plastic substance; as, the imprint of a heel in the soil; the children left imprints of their feet on the fresh cement of the walk. The term specifically applies to the printed name of the publisher (sometimes, of the printer) and place and date of publication at the foot of a book's title page; as, this book bears the imprint of the G. & C. Merriam Company. Print is often interchangeable with imprint in the general sense of that word, but is more likely to be used when the trace is considered with reference to its retention of every line or characteristic detail of the original; as, the print (better than imprint) of a finger tip. It is the preferred term in combinations; as, footprints in the sand; fingerprints left by a burglar; hoofprints. Stamp applies to an impression produced by or as if by a tool or machine which strikes so hard that it leaves a distinct imprint, often one that serves to authenticate or to approve that which is so imprinted, to indicate its origin, to authorize its passage through the mails, or the like. Hence, in figurative use, stamp designates a marked or conspicuous impress which wins almost immediate recognition; as, "We do wish as many sons of this University as may be to carry forth that lifelong stamp from her precincts" (Quiller-Couch); "These works have the 'classic' stamp upon them, and have been to the artists of the Far East what Greek marbles have been to us" (Binyon).

Ana. *Trace, vestige, track, rack: mark, token, *sign: *stigma, brand, blot, stain.

2 Notion, thought, *idea, concept, conception.

Ana. Image, percept, *sensation: sentiment, *opinion, view.

Con. Explanation, interpretation, elucidation (see corresponding verbs at EXPLAIN).

impressive. *Moving, effecting, poignant, touching, pathetic.

Ana. Imposing, majestic, august, noble, magnificent, grandiose, *grand: sublime, superb, glorious, *splendid: striking, arresting, remarkable, *noticeable.

Ant. Unimpressive. — Con. *Ineffective, ineffectual, inefficacious: *vain, nugatory, empty, hollow, idle, otiose.

imprint, n. Print, *impression, impress, stamp.

imprison. Imprison, incarcerate, jail (also gaol), immure, intern agree in meaning to confine closely so that escape is impossible or unlikely. The first three words, imprison, incarcerate, jail imply a shutting up in or as if in a prison, imprison being the general term, incarcerate the bookish or journalistic term, and jail the ordinary colloquial word. Imprison, however, strictly implies seizure and detention in custody; the term therefore is applicable even when the one confined is not in a prison, or jail, or suffering a penalty; as, "imprisoned like a fly in amber" (Inge); "the tremendous forces imprisoned in minute particles of matter" (Inge). Incarcerate in precise use implies a shutting up in or as if in a prison cell; as, he easily obtained bail and will, in all probability, not be incarcerated before his trial. Jail (or gaol in British official use and in some literary use) is often preferred to incarcerate in its literal sense as a simpler and more generally intelligible term; as, to be jailed for life. Often, however, jail, the verb, following jail, the noun, in its present accepted sense connotes imprisonment in a building in which persons are held for short periods, either paying the penalty for minor offenses or for the purpose of awaiting legal proceedings. Immure (etymologically, to enclose with walls; later, to enclose within walls) is a literary rather than technical term. When it implies punishment for a crime, especially in the type of romantic fiction known as the "Gothic novel (tale or story)" it may connote burial alive within a wall; usually, however, the term suggests imprisonment in closely confined quarters as a captive, a devotee to duty or religion, or the like; as, "Constance was now immured with her father, it being her 'turn' to nurse" (Bennett); "a convent of nuns vowed to contemplation, who were immured there for life, and never went outside the convent walls" (L. P. Smith). Intern is chiefly in military or wartime use; it seldom implies incarceration and usually suggests a keeping within prescribed limits (as in a guarded camp) and under severe restraints; as, to intern all enemy aliens for the duration of a war; to intern all the war refugees entering a neutral country; to intern [i.e., keep in port] a ship carrying contraband.

Ana. Confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit: *restrain, curb, snaffle, check.

impromptu. Unpremeditated, offhand, improvised, *extemporaneous, extempore, extemporary.

Ana. *Spontaneous, impulsive: ready, prompt, *quick, apt.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Con. Considered, premeditated, *deliberate, studied, designed, advised: finished, *consummate.

improper. 1 Inappropriate, unfitting, unsuitable, unmeet, *unfit, inapt, unhappy, infelicitous.

Ana. Wrong, *bad, poor: *amiss, astray: incongruous, *inconsonant.

Ant. Proper. — Con. Right, *good: *regular, natural, normal, typical: *due, rightful, condign: legitimate, licit, *lawful, legal.

2 *Indecorous, indecent, unseemly, unbecoming, indelicate.

Ana. Unconventional, unceremonious, informal (see affirmative adjectives at CEREMONIAL): *shameless, brazen, impudent, brash, barefaced: obscene, ribald, *coarse, vulgar, gross.

Ant. Proper. — Con. Right, *correct: *decorous, comme il faut, decent, seemly, nice, demure.

impropriety. Barbarism, *solecism.

improve. Improve, better, help, ameliorate agree in denoting to mend or correct in part or in some degree.

Improve (the general term) and better (more vigorous and homely) apply both to objects and to states or conditions, not of necessity bad; as, "the faculties of the mind are improved by exercise" (Locke); "Striving to better, oft we mar what's well" (Shak.); to improve (or better) one's circumstances. With a reflexive pronoun, improve implies a change for the better within oneself, better a change for the better in one's social or financial status. "[She] had from her youth improved herself by reading" (J. Fordyce). "Girls marry merely to 'better themselves,' to borrow a significant vulgar phrase" (M. Wollstonecraft). To help is to improve while still leaving something to be desired; as, a coat of paint would help that house. Ameliorate is used chiefly in reference to conditions that are hard to bear or that cause suffering, and implies partial relief or changes that make them tolerable. "There is no hope whatever of ameliorating his condition" (Peacock).

Ana. *Benefit, profit: amend, *correct, rectify, reform, revise: enhance, heighten (see INTENSIFY).

Ant. Impair: worsen. — Con. Corrupt, pervert, vitiate, *debase, deprave: *injure, harm, damage, mar.

improvised. Unpremeditated, impromptu, offhand, *extemporaneous, extempore, extemporary.

Ana. & Con. See those at IMPROMPTU.

impudent. *Shameless, brazen, barefaced, brash.

Ana. *Impertinent, intrusive, obtrusive, officious, meddlesome: *rude, impolite, discourteous, uncivil, ungracious.

Ant. Respectful. — Con. *Shy, modest, diffident, bashful.

impugn. Gainsay, contradict, negative, traverse, *deny, contravene.

Ana. *Attack, assail: refute, rebut, confute, controvert, *disprove.

Ant. Authenticate: advocate. — Con. *Confirm, corroborate, substantiate: *support, uphold, back.

impuissant. Impotent, *powerless.

Ana. & Con. See those at IMPOTENT, 1.

Ant. Puissant.

impulse, n. *Motive, spring, incentive, inducement, spur, goad.

Ana. Impetus, *stimulus, incitement, stimulant: urge, passion, lust, *desire, appetite: moving or movement, driving or drive, impelling or impulsion, actuation (see corresponding verbs at MOVE).

impulsive. *Spontaneous, instinctive, automatic, mechanical.

Ana. Impetuous, *precipitate, headlong, abrupt, sudden, hasty.

Ant. Deliberate (sense 1). — Con. *Voluntary, intentional: premeditated, considered, *deliberate, designed: *cautious, circumspect, calculating.

impute. Attribute, *ascribe, assign, refer, credit, accredit, charge.

Ana. Attach, *fasten, affix: *accuse, charge, indict: allege, advance, *adduce: intimate, insinuate, hint (see SUGGEST).

in- *Un-, a-, non-

in, prep. 1 *At, on.

2 *At, on.

in abeyance. Dormant, quiescent, *latent, potential, abeyant.

Ana. & Con. See those at ABEYANT.

inability. Inability, disability are sometimes confused because of their verbal likeness. Although both denote a lack of ability to perform a given act or to follow a given trade or profession, they are otherwise clearly distinguished. Inability implies lack of power (sometimes an inherent lack) to perform; it may suggest mental deficiency or temperamental unfitnes, but more often it suggests lack of means, lack of health, lack of training, or the like; as, "an inability to laugh" (Lucas); "an inability to see" (A. Huxley); "the inability of the economic system to effect a cure" (J. A. Hobson). Disability implies the loss or the deprivation of such power, as by accident, illness, disqualification, or the like; the term, therefore, is applicable not only to the resulting inability, but to the injury, the impediment, or whatever it is that makes one unable to do a certain thing, hold a certain office, or the like; as, because of disabilities, many of the soldiers could not return to their former occupations when the war ended; to teach new trades to all those suffering from disabilities; one may be ineligible to office on account of some legal disability such as foreign birth; a judge is under a disability of deciding in his own case. Ana. Incapability, incompetence, unqualifiedness (see corresponding adjectives at INCAPABLE): unfitnes, unsuitability (see corresponding adjectives at UNFIT).

Ant. Ability. — Con. Capacity, capability (see ABILITY).

inactive. Inactive, idle, inert, passive, supine come into comparison when they mean not engaged in work or activity. Inactive is applicable to anyone or to anything that for any reason is not in action, in operation, in use, at work, or the like; as, inactive machines; delicate children are usually inactive; an inactive account. Idle (see also VAIN, 1) applies chiefly to persons who are without occupation or not busy at the moment, but it is also applicable to their powers, their organs, the implements they use, and the like; as, "Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us" (Matthew xx. 6-7); "Though his pen was now idle, his tongue was active" (Macaulay); "Is a field idle when it is fallow?" (Shaw). Inert as applied to a thing (matter, a substance, a drug, and the like) implies inherent lack of power to set itself in motion or by itself to produce a given or understood effect; as, "[comets] were now shewn to be mere chunks of inert matter, driven to describe paths round the sun by exactly the same forces as prescribed the orderly motions of the planets" (Jeans); "Commercial fertilizers consist of three to five hundred pounds of available plant food...extended with harmless inert materials to make a ton of product" (A. C. Morrison). As applied to persons or their activities, inert always suggests inherent or habitual indisposition to activity, or extreme difficulty in stimulating or setting in motion; thus, inert citizens are not easily aroused to action when evidence of graft or waste of the city's money is presented to them; many students are too inert to derive much stimulation from the books they read. "The inert Were roused, and lively natures rapt away!" (Wordsworth). Passive (etymologically, the reverse of active; that is, being the thing that is affected by another's action) implies immobility or a lack of a positive reaction when subjected to external driving or impelling forces or to provocation of any sort; as, "the mind is wholly passive in the reception of all its simple ideas" (Locke); "To sit as a passive bucket and be pumped into... can in the long run be exhilarating to no creature" (Carlyle); "[Noah Webster] deprecated '... the passive reception of everything that comes from a foreign press'" (H. R. Warfel). In an extended sense, passive often implies submissiveness without action that helps the person or side that attacks or seeks to impose its will (as, passive obedience; passive resistance) but it still more often implies a failure to be provoked to action or resistance (as, "to be passive in calamity is the province of no woman"—Meredith). Supine implies abject or cowardly inertia or passivity, usually as a result of sloth or indolence; as, it is impossible to remain supine when war threatens; "[Antony's] apparent supineness as Julius's avenger" (Buchan).

Ana. *Latent, quiescent, dormant, abeyant, potential: torpid, comatose, sluggish, *lethargic.

Ant. Active, live. — Con. Operative, dynamic (see ACTIVE): *busy, industrious, diligent: employed, used, utilized, applied (see USE, v.).

inadvertent. Heedless, *careless, thoughtless.

Con. Conscious, *aware, cognizant, alive, awake: *deliberate, advised, designed, studied: *voluntary, intentional.

inalienable. *Indefeasible.

inane. Banal, wishy-washy, jejune, *insipid, vapid, flat.

Ana. Foolish, silly, fatuous, asinine (see SIMPLE): *vain, idle, empty, hollow, nugatory: vacuous, blank (see EMPTY).

Con. *Expressive, significant, meaningful, pregnant.

Ana. *Found, establish, institute, organize.

Con. Terminate, end, conclude, *close.

inauspicious. Unpropitious, *ominous, portentous, fateful.

Ana. Threatening, menacing (see THREATEN): *sinister, malign, malefic, baleful.

Ant. Auspicious. — Con. *Favorable, propitious, benign: fortunate, *lucky, happy, providential.

inborn. *Innate, congenital, hereditary, inherited, inbred.

Ana. *Inherent, intrinsic, constitutional, essential: natural, normal, *regular, typical: *native, indigenous.

Ant. Acquired.

inbred. *Innate, inborn, congenital, hereditary, inherited.

Ana. Ingrained, *inherent, constitutional, intrinsic: deep-rooted, deep-seated, *inveterate, confirmed, chronic.

Con. Infused, imbued, inoculated (see INFUSE).

incapable, adj. Incapable, incompetent, unqualified come into comparison when they mean mentally or physically unfit, or unfitted by nature, character, or training to do a given kind of work. Except for this denial of fitness, the terms otherwise correspond to the affirmative adjectives in their attributive use as discriminated at ABLE, especially when their limitations in application and their distinguishing implications are considered.

Ana. Inefficient, *ineffective: disabled, crippled, debilitated (see WEAKEN).

Ant. Capable. — Con. Competent, *able, qualified: efficient, *effective.

incarcerate. *Imprison, jail, immure, intern.

Ana. Confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit.

incarnate, v. Embody, hypostatize, materialize, externalize, objectify, substantiate, substantialize, *realize, actualize, reify.

incense, v. Enrage, infuriate, *anger, madden.

Ana. Exasperate, *irritate, roil, provoke, nettle, aggravate: *offend, outrage, affront, insult.

Ant. Placate. — Con. Appease, mollify, *pacify, propitiate, conciliate.

incense, n. Redolence, *fragrance, perfume, scent, bouquet.

Ana. Odor, aroma, *smell.

incentive. Inducement, *motive, spring, spur, goad, impulse.

Ana. *Stimulus, incitement, stimulant, impetus: provoking or provocation, excitement, stimulation (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE): reason, *cause, determinant.

inception. *Origin, source, root, provenance, provenience.

Ana. Beginning, commencement, starting or start, initiation, inauguration (see corresponding verbs at BEGIN): rising or rise, origination, derivation (see corresponding verbs at SPRING).

Ant. Termination. — Con. *End, ending, terminus: completion, finishing, concluding or conclusion, closing (see corresponding verbs at CLOSE).

incessant. Continuous, constant, perpetual, *continual, perennial.

Ana. Unceasing, interminable, never-ending, endless, *everlasting: *steady, constant: vexing, irking, annoying, bothering (see ANNOY).

Ant. Intermittent. — Con. Periodic, recurrent (see INTERMITTENT).

incest. *Adultery, fornication.

inchoate. Unformed, *formless, amorphous, shapeless, chaotic.

Ana. *Elementary, elemental: beginning, commencing, starting, initiating or initial (see corresponding verbs at BEGIN): unfinished, uncompleted or incomplete (see affirmative verbs at CLOSE): *immature, unmatured.

Con. *Perfect, whole, entire, intact: *consummate, finished.

incident, adj. *Liable, subject, open, exposed, prone, susceptible, sensitive.

Ana. Typical (of), natural (to), normal (in) (see REGULAR): *characteristic (of), peculiar (to).

incident, n. Episode, event, *occurrence, circumstance.

incidental. *Accidental, casual, fortuitous, contingent, adventitious.

Ana. Incident (see LIABLE): *subordinate, secondary, collateral: associated, related, linked, connected (see JOIN).

Ant. Essential (sense 2). — Con. Fundamental, cardinal, vital (see ESSENTIAL).

incisive. Incisive, trenchant, clear-cut, cutting, biting, crisp come into comparison when they are applied to utterances, thoughts, style, mentalities, or the like, and mean having or manifesting the qualities associated with sharpness, keenness, and acuteness, especially of mind. Incisive usually implies not only qualities in the thing so described which give it the power to penetrate, pierce, or cut through, but also the production of such an effect upon the person or persons impressed; thus, an incisive voice, or tone of voice, is one that is not only sharply clear and edged but one that affects the nerves of the ear as though it cuts into them; an incisive command is so sharply imperative and direct that it can neither be misunderstood nor disobeyed. "Bismarck's will had not that incisive, rapier quality, that quality of highly tempered steel—flexible, unbreakable, of mortal effect, decisive... which had Richelieu's" (Belloc). "When finally pushed into a corner, he would be more incisive, more deadly, than any man seated four-square and full of importance at a governmental desk" (V. Sackville-West). Trenchant, literally applied to weapons with an extremely sharp edge or point (as, a trenchant spear), in the figurative use in which it is here considered carries a stronger implication than does incisive of cutting so as to define differences, categories, or classes with sharpness and perfect clearness or of probing deeply into the inmost nature of a thing so as to reveal that which is hidden or concealed; as, a trenchant analysis; "When roused by indignation or moral enthusiasm, how trenchant are our reflections!" (W. James); "The trenchant divisions between right and wrong, honest and dishonest, respectable and the reverse, had left so little scope for the unforeseen" (E. Wharton); "No one... was more trenchant than he in his criticism of the popular faith" (G. L. Dickinson). Clear-cut is applied chiefly to that which is the effect of the qualities which make for penetration, incisiveness, trenchancy, or the like: it therefore suggests sharp chiseling, clear definition, or distinct outlines, and the absence of all soft edges, haziness, or confusion in the thing or things so described; as, clear-cut features; clear-cut utterance; clear-cut distinctions; "the demands of Communism are too imperative, too clear-cut for the writer who wants only the cessation of mental pain and a private peace in his own time" (Day Lewis). Cutting is often used in place of incisive when a less pleasant or less agreeable quality or effect is to be connoted: the term frequently suggests sarcasm, acrimony, asperity, or the like, that wounds or hurts, but it sometimes carries a hint, at least, of penetrating truthfulness, acute discernment, or of similar mental qualities; as, "Eloquence, smooth and cutting, is like a razor whetted with oil" (Swift); "He can say the driest, most cutting things in the quietest of tones" (C. Bronk); "I suppose you'd leave me here without money or anything?" she said in a cold, cutting voice" (Bennell). Biting, when it is applied especially to utterances, expressed ideas, style, and the like, suggests a power to grip and deeply impress itself on the mind or memory, as acid bites into an etcher's plate: it therefore often suggests a caustic or mordant quality; as, his biting wit; biting epigrams; her biting words. Crisp (as here compared: see also FRAGILE, 1) suggests not only incisiveness but either vigorous terseness of expression or a bracing, invigorating quality; as, "the blithe, crisp sentence, decisive as a child's expression of its needs" (Pater); "it is a relief to come to a diction that is frequently crisp, and incisive, and terse" (Lowes).

Ana. Terse, succinct, laconic, *concise: poignant, *pungent, piquant.

Con. Prolix, diffuse, verbose, *wordy: *loose, lax, slack: unctuous, *fulsome.

incite. Incite, instigate, abet, foment are synonymous terms meaning to spur on to action or to excite into activity. Incite stresses stirring up and urging on; frequently, but not necessarily, it implies prompting; as, the riot was incited by paid agitators. "It was just like Lady Pinkerton... to have gone round to Hobart inciting him to drag Jane from my office" (R. Macaulay). Instigate, in contrast with incite, unequivocally implies prompting and responsibility for the initiation of the action; it also commonly connotes underhandedness and evil intention; as, one may be incited (not instigated) to the performance of a good act; one may be incited or instigated to the commission of a crime. "The early persecutions were... instigated... by the government as a safety-valve for popular discontent" (Inge). Abet, in present usage, tends to lose its etymological implication of baiting, or hounding on, and to emphasize its acquired implications (largely through association with aid in the legal phrase "aid and abet") of seconding, supporting, and encouraging. "Unthinkingly, I have laid myself open to the charge of aiding and abetting the seal-cutter in obtaining money under false pretenses" (Kipling). "Mr. Howells... seconded him [Mark Twain] as often as not in these innocuous, infantile ventures, abetting him in the production of... plays of an abysmal foolishness" (Van W. Brooks). Foment stresses persistence in goading. One who incites rebellion may provide only the initial stimulus; one who *foment*s rebellion keeps the rebellious spirit alive by supplying fresh incitements.

Ana. Stimulate, excite, *provoke, pique, galvanize: arouse, rouse, *stir.

Ant. Restrain. — Con. Curb, check, inhibit, snaffle (see RESTRAIN): *frustrate, thwart, foil, circumvent, baffle, balk, outwit.

incitement. *Stimulus, stimulant, impetus.

Ana. Spur, goad, incentive, inducement, impulse, *motive, spring: provoking or provocation, excitement, stimulation, piquing (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE): motivation, activation, actuation (see corresponding verbs at ACTIVATE).

Ant. Restraint: inhibition.

inclination. *Slant, slope, incline, grade, gradient, acclivity, declivity.

Ana. Bending, turning (see CURVE, v.): leaning, slanting (see SLANT, v.).

incline, v. 1 Lean, *slant, slope.

Ana. *Tip, tilt, cant, list, careen, heel: bend, turn, *curve: *swerve, veer, deviate: deflect, *turn.

2 Incline, bias, dispose, predispose come into comparison when they mean to influence one to take a stated or implied attitude to something or to someone, or to have such an attitude as a result of prior influences. Incline, literally to lean or bend (see SLANT), implies that the mind or the feelings have been so affected that one is already leaning toward one of two or more possible conclusions, or projects, or decisions, or objects of affection, or the like. The word never suggests more than the tipping of the balance toward one, and therefore connotes merely a tendency to favor one more than the other or others. "Such considerations are not supposed to be entertained by judges, except as inclining them to one of two interpretations" (Justice Holmes). "Only a system with order and progress in the heart of it could elaborate itself so perfectly and intricately. There is assuredly much to incline us to 'assert Eternal Providence, And justify the ways of God to men'" (J. A. Thomson). "On this visit I found Australia generally inclined to be inimical" (V. Heiser). Bias implies a stronger and more settled leaning than incline suggests: it usually connotes a prejudice for or against; as, "It would be mortifying to...many ladies could they... understand how little the heart of man is affected by what is costly or new in their attire; how little it is biased by the texture of their muslin" (Austen); "she was unfairly biased towards the Liberal party in the state, and too apt to approve of the measures they passed" (R. Macaulay). Dispose differs from incline in stressing the implication of putting one into a frame of mind that is proper or necessary for the end in view or that makes one ready or willing to do something or to take some stand: therefore, it often connotes the sway of one's disposition, mood, temper, or the like; as, his open face disposes one to believe him innocent; the depression disposed many persons to become more thrifty; "a thinker so little disposed to treat the names of these religious philosophers with respect" (Inge). Predispose differs from dispose in implying the existence of the frame of mind, or of the proper disposition, in advance of the opportunity to manifest itself in action; as, circumstances are predisposing men to accept principles which they attacked a few years ago; if she is flattered and indulged, she will be predisposed to be favorable to him. Predispose is also used of a physical tendency or condition which makes one susceptible to a given infection or disease; as, predisposed to tuberculosis.

Ana. Influence, *affect, sway: *move, drive, impel.

Ant. Disincline, indispose.

incline, n. Inclination. *slant, slope, grade, gradient, acclivity, declivity.

Ana. *Mountain, mount, peak, alp: embankment, bank, dune, terrace, *mound.

Include. Include, comprehend, embrace, involve, imply, implicate, subsume are not close synonyms, but they come into comparison as meaning basically to contain something within itself as a part or portion of the whole. Include suggests that the thing included forms a constituent, component, or subordinate part; as, the genus Viola includes the pansy as well as various species of violets; the collection will not include any examples of the artist's earliest and inferior paintings; an edition of the Bible which includes the Apocrypha; "It would not be argued today that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit" (Justice Holmes). Comprehend (etymologically, to grasp) suggests that within the scope or range of the whole under consideration (such as the content of a term, a concept, a conception, a view, or the like) the thing comprehended is held or enclosed even though it may or may not be clearly distinguished or actually distinguishable. "If there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Romans xiii. 9). "The counsel for the appellee would limit it [the term commerce] to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Embrace, as here compared (see also ADOPT), suggests a reaching out to gather the thing embraced within the whole (such as the content of a mind or of a course, a construction or interpretation of a law, etc.); as, "The scene before the redleman's eyes...embraced hillocks, pits, ridges, acclivities, one behind the other" (Hardy); "By Baudelaire's time it was no longer necessary for a man to embrace such varied interests in order to have the sense of the age" (T. S. Eliot); "Whatever disagreement there may be as to the scope of the phrase 'due process of law,' there can be no doubt that it embraces the fundamental conception of a fair trial" (Justice Holmes). Involve (etymologically, to roll up in, or to infold) suggests inclusion by virtue of the nature of the whole, such as by being its natural or inevitable consequence (as, surrender involves submission; "It is quite probable that many of those who would make the best doctors are too poor to take the course. This involves a deplorable waste of talent"—B. Russell), or one of its antecedent conditions (as, "Clerkship did not necessarily involve even minor orders"—Quiller-Couch; "I should... supply the humanistic elements of education in ways not involving a great apparatus of learning"—B. Russell), or one of the parts or elements which comprise it by necessity or definition (as, "that fusion of public and private life which was involved in the ideal of the Greek citizen"—G. L. Dickinson). Imply is very close to involve in its etymological meaning, for it also connotes a carrying within its folds; however, the term stresses a thing's inclusion not, as involve does, by the nature or constitution of the whole, but as something which can be inferred because hinted at (see also SUGGEST, 1; INFER, 2), or because normally or customarily part of its content, especially by definition (as, embrace implies a reaching out to gather to oneself or within one's grasp), or because invariably associated with the thing under consideration as its cause or its effect, or as its maker or its product (as, a watch implies a watchmaker), or the like. For this reason, imply may, in comparison with involve, suggest a degree of uncertainty; thus, silence is often said to imply consent, but it would be rash to say that it involves consent. Implicate (etymologically, to intertwine) implies so intimate a connection between things that one is necessarily involved in the other; as, the brain is pathologically implicated in a case of insanity; "there was never any idea of domestic comfort...implicated in such structures" (N. Hawthorne). But this use of implicate is now comparatively rare in the verb, unless there is the added connotation of incrimination (for this sense see INVOLVE, 1). Subsume, a technical term in logic, philosophy, and the classificatory sciences, implies inclusion within a class or category (as an individual in a species or a species in a genus) or a being comprehended by a principle, proposition, or the like; as, "Absolute generic unity would obtain if there were one summum genus under which all things without exception could be eventually subsumed" (W. James).

Ana. Comprise, consist of, *compose, constitute: *contain, hold, accommodate.

Ant. Exclude. — Con. Eliminate, rule out, debar, disbar, shut out (see EXCLUDE): omit, forget (see NEGLECT, v.).

incognito. *Pseudonym, alias, nom de guerre, pen name, nom de plume, allonym.

incommode. Discommode, *inconvenience, trouble, molest.

Ana. *Hinder, impede, obstruct, block: disturb, *discompose: bother, irk, vex, *annoy.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Ant. Accommodate (sense 2). — Con. *Oblige, favor: *indulge, humor: *please, gratify.

incomparable. Peerless, *supreme, superlative, transcendent, surpassing, pre-eminent, banner.

Ana. Unrivaled, unmatched, unapproached, unequaled (see affirmative verbs at MATCH).

Con. Ordinary, *common: fair, mediocre, *medium, second-rate, average.

incompatible. Incongruous, *inconsonant, inconsistent, discordant, discrepant, uncongenial, unsympathetic.

Ana. Antagonistic, counter, *adverse: *antipathetic, averse: contrary, contradictory, antithetical, antipodal, *opposite: irreconcilable, uncomfortable, unadaptable (see affirmative verbs at ADAPT).

Ant. Compatible. — Con. Congruous, *consonant, consistent, congenial: harmonizing or harmonious, corresponding or correspondent, agreeing (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

incompetent. Unqualified, *incapable.

Ana. Inefficient, *ineffective.

Ant. Competent. — Con. *Able, capable, qualified: skilled, *proficient, expert.

incongruous. *Inconsonant, uncongenial, incompatible, inconsistent, discordant, discrepant, unsympathetic.

Ana. Alien, foreign, extraneous (see EXTRINSIC): grotesque, bizarre, *fantastic.

Ant. Congruous. — Con. Fitting, suitable, appropriate, meet, *fit: *consonant, compatible, congenial, consistent.

inconsistent. *Inconsonant, incompatible, incongruous, uncongenial, unsympathetic, discordant, discrepant.

Ana. Divergent, disparate, diverse, *different: irreconcilable (see affirmative verb at ADAPT).

Ant. Consistent. — Con. *Consonant, compatible, congruous: according or accordant, agreeing, tallying, jibing, corresponding or correspondent (see corresponding verbs at AGREE).

inconsonant. Inconsonant, inconsistent, incompatible, incongruous, uncongenial, unsympathetic, discordant, discrepant come into comparison as meaning not in agreement with one another or not agreeable one to the other. Except for this denial of reciprocal agreement or agreeableness, the first six words correspond to the affirmative adjectives as discriminated at CONSONANT, especially in regard to their specific implications and their syntactical differences. Discordant (see also DISONANT) is more common than inconsonant when applied, in the sense of devoid of harmony, to things coming into contact or comparison with each other; as, discordant voices; the discordant views of cabinet officers. Discrepant is also often preferred to inconsistent in attributive use, especially when a wide variance between details of two things that should be alike or consistent is to be suggested; thus, "two discrepant accounts of an accident" suggests more obvious differences in details than "their accounts are inconsistent." Inconsistent is now usually preferred in predicative use.

Ana. *Dissonant, discordant.

Ant. Consonant. — Con. Congruous, compatible, consistent, congenial (see CONSONANT): harmonized or harmonious, attuned (see corresponding verbs at HARMONIZE).

instant. Instant, fickle, capricious, mercurial, unstable come into comparison when they mean lacking or showing lack of firmness or steadiness in purpose, attachment, devotion, or the like. Instant, now usually applied to persons, though sometimes still applied to things, suggests an inherent or constitutional tendency to change frequently (cf. CHANGEABLE): it commonly implies an incapacity for fixity or steadiness, as in one's affections, aspirations, course, or the like; as, "O, swear not by the moon, the instant moon, That monthly changes in her circled orb" (Shak.); "people seldom know what they would be at, young men especially, they are so amazingly changeable and instant" (Austen). "One of his [Montaigne's] own instant essays, never true for a page to its proposed subject" (Paier). Fickle now retains only a hint of its etymological implication of deceitfulness or treacherousness, but its basic implications of instability and unreliability are colored by the suggestion of an incapacity for being true, steadfast, or certain; as, "O fortune, fortune! all men call thee fickle" (Shak.); "Bitter experience soon taught him that lordly patrons are fickle and their favour not to be relied on" (A. Huxley); "La, she is fickle! How she turns from one face To another face,— and smiles into them all" (Millay). Capricious suggests qualities which manifest or seem to manifest a lack of guidance by law, by authority, by reason, or by any power that tends to regularize movements or acts. When used in reference to persons, it suggests guidance by whim, mood, freak, or the like; as, "Louis XIII... a boy of eight at his accession... grows up capricious, restricted and cold, hardly normal" (Belloc); "he judged her to be capricious, and easily wearied of the pleasure of the moment" (E. Wharton). When used in reference to things, it implies an irregularity, an uncertainty, or a variability that seems incompatible with the operation of any law; as, a capricious climate; "The capricious hues of the sea" (Lamb); "the capricious uncertain lease on which you and I hold life" (Quiller-Couch); "The olive is slow-growing, capricious in its yield" (A. Huxley). Mercurial is a synonym of the other words here discriminated only when it carries a strong implication of resemblance to the metal mercury and its fluctuations when subjected to any external influence. The word, however, is seldom devoid of implications derived from its earlier association with the god Mercury, such as swiftness, eloquence, cleverness, and volatility. Consequently when, as here considered, it applies to persons, their temperaments, their natures, and the like, it usually suggests a pleasing, even if a baffling, variability, an amazing succession of gifts capable of being displayed at will or at need, and various other qualities such as sprightliness, restlessness, flashing wit, elusive charm, and the like; as, "The gay, gallant, mercurial Frenchman" (Disraeli); "I was ardent in my temperament; quick, mercurial, impetuous" (Irving); "It seems impossible that her bright and mercurial figure is no longer among us, that she will delight us no more with the keen precision and stabbing brilliance of that jewelled brain" (New Republic). Unstable, which is applicable to persons as well as to things, implies a constitutional incapacity for remaining in a fixed position, mentally or emotionally as well as physically: it suggests, therefore, such fluctuations in behavior as frequent, and often unjustified, changes in occupation or in residence, or sudden and startling changes of faith or of interests; as, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel" (Genesis xlix. 4); "His nature, lamentably unstable, was not ignoble" (Macaulay).

Ana. *Changeable, changeful, variable, protean, mutable: *faithless, disloyal, false, treacherous, traitorous, perfidious: volatile, frivolous, light, light-minded (see corresponding nouns at LIGHTNESS).

Ant. Constant. — Con. *Reliable, dependable, trustworthy, trusty: true, leal, loyal, stanch, steadfast, *faithful.

inconvenience, v. Inconvenience, incommode, discommode, trouble, molest come into comparison in the sense of to subject one to disturbance or annoyance. Inconvenience usually suggests little more than interference with one's plans, one's comfort, one's freedom, or the like: it seldom carries suggestions of more than a temporary or slight disturbance or annoyance; as, I hope the new arrangement will not inconvenience you; do not inconvenience him by intruding upon him while he is writing; will it inconvenience you to send an answer by return mail? Incommode and, even more, discommode carry a somewhat heightened suggestion of disturbance or annoyance, but still of not so much as to imply actual suffering or injury: rather, they connote some mental agitation such as embarrassment or vexation or more or less disagreeable interference with one's comfort or plans; as, "very little incommoded [in reading a book] by the remarks and ejaculations of Mrs. Allen" (Austen); "Lucian was soon incommoded by the attention his cousin attracted" (Shaw); "It could not discommode you to receive any of his Grace's visitors or mine" (Scott); "Finding herself and the younger children discommoded in the boat" (Galt). Trouble is often used in polite intercourse (especially in requests) in a sense close to that of inconvenience, when it suggests even less effort or disturbance; as, may I trouble you to pass the salt; will it trouble you to drop this letter in the box when you are passing? It is, however, also used to imply serious disturbance or annoyance such as worry, deep concern, great pains, or the like: in this sense and sometimes in the lighter sense, it is frequently a reflexive verb or, in current colloquial use, an intransitive verb taking the place of a reflexive; as, do not trouble yourself about our bad fortune; "Men troubled themselves about pain and death much as healthy bears did" (H. Adams); "An artist who does not trouble about the philosophy of things, but just obeys the dim promptings of instinct" (C. E. Montague). Molest implies extreme disturbance or annoyance, as through meddlesomeness or through hostile or malicious interference with one's rights, one's freedom, one's security, etc.; as, "safe, where no critics damn, no duns molest" (Pope); "It does not seem... to follow that she intended to persecute or molest Protestants" (A. Lang); the nurse went wherever called, without fear of being molested.

Ana. Disturb, *discompose: interfere, intermeddle, *meddle.

incorporate, v. Embody, assimilate, *identify.

Ana. Merge, blend, fuse, coalesce (see MIX): *unite, combine, conjoin: consolidate, unify, *compact.

increase, v. Increase, enlarge, augment, multiply come into comparison as meaning to become or cause to become greater or more numerous. Increase, in discriminating use of the intransitive, always carries the idea of progressive growth; sometimes it means nothing more than this. "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man" (Luke ii. 52). Sometimes it implies growth in numbers, as by propagation (as, "He blessed them, saying: Increase [A. V., Be fruitful] and multiply, and fill the waters of the sea"—Genesis i. 22, D. V.), or growth in size, amount, or quantity, as by increments or accretions (as, their salaries increase annually by one hundred dollars; his strength will increase when his health improves), or growth in intensity, especially by degrees or in proportion to something else (as, the darkness increases the further we advance into the forest; "your misery increase with your age!"—Shak.). In transitive use, increase may or may not imply progressive growth; often it so stresses the operation or the effectiveness of a cause, that it loses the connotation of natural or regular progression; as, the trustees increased all salaries; a rich diet increases one's weight; the depression increased his misery; the girl's actions increased the observer's suspicions; good teaching increases one's desire for knowledge. Enlarge stresses expansion or extension so that whatever is affected is greater in some or all of its dimensions or in its size or capacity; as, he enlarged his farm by the purchase of one hundred adjoining acres; to enlarge a hotel by building a new wing. Figuratively, enlarge is applicable in discriminating use only to that which may be thought of as capable of being made larger or smaller in extent or size; thus, one does not enlarge one's interests or one's activities, but the field of one's interests, or the scope of one's activities; hence, to enlarge the circle of one's acquaintances; to enlarge one's capacity for enjoyment. Nevertheless, field, scope, capacity, etc., are sometimes implied. "Its [a constitutional clause's] terms purport to enlarge... the powers vested in the government" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Enlarging our personality by establishing new affinities and sympathies with our fellow-men, with nature, and with God" (Inge). Augment, like increase, etymologically implies growth; it rarely, however, carries the implication of progressive growth or growth by degrees, which is often so strong in increase. It differs from increase chiefly in being used in reference to things already well grown, well developed, or the like; thus, when one says "the team's confidence increases with every victory" one implies that its confidence was originally not strong; on the other hand, when one says "the team's confidence augments with every victory" one implies that its confidence was never weak. Consequently the distinctive implication of augment is a growing greater, more numerous, larger, more intense, or the like. "Even an increase of fame served only to augment their industry" (Sir J. Reynolds). "To fret over unavoidable evils, or augment them by anxiety" (Austen). Multiply commonly implies an increase in number, especially by natural generation; as, the Creator bade his creatures to multiply and fill the earth. "Hookworms live a long, long time in the small intestine...but they cannot multiply there" (V. Heiser). Sometimes, however, the word implies increase in numbers by indefinite repetition of things of the same kind; as, a machine for multiplying typewritten copies; if there were space, we might multiply illustrative citations.

Ana. *Intensify, aggravate, heighten, enhance: *expand, swell, amplify, dilate, distend, inflate: *extend, lengthen, elongate, prolong, protract.

Ant. Decrease. — Con. Diminish, lessen, reduce, abate, dwindle (see DECREASE): *shorten, abridge, abbreviate, curtail, retrench: *contract, condense, shrink, deflate.

incredulity. Disbelief, *unbelief.

Ana. Doubt, dubiety, dubiousity, skepticism, *uncertainty.

Ant. Credulity. — Con. Certitude, *certainty, assurance, conviction: positiveness, cocksureness, sureness (see corresponding adjectives at SURE).

increment. Accretion, *addition, accession.

incriminate. Criminate, impeach, indict, *accuse, charge, arraign.

Ana. *Involve, implicate.

Con. *Exculpate, exonerate, absolve, acquit, vindicate.

inculcate. *Implant, instill, inseminate, infix.

Ana. *Infuse, inoculate, imbue, leaven: *teach, instruct, educate: impart, *communicate.

incur. Incur, contract, catch come into comparison when they mean to bring upon oneself something, especially something unpleasant, onerous, or injurious. Incur (etymologically, to run into) may or may not imply foreknowledge of what is to happen (as, to incur a debt; to incur criticism) but it usually implies the responsibility of the person or thing for the acts which bring about that which he (or it) incurs; as, to incur a serious risk by submitting to an experimental operation; he said he would tell the truth, even if he incurred the displeasure of his constituents. Contract carries a stronger implication than incur of acquirement, but it is equally inexplicit in its lack of clear suggestion as to whether the acquisition derives from intention or accident; as, to contract heavy debts; to contract a disease; to contract bad habits. But contract often distinctively implies a meeting between two things that permits either an interchange of qualities (as, "Each from each contract new strength and light"—Pope) or a transmission of something from one to the other (as, "They say that sherry ought to live for a while in an old brandy-cask, so as to contract a certain convincing quality from the cask's genial timbers"—C. E. Montague). Catch, the least literary and most ordinary of these terms, usually implies infection or something analogous to it; as, to catch a contagious disease; to catch a heavy cold; "With such immunity [a mind highly resistant to literary suggestion] he is not likely to catch harm from the most insinuating book" (S. M. Crothers); "religion, in point of fact, is seldom taught at all; it is caught, by contact with someone who has it" (Inge).

Ana. *Get, obtain, acquire.

Con. *Escape, elude, evade, avoid, shun, eschew: avert, ward off, *prevent.

Incurious. Unconcerned, *indifferent, aloof, detached, disinterested.

Ana. Uninterested (see DISINTERESTED): *abstracted, preoccupied, absent, absent-minded, distraught, distraught.

Ant. Curious, inquisitive. — Con. Prying, snoop, nosy (see CURIOUS): intrusive, meddlesome, *impertinent: observing or observant, remarking, noticing, noting (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

Incursion. *Invasion, raid, irruption, inroad.

Indebtedness. *Debt, debit, obligation, liability, arrear, arrearage.

Indecent. Unseemly, indelicate, improper, *indecorous, unbecoming.

Ana. Obscene, ribald, *coarse, gross, vulgar: lewd, lascivious, *licentious: *immoral: *offensive, revolting, repulsive, repugnant, loathsome.

Ant. Decent. — Con. *Chaste, pure, modest: virtuous, *moral, ethical.

Indecorous. Indecorous, improper, unseemly, indecent, unbecoming, indelicate agree in meaning not in conformity with the accepted standard of what is right or fitting or is regarded as good form. The first four words, indecorous, improper, unseemly, indecent are in general the antonyms, or diametrical opposites, of decorous, proper, seemly, decent (discriminated at DECOROUS), but the negative terms are often more sharply distinguished from each other than the affirmative terms. That is indecorous which transgresses the conventions of polite society or its notions of what constitutes good form or good manners; as, indecorous behavior at a funeral; they regarded argument in the drawing room as indecorous. That is improper which violates propriety, or the standard of what is right, correct, or fitting, determined by those who are the authorities, especially in etiquette, in language, in aesthetics, or in morals; as, "I am sure if I had known it to be improper I would not have gone with Mr. Thorpe at all; but I always hoped you would tell me, if you thought I was doing wrong" (Austen); "It was most improper to intrude the dog into the houses of the people they were calling on" (Conrad); "He was telling her a funny story, probably an improper one, for it brought out her naughtiest laugh" (Cather). That is unseemly which is not only indecorous or improper but also offensive to persons of good taste or to strict followers of the conventions; as, to bury the old man with unseemly haste; "I consider it very unseemly to talk in this loose fashion before young men" (Cather); "Maurice disgraced Amy and himself by joining in an unseemly fracas with the police" (R. Macaulay); "We were in no danger of being betrayed into any unseemly manifestations of religious fervour" (L. P. Smith). That is indecent which is grossly offensive to those who observe the proprieties or, in its present stronger sense, to persons of sound morals or high standards of modesty or propriety; as, "when wine has given indecent language birth" (Cowper); indecent plays; indecent behavior; "these dances, though to the eyes of Johnston... 'grossly indecent'... are 'danced reverently'" (H. Ellis). That is unbecoming which does not befit one's character or standing, or is not in accordance with one's own standards; as, "Rosamond never showed any unbecoming knowledge" (G. Eliot); "The nurse... had a... look in her eye that was unbecoming in a menial position" (H. G. Wells). That is indelicate which verges upon immodesty, or (sometimes) which betrays lack of tact or of refined perceptions; as, "She had visions, so startling that she half repudiated them as indelicate, of coarse masculine belongings strewn about in endless litter" (M. Wilkins); "Think no more of the matter. It is very indelicate for a young lady to dwell on such subjects" (Deland).

Ana. Unfitting, inappropriate, unmeet, unsuitable, *unfit: incongruous, *inconsonant: *rude, ill-mannered, uncivil, discourteous, impolite: *coarse, vulgar, gross.

Ant. Decorous. — Con. Decent, nice, comme il faut, demure (see DECOROUS): ceremonious, formal, conventional (see CEREMONIAL).

Indefatigable. Indefatigable, tireless, weariless, untiring, unwearying, unwearied, unflagging carry as their basic meaning not feeling or manifesting fatigue, but they are closer synonyms in their extended sense of capable of prolonged and arduous effort. Indefatigable etymologically implies an incapacity for fatigue, but in its actual use it usually suggests persistent and unremitting activity or effort; as, "indefatigable fingers" (E. Wharton); "The indefatigable pursuit of an unattainable perfection" (L. P. Smith); "the strenuous, persevering, and absolutely indefatigable champion of every victim of oppression" (J. Morley). Tireless and weariless are sometimes employed with little distinction from indefatigable; frequently, however, they connote less busyness, and even greater or more remarkable power of continuance; as, the tireless sweep of the eagle's flight; "out in the breakers tirelessly tossing" (Whitman); "Was not [Matthew] Arnold the tireless critic of his country and his age, the lifelong arraigner of British limitedness and complacency?" (C. E. Montague); "A sturdy Dissenter, a weariless promoter of godliness" (Times Lit. Sup.). Untiring and unwearying differ from tireless in carrying a stronger implication of uninterrupted activity; often, they specifically suggest an extraordinary ability to go on continuously and without a break (tireless and weariless, by contrast, often imply repeated returns over a very long course of time); as, an untiring (or unwearying) search for a lost child; tireless (or weariless) efforts to attract attention; untiring devotion to a cause; the tireless reiteration of a call; the unwearying pursuit of an ideal. Unwearied differs little from untiring in its meaning, but it is more often applied directly to the person or thing concerned than to the activity in which he (or it) is engaged; as, "I, so long A worshipper of Nature, hither came Unwearied in that service" (Wordsworth); "the unwearied and disinterested seeker after truth" (Jowett). Unflagging differs little from tireless, for it too stresses a display of power to continue without signs of weariness; but it also suggests no diminution of activity, and it applies to a person's powers rather than to the person himself; as, unflagging zeal, interest, attention; "A purpose... which he pursued with unflagging energy" (Froude).

Ana. Diligent, assiduous, sedulous, industrious, *busy: dogged, pertinacious (see OBSTINATE): energetic, strenuous, *vigorous.

Con. Wearying, tiring (see TIRE, v.): lagging, dawdling, procrastinating (see DELAY): indolent, faint, slothful, *lazy.

indefeasible or undefeasible. Indefeasible (or undefeasible), inalienable (or unalienable) come into comparison as meaning belonging to one absolutely and without qualification. That is indefeasible of which one cannot be deprived without one's consent (or which, in legal language, cannot be defeated, as by a subsequent condition); that is inalienable which one cannot give away or dispose of even if one wishes. Thus, one has an indefeasible title to the house which one owns absolutely, but this title may be transferred to another if one wishes to sell the house or deed it to another; under the Constitution of the United States, personal liberty, freedom of speech, etc., are inalienable rights. Both words, however, carry so strong an implication of unforfeatableness that they are often employed without clear distinction when the intent is to imply that no superior force can take them away; as, "The great writers... have mostly asserted freedom of conscience as an indefeasible right" (J. S. Mill); "By the inalienable claim of nature Anna belonged to the woman who had brought her into the world" (Deland).

Indelicate. Indecent, unseemly, improper, *indecorous, unbecoming.

Ana. *Coarse, gross, vulgar, obscene: *rude, rough, crude, callow: lewd, wanton (see LICENTIOUS).

Ant. Delicate, refined. — Con. Pure, modest, *chaste, decent.

Indemnify. Reimburse, recompense, requite, compensate, remunerate, *pay, repay, satisfy.

Indemnity. *Reparation, redress, amends, restitution.

Indentation. Indenture, nick, notch, *dent, dint.

Indenture. 1 *Contract, bargain, compact, pact, treaty, entente, convention, cartel, covenant, concordat, mise.

2 Indentation, notch, nick, *dent, dint.

Indentured. Articled, *bound, bond.

Independence. Autonomy, freedom, sovereignty, autarky. See under FREE, adj.

Ana. Liberty, *freedom, license: self-reliance, reliance (see corresponding adjectives at RELIANT).

Ant. Dependence. — Con. Subordination, subjection (see corresponding adjectives at SUBORDINATE): *servitude, slavery, bondage.

Independent. Autonomous, autonomic, *free, sovereign, autarchic, autarkic.

Ana. *Alone, solitary: self-reliant (see RELIANT): self-governed, self-ruled (see primitive verbs at GOVERN).

Ant. Dependent. — Con. *Subordinate, subject, tributary: *subservient, servile, slavish: relative, adjective (see DEPENDENT).

Indescribable. Inenarrable, *unutterable, inexpressible, ineffable, unspeakable.

indicate. Indicate, betoken, attest, bespeak, argue, prove come into comparison when they mean to give evidence of, or to serve as ground for, a valid or reasonable inference. One thing indicates another when the former serves as a symptom, a sign, or the like, pointing to the latter as a justifiable or necessary conclusion or, in medicine, as the necessary treatment or remedy; as, the facts revealed by the auditor's investigation indicate that the speculations were not confined to one person; such symptoms indicate an operation. "The similarity [between a certain trademark and an imitation]... indicates nothing except perhaps the poverty of the designer's invention" (Justice Holmes). One thing betokens another when the former serves as visible or sensible evidence, or more narrowly, as a presage or portent, of the latter; as, "his appearance betokened complete security" (Meredith); the black clouds betoken a storm. "Like a red morn, that ever yet betoken'd Wreck to the seaman, tempest to the field" (Shak.). One thing attests another when the former serves as indisputable evidence of the latter, and has the force (not necessarily the character) of legal testimony, documentary proof, or the like. "The great seal... attests... the verity of the presidential signature" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "Their success is attested by the marvelous exactness with which eclipses are foretold" (Karl K. Darrow). One thing bespeaks another when the former leads to the inference that it is the outward manifestation of the latter. "To Him whose works bespeak his nature" (Cowper). "The large abstention from voting in our elections must certainly bespeak an indifference not without meaning" (Frankfurter). One thing argues another when the former gives good reason for belief in the existence, the reality, or the presence of the latter. "His evasion, of course, was the height of insolence, but it argued unlimited resource and verve" (Kipling). "To the grub under the bark the exquisite fitness of the woodpecker's organism to extract him would certainly argue a diabolical designer" (W. James). One thing proves another when the former serves to demonstrate or manifest the truth of the latter; as, "Your language proves you still the child" (Tennyson).

Ana. Intimate, hint, *suggest: evince, evidence, demonstrate, manifest, *show: import, signify, denote, *mean.

Indict. Incriminate, criminate, impeach, charge, arraign, *accuse.

Ana. Blame, denounce, condemn (see CRITICIZE).

Con. *Exculpate, absolve, exonerate, acquit, vindicate.

indifferent. 1 Indifferent, unconcerned, incurious, aloof, detached, disinterested agree in meaning not feeling or showing interest, especially natural or normal interest. Indifferent is often used in place of the other and more specific terms. In precise usage, however, it implies neutrality of attitude arising either from a lack of bias, prejudice, or predilection when two or more persons or things are considered, or from a lack of feeling for or against a particular person or thing; as, it is impossible to remain indifferent to political parties when great issues are at stake; she was completely indifferent to him. "He was... exceedingly difficult to please, not... because he was hypercritical and exacting, but because he was indifferent" (Bennett). Unconcerned implies indifference arising from unconsciousness, insensitiveness, selfishness, or the like, which prevents one from being moved, worried, made solicitous, or otherwise affected. "I stood, 'mid those convulsions [of the French Revolution], unconcerned, Tranquil almost" (Wordsworth). "You think you carry it off very well... but with you it is a sort of bravado, an air of affected unconcern" (Austen).

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Incurious implies indifference arising from a lack of intellectual interest or normal curiosity; it often suggests incapacity because of age, temperament, or state of mind. "Irving and Una had been led, heedless and incurious, to each of papa's places of worship in turn" (R. Macaulay). Aloof, and especially its derivative aloofness, stress indifference that is the natural result of feeling apart or at a distance from someone or something, as because of temperamental reserve, a sense of superiority, or an aversion to the inferior. "Young people... tend to become arrogant and hard, ignorant of the problems of adult life, and quite aloof from their parents" (B. Russell). "It nerved him to break through the awe-inspiring aloofness of his captain" (Conrad). Detached often implies a commendable aloofness which is the result of freedom from prejudices or of selfish concern for one's personal interests. "[The] detachment [of the saints], which is emancipation wrought in the soul, and the inevitable efflorescence of the Christian spirit" (Guiney). Sometimes it distinctively suggests a point of view or way of looking at persons or things as though they bear no relation to one's own life. "Rome contemplated the spectacle with the detached, intelligent amusement of the... theatre-goer" (R. Macaulay). Disinterested usually suggests a freedom from thought of personal advantage or interest that permits one to detect the truth, to tell the truth, or to judge truly; as, a disinterested observer; a disinterested historian (see also DISINTERESTED, 2).

Ana. Impartial, unbiased, dispassionate, *fair: uninterested (see DISINTERESTED): apathetic, *impassive, phlegmatic: *cool, nonchalant.

Ant. Avid. — Con. Eager, keen, agog: sympathetic, responsive, compassionate (see TENDER): *antipathetic, unsympathetic, averse.

2 Average, moderate, *medium, middling, fair, mediocre, second-rate.

Ana. Ordinary, *common.

Ant. Choice. — Con. Exquisite, rare, recherché (see CHOICE): superlative, surpassing, peerless, *supreme.

3 *Neutral, adiaborous, negative.

Indigence. Penury, want, *poverty, destitution, privation.

Ana. Straits, exigency, emergency, pass (see JUNCTURE).

Ant. Affluence, opulence.

Indigene, n. Native, aborigine, autochthon. See under NATIVE, adj.

Indigenous. *Native, autochthonous, endemic, aboriginal.

Ant. Naturalized: exotic. — Con. Foreign, alien, extraneous (see EXTRINSIC).

Indignant. *Angry, irate, wrathful, acrimonious, mad.

Ana. Incensed, infuriated, enraged, angered, maddened (see ANGER, v.): exasperated, roiled, provoked, nettled (see IRRITATE): roused, aroused, stirred (see STIR).

Con. *Complacent, smug, self-satisfied: *indifferent, unconcerned, aloof.

Indignation. Wrath, *anger, ire, rage, fury.

Ana. Resentment, dudgeon, *offense: *passion.

Indignity. *Affront, insult.

Ana. Injury, wrong, *injustice, grievance: offending or offense, outraging or outrage (see corresponding verbs at OFFEND).

Indirect. Indirect, circuitous, roundabout come into comparison when they are applied to ways, routes, means, and the like, and agree in meaning not leading by or as if by a straight path to a destination or goal. Indirect, in literal use, implies departure from the straight and short line between two points; as, the indirect road to the city is the wider and better paved and therefore the speedier. Figuratively, indirect implies following a course that is not plain, obvious, explicit, straightforward, or the like; as, indirect methods of teaching moral principles; "Jane's mother was making indirect but perfectly legitimate inquiries into his prospects" (M. Austin); indirect taxation; indirect evidence. Circuitous implies not only indirection, but usually a winding and, because of its length, slow way or course; as, they were forced to take a circuitous route on account of the floods; a circuitous approach to the house; a circuitous method of solving a problem; "Paths... more circuitous, but not less sure. Duty to reach the point marked out by Heaven" (Wordsworth). "And though circuitous and obscure. The feet of Nemesis how sure!" (W. Watson). Roundabout may be used interchangeably with circuitous, but specifically, in its literal sense, it implies a following of a more or less circular (or semi-circular) course from one point to another; the term far more often than indirect or circuitous, especially in its extended use, implies deliberate, often blameworthy, evasion or avoidance of the direct course or way; as, to take a roundabout course to one's destination; a roundabout explanation; a roundabout process of reasoning; "the roundabout, diffident appeal for pity" (Day Lewis). "She declared that she would have nothing to do with any roundabout ways, but go openly and, instantly to law" (Burney).

Ana. Devious, oblique, *crooked: *winding, sinuous, tortuous, anfractuons.

Ant. Direct: forthright, straightforward.

Indiscriminate. Indiscriminate, wholesale, sweeping come into comparison only when they carry the meaning including all, or nearly all, within the range of choice, operation, or effectiveness. That is indiscriminate which does not distinguish that which deserves from that which does not deserve, but gives, treats, selects, includes, or the like, regardless of individual deserts or merits; as, indiscriminate charity; indiscriminate praise. "The critic does a wrong who brings them under his indiscriminate censure" (Quiller-Couch). Wholesale sometimes (perhaps usually) implies indiscriminateness, but sometimes it carries almost no suggestion of it: invariably, however, it stresses extensiveness, usually suggesting that no person or thing within the range of choice, operation, or effectiveness has escaped; as, the wholesale vaccination of a community; the wholesale slaughter of a people; "Time for wholesale trust" (Mrs. H. Ward); "Communism can spread only... as a development of existing economic civilization and not by a sudden wholesale overthrow of it" (Shaw). Sweeping implies a reaching out in, or as if in, a wide circle to draw in everyone or everything within range: it usually carries a stronger suggestion of indiscriminateness than wholesale and often specifically implies exceeding the bounds of right, justice, jurisdiction, or the like, or generality rather than a concrete, specific character; as, sweeping reforms; sweeping accusations; "A sweeping and consummate vengeance for the indignity alone should satisfy him" (Meredith); "the statute is of a very sweeping and general character" (Justice Holmes).

Ana. Promiscuous, motley, heterogeneous, assorted, *miscellaneous: uncritical, *superficial, shallow.

Ant. Selective: discriminating.

Indispensable. Essential, necessary, requisite, *needful.

Ana. Vital, cardinal, fundamental, *essential.

Ant. Dispensable.

Indisposed. *Disinclined, loath, averse, hesitant, reluctant.

Ana. Inimical, hostile, antagonistic, antipathetic (see corresponding nouns at ENMITY).

Ant. Disposed. — Con. Eager, avid, keen, anxious:

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

friendly, *amicable, neighborly: sympathetic, responsive (see TENDER).

individual, adj. 1 Particular, specific, *special, especial, concrete, respective.

Ana. *Single, sole, separate, particular.

Ant. General. — Con. Generic, *universal, common.

2 Peculiar, distinctive, *characteristic.

Ana. Unique, singular (see STRANGE): *distinct, separate, several.

Ant. Common. — Con. Ordinary, familiar, popular (see COMMON).

individuality. Personality, *disposition, temperament, temper, complexion, character.

individually. *Each, apiece, severally, respectively.

indolent. Fainéant, slothful, *lazy.

Ana. *Lethargic, sluggish, comatose: *inactive, inert, idle, passive, supine: *languid, languorous, lackadaisical, listless.

Ant. Industrious. — Con. *Busy, diligent, assiduous, sedulous: energetic, strenuous, *vigorous.

indomitable. *Invincible, unconquerable, impregnable, inexpugnable, unassailable, invulnerable.

Ana. Stubborn, dogged, pertinacious (see OBSTINATE): resolute, stanch, steadfast (see FAITHFUL): redoubtable, *formidable: undaunted, dauntless, intrepid, doughty (see BRAVE).

indorse. Variant of ENDORSE.

induce. Induce, persuade, prevail on or upon agree in meaning to move another by arguments, allurements, or the like, to do something or to follow a certain course.

Induce usually implies an influencing of the reason or judgment of one who is temperamentally opposed or who is convinced that another course or act is better: the term usually suggests that the decision is outwardly at least made by the one induced rather than forced upon him by the one that induces; as, "only those... doctors who were possessed of superior courage and capable of supreme self-sacrifice could be induced to continue at the work" (V. Heiser); "the object is to induce the child to lend of his own free will; so long as authority is required, the end aimed at has not been achieved" (B. Russell). Persuade implies an appeal to another's feelings or desires rather than to his reason; it may suggest entreaty, coaxing, expostulation, cajoling, or the like, but it usually implies that the one persuaded is more or less won over (sometimes even tricked) by the one that persuades. "Ten o'clock! it was eleven, upon my soul! I counted every stroke. This brother of yours would persuade me out of my senses" (Austen). "It is not very difficult to persuade people to do what they are all longing to do" (A. Huxley). Prevail on or upon (sometimes, especially in the past, prevail with) may be employed in place of either induce or persuade, but it usually carries a stronger implication of opposition to be faced or of good arguments to be overcome; as, "He had never before supposed that, could Wickham be prevailed on to marry his daughter, it would be done with so little inconvenience to himself as by the present arrangement" (Austen); "I will go now and try to prevail on my mother to let me stay with you" (Shaw). Ana. *Incite, instigate, abet: *move, actuate, drive, impel: motivate, *activate, actuate.

Con. *Command, order, enjoin, direct, bid, charge: *prescribe, assign, define.

inducement. Incentive, spur, *motive, goad, spring, impulse.

Ana. Temptation, enticement, seduction, luring or lure (see corresponding verbs at LURE): *stimulus, incitement, impetus, stimulant.

induct. Inaugurate, install, *initiate, invest.

Induction. 1 Prologue, *introduction, prelude, overture, preface, foreword, prolegomenon, proem, exordium, preamble, prolusion, protasis, avant-propos.

2 *Deduction.

Ana. *Inference, illation, ratiocination.

Inductive. Deductive. See under DEDUCTION.

Ana. Illative, ratiocinative, inferential (see under INFERENCE).

indulge. Indulge, pamper, humor (or humour), spoil, baby, mollicoddle come into comparison when they mean to show undue favor or attention to a person or his desires. Indulge implies complaisance or even weakness in gratifying another's wishes or desires, especially those which have no claim to fulfillment or which ought to be kept under control; as, "I would indulge her every whim" (Hardy); "pasty-faced languid creatures... indulged in food and disciplined in play" (B. Russell); "When schoolboys were less indulged with pocket-money" (Arch. Marshall). Pamper, which originally implied overfeeding, still carries an implication of inordinate gratification of an appetite or taste, especially for what is luxurious or dainty and, therefore, softening in its physical, mental, or moral effects; as, rich though they were, they refused to pamper their children. "He [Socrates] preserved without an effort the supremacy of character and mind over the flesh he neither starved nor pampered" (G. L. Dickinson). Humor stresses either attention to or an easy yielding to whim, caprice, or changing desires; it therefore often suggests accommodation to the moods of another. "Like a froward child, that must be played with and humored a little to keep it quiet" (Temple). "I hate sending the children to the Great House... their grandmamma... humours and indulges them to such a degree... that they are sure to come back sick and cross for the rest of the day" (Austen). Spoil stresses the injurious effect on the character or disposition of one who is indulged, pampered, humored, or otherwise made the recipient of special attention; however, the word is often used to imply attentions that are likely to have this effect. "She talks a great deal, sir," Elizabeth apologized. "She's our only little girl, and I'm afraid we spoil her" (Deland). Baby implies excessive attentions, the kind given to those who are unable to care for themselves and need the constant assistance of a mother or nurse; it also carries a strong implication of humoring or pampering; as, she refused to baby her children after they were able to care for themselves and attend to their own needs. Mollicoddle usually implies babying; it distinctively suggests inordinate attention to another's health or physical comfort or, in extended use, undue efforts to relieve another of strain or hardship. It often also connotes, as the effect or danger of such treatment, effeminateness or infantilism (retarded physical, mental, or emotional development); as, schools where grown boys and girls are mollicoddled. "Look here, mother dear: I'm as well as ever I was, and I'm not going to be mollicoddled any more" (M. E. Braddon).

Ana. Favor, accommodate, *oblige: gratify, *please, regale, arride, delight.

Ant. Discipline (others): abstain (with reference to oneself, one's appetite, etc.).

indulgence. 1 Forbearance, tolerance, clemency, mercifulness, leniency. See under FORBEARING.

Ana. *Mercy, charity, lenity, grace: kindness, benignancy or benignity, benignness, kindness (see corresponding adjectives at KIND): mildness, gentleness (see corresponding adjectives at SOFT).

Ant. Strictness. — Con. Severity, sternness (see corresponding adjectives at SEVERE): rigorousness, rigidity (see corresponding adjectives at RIGID): harshness (see corresponding adjective at ROUGH).

2 *Pardon, amnesty, absolution.

indulgent. Lenient, *forbearing, tolerant, clement, merciful.

Ana. Humoring, pampering (see INDULGE): forgiving, pardoning, condoning, excusing (see EXCUSE, v.): benignant, benign, *kind, kindly: mild, gentle (see SOFT).

Ant. Strict. — Con. Stern, *severe: rigorous, stringent (see RIGID): harsh (see ROUGH).

indurated. *Hardened, callous.

Ana. Rigid, *stiff, inflexible: obdurate, adamant, adamantine, inexorable, *inflexible.

Ant. Pliable. — Con. *Plastic, pliant, ductile, malleable: flexible, *elastic, supple, resilient.

industrious. Diligent, *busy, assiduous, sedulous.

Ana. *Active, operative, live, dynamic: persevering, persisting or persistent (see corresponding verbs at PERSEVERE): *indefatigable, tireless, untiring, unflagging, unwearied.

Ant. Slothful, indolent. — Con. Idle, *inactive, inert, supine: *lazy, faint: *lethargic, sluggish, torpid.

industry. *Business, trade, commerce, traffic.

inebriate, inebriated, adj. *Drunk, drunken, intoxicated, tipsy, tight.

inebriate, n. *Drunkard, alcoholic, dipsomaniac, sot, soak, toper, tosspot, tippler.

Ant. Teetotaler.

ineffable. *Unutterable, inexpressible, inenarrable, unspeakable, indescribable.

Ana. *Celestial, heavenly, empyrean, empyreal: ethereal (see AIRY): spiritual, divine, *holy, sacred: transcendent, transcendental, ideal, *abstract.

Con. Expressible, utterable (see corresponding verbs at EXPRESS).

ineffective. Ineffective, ineffectual, inefficient, ineffacious and their less frequent forms in un- (ineffective, etc.) come into comparison as meaning not producing or incapable of producing a result or results. Except for this denial of production or capacity for production, these adjectives correspond in their applications and implications to the affirmative adjectives as discriminated at EFFECTIVE.

Ana. *Futile, vain, fruitless, bootless, abortive: *vain, nugatory, otiose, idle, empty, hollow: *sterile, barren, unfruitful, infertile.

Ant. Effective. — Con. Effectual, efficacious, efficient (see EFFECTIVE): fruitful, *fertile, fecund: forceful, forcible, *powerful, potent.

ineffectual. *Ineffective, ineffacious, inefficient.

Ana. See those at INEFFECTIVE.

Ant. Effectual. — Con. *Effective, efficacious, efficient: useful, profitable (see corresponding nouns at USE).

inefficacious. *Ineffective, ineffectual, inefficient.

Ana. *Inactive, inert, idle: *futile, vain, fruitless, bootless, abortive: *powerless, impotent.

Ant. Efficacious. — Con. *Powerful, potent, forcible, forceful: cogent, telling (see VALID): *effective, effectual, efficient.

inefficient. *Ineffective, ineffectual, ineffacious.

Ana. Incompetent, unqualified, *incapable: infirm, decrepit, feeble, *weak: indolent, slothful, faint: *lazy: remiss, lax, slack, *negligent, neglectful.

Ant. Efficient. — Con. Competent, *able, capable, qualified: skillful, skilled, *proficient, expert, adept.

ineluctable. *Inevitable, inescapable, unavoidable.

Ana. Destined, *prescribed, appointed: *certain, inevitable, necessary, apodictic.

Con. Escapable, avoidable, evadable or evasible, eludible (see corresponding verbs at ESCAPE): *doubtful, dubious, questionable: possible, *probable.

inenarrable. Indescribable, inexpressible, *unutterable, unspeakable, ineffable.

inept. *Awkward, clumsy, maladroit, gauche.

Ana. Inapt, *unfit, unsuitable, inappropriate: *impertinent, intrusive, obtrusive: *vain, nugatory, idle, empty, hollow, otiose: fatuous, asinine, foolish, silly (see SIMPLE).

Ant. Apt: adept: able (as a result of nature, training, etc.).

inerrable. *Infallible, inerrant, unerring.

inerrant. Unerring, *infallible, inerrable.

Ana. *Impeccable, flawless, faultless: accurate, exact, *correct, precise: *reliable, dependable, trustworthy: inevitable, *certain.

inert. *Inactive, passive, idle, supine.

Ana. Lifeless, inanimate, *dead: impotent, *powerless: apathetic, *impassive, phlegmatic, stolid.

Ant. Dynamic: animated. — Con. *Active, operative, live: alert, vigilant, *watchful.

inescapable or unescapable. *Inevitable, ineluctable, unavoidable.

Ana. *Certain, necessary, apodictic: inexorable, *inflexible.

Ant. Escapable.

inevitable. 1 Inevitable, ineluctable, inescapable, unescapable, unavoidable agree in meaning incapable of being shunned or evaded. Inevitable (see also CERTAIN) implies that causes are already in operation or that the conditions of one's existence, one's work, one's temperament, or the like, are such that the thing so described is bound to occur; as, "Life is full of perils, but the wise man ignores those that are inevitable" (B. Russell); "As soon as one lays down a rule...one has to face the inevitable exception" (C. E. Montague); "She was winding up all sorts of affairs, with the inevitable result that she was encountering all sorts of urgent expenses which she was unable to meet" (H. Ellis). Ineluctable adds to inevitable the suggestions that struggle or defiance is futile and that no way out is possible. "Doesn't the very 'seriousness' that we attribute to life mean that ineluctable noes and losses form a part of it...?" (W. James). "Social tolerance was not dealt in the same measure to men and to women, and neither Delia nor Charlotte had ever wondered why: like all the young women of their class they simply bowed to the ineluctable" (E. Wharton). Inescapable or unescapable (both forms are common) carries a stronger suggestion than either inevitable or ineluctable that the person concerned would, if he could, avoid what must be or is convinced of its inexorable character; as, his inescapable fate. "[D. H.] Lawrence was always and unescapably an artist. Yes, unescapably is the word; for there were moments when he wanted to escape from his destiny" (A. Huxley). Unavoidable carries a weaker implication of necessary occurrence than the other terms, but it does imply that the exercise of foresight or care has not enabled one to escape what has occurred; as, unavoidable delays; an unavoidable accident.

Ana. *Prescribed, destined, appointed: *certain, necessary, apodictic: determined, settled, decided (see DECIDE): inexorable, *inflexible.

Ant. Evitable. — Con. Escapable, avoidable, eludible, evadable or evasible (see corresponding verbs at ESCAPE): preventable, avertible (see corresponding verbs at PREVENT).

2 *Certain, necessary, apodictic.

Ana. *Infallible, inerrant, unerring: *perfect, entire, whole: definitive, determinative, decisive, *conclusive.
inexorable. Obdurate, adamant, adamantine, *inflexible.

Ana. *Rigid, rigorous, strict: resolute, steadfast (see FAITHFUL): *immovable, immobile: implacable, unrelenting, relentless, merciless, *grim.

Ant. Exorable. — Con. Compassionate, responsive, sympathetic, *tender: merciful, clement, lenient, indulgent, *forbearing.

inexpressible. *Unutterable, ineffable, unspeakable, inenarrable, indescribable.

Ana. *Subtle, subtile: tenuous, rare (see THIN): *infinite, boundless, illimitable.

Ant. Expressible.

inexpugnable. Unassailable, impregnable, *invincible, unconquerable, invulnerable, indomitable.

Ana. Redoubtable, *formidable: uncombatable, irresistible, unopposable (see affirmative verbs at OPPOSE).

Ant. Expugnable. — Con. Assailable, attackable, stormable (see corresponding verbs at ATTACK).

infallible. Infallible, inerrable, inerrant, unerring come into comparison when they mean incapable, or manifesting incapability, of making mistakes or errors. Infallible now occurs in this strict sense chiefly (but not exclusively) in reference to the person, institution, book, or the like, that is accepted as the divinely inspired medium for the revelation of moral or spiritual truth; thus, the pope is held by Roman Catholics to be infallible only when he speaks ex cathedra and defines a doctrine or a rule of morals held by the church; so, belief in an infallible church, in an infallible bible. "No mathematician is infallible; he may make mistakes; but he must not hedge" (Eddington). Inerrable (a literary rather than a colloquial word) is often preferred to infallible, its very close synonym, as a more explicit or a less technical term; as, "No man or men on the globe compose a tribunal from whose inerrable decision we may not appeal" (J. Rogers); "Many speak wisely, some inerrably" (Palmore). Inerrant (also chiefly literary) emphasizes not so much the incapacity for making mistakes or errors as the fact of their absence; as, he is an inerrant authority; an inerrant account of the battle. Unerring implies inerrancy but it stresses, especially in current use, reliability, sureness, exactness, or similar qualities; as, a marksman of unerring aim; "an unerring eye for [the] fleeting expression of the moral features of character" (J. R. Lowell); "A man is infallible, whose words are always true; a rule is infallible, if it is unerring in all its possible applications" (Newman); "a man's language is an unerring index of his nature" (Binyon).

Ana. *Certain, inevitable, necessary, apodictic: *impeccable, flawless, faultless.

Ant. Fallible. — Con. Questionable, dubious, *doubtful.

infamous. Nefarious, flagitious, iniquitous, *vicious, villainous, corrupt, degenerate.

Ana. Scandalous, ignominious, disgraceful, disreputable, shameful (see corresponding nouns at DISGRACE).

Ant. Illustrious. — Con. Glorious, *splendid, sublime.

infamy. Ignominy, shame, *disgrace, dishonor, disrepute, opprobrium, obloquy, odium, scandal.

Ana. Notoriety (see FAME): degradation, humiliation, debasement, abasement (see ABASE).

Con. Honor, glory, renown, celebrity, *fame, repute: prestige, authority, *influence, credit, weight.

infancy. Infancy, minority, nonage are interchangeable terms when they denote the state or period of being under the age established by law for the attainment of one's full civil rights and independence of guardianship. Infancy, because of its more familiar general senses, is seldom used in this denotation outside of legal documents and court reports; it is there, however, the preferable term when reference is made to the condition or status of the person who is not of age (that is, the infant, or minor). "The defendant...pleaded infancy at the time of the lease made" (Sir H. Grimston). On the other hand, minority is widely used in general as well as in legal writing and is the word to be chosen when the period or term of being under age is meant; as, he fell heir to the title during his minority. Nonage is the equivalent of infancy and minority in their legal senses, but it is to be distinguished from them in its acquired connotations and by its greater susceptibility to literary and figurative use. Very often, nonage suggests immaturity; not infrequently it suggests adolescence and its weaknesses and is thought of, by an etymological confusion, as the opposite of dotage, or senility. "Nations outgrow their spiritual nonage" (F. W. Farrar). "Three million such people as can read the Globe with interest are as yet in too crude a state of nonage to deserve any regard" (Emerson).

Con. *Age, majority.

infatuated, infatuate. 1 *Fond, besotted, insensate.

Ana. Deluded, deceived, beguiled, misled (see DECEIVE): duped, gulled, befooled (see DUPE): foolish, silly, fatuous, asinine (see SIMPLE): stultified (see corresponding verb at STUNT).

Con. Sensible, prudent, sane, judicious, *wise: *rational, reasonable.

2 *Enamored.

infection. Infection, contagion are interchangeable without loss only when they denote the matter by which a disease is carried from one person to another. When they denote either the way in which a disease is transmitted or acquired, or the disease itself (though less often in this instance), they preserve, in careful use, the differences in meaning between infectious and contagious (see INFECTIOUS, 1); as, there will be no risk of infection (not contagion) if you drink boiled water; there will be no risk of contagion (more explicit than infection) if you keep out of the sickroom. However, infection and contagion were both used in the sense of an epidemic disease so long before the discovery of the bacterial origin of what are now called infectious diseases that, except in very precise language, they still often refer to any communicable disease; as, the infection (or contagion) spread from town to town. "Manila, the only large city until recent years where an imported infection has been eradicated" (V. Heiser). Infection and contagion (technical contagium) are interchangeable when they denote the matter producing a contagious disease, such as a germ-laden secretion or a virus; as, the air of a sickroom is charged with contagion. "There is even a strong possibility that the infection [of smallpox] may be carried through the air" (V. Heiser). Figuratively, these words are not as close in their meanings as infectious and contagious, because infection rarely loses the implication of corruption so strong in infect; as, the ignorant are susceptible to the infection of false propaganda; everyone felt the contagion of her merriment.

infectious. 1 Infectious, contagious, communicable, catching, when applied to diseases, are distinguishable in spite of very close similarities of meaning. Infectious and contagious are so precisely defined in pathology that they are now rarely confused in general usage. Infectious designates any disease resulting from the invasion of the body by rapidly multiplying germs (bacteria, protozoans, and analogous microorganisms) that produce toxins or destroy or injure tissues. Contagious designates that type of infectious disease caused by receiving living germs directly from a person afflicted with it or by contact with a secretion of his or some object he has touched. The tendency to use infectious more narrowly and only of such diseases as are transmitted through an agent, such as a mosquito or rat, or a source of infection, as a polluted water supply, is not scientifically countenanced. Communicable, as here compared, is nearly equivalent to infectious, but it emphasizes the transmissibility of the disease rather than the method by which it is acquired. The colloquial catching is close in meaning to contagious, but it implies even more the dangers of contact.

Of these four terms, infectious, contagious, and catching are used figuratively. The fine distinctions exhibited in their technical senses are not carried over into the extended senses, with the result that they are nearly exact synonyms meaning rapidly imparted to others; as, contagious (or infectious) enthusiasm; What a bad temper! I hope it's not catching. "Fear is exceedingly infectious: children catch it from their elders even when their elders are not aware of having shown it" (B. Russell).

Ana. Toxic, mephitic, pestilent, pestilential, virulent, *poisonous.

2 Infectious, infective agree in denoting that infects or tends to infect. Infectious, however, is more often restricted to the technical and figurative senses expounded in the preceding article. Infective, an older word than infectious, was for a time displaced by it, but it has recently been revived, especially in pathology, where it is applied chiefly to matter and means potentially infectious; as, an infective secretion; an infective wart. Figuratively, it preserves the implication of corruption, strong in infect but often absent in infectious; as, infective doctrines (but, infectious laughter).

infective. *Infectious.

Ana. Contaminating, tainting, polluting, defiling (see CONTAMINATE): corrupting, vitiating (see DEBASE): *poisonous, virulent, toxic, mephitic.

Con. Salutary, hygienic, *healthful, wholesome.

infelicitous. Unhappy, inapt, inappropriate, unfitting, *unfit, unsuitable, unmeet, improper.

Ana. Unbecoming, unseemly, *indecorous, improper, indelicate, indecent: inept, maladroitness, gauche, *awkward.

Ant. Felicitous. — Con. Happy, apt, appropriate, fitting (see FIT, adj.): apposite, apropos, germane, pertinent, *relevant.

infer. 1 Infer, deduce, conclude, judge, gather come into comparison when they mean to arrive at by reasoning from evidence or from premises. All except gather are so clearly differentiated in strict logical use that thoughtful writers and speakers tend to observe these distinctions. The derivative nouns inference, deduction, conclusion, judgment, especially as applied to the propositions or mental formulations derived by reasoning, are even more precisely fixed in careful usage. Infer implies the drawing of an opinion, a principle, a fact, a probability, or the like, from the evidence presented or the premises accepted. In popular use the term often connotes slightness in the evidence and so comes close to surmise; in logic, however, it and inference convey no suggestion of weakness or strength. "I see motion," said Thomas [Aquinas]: "I infer a motor! This reasoning... is... stronger than some more modern inferences of science" (H. Adams). "Oh, well, don't worry. Jane hasn't got any complexes." From which Gard... inferred she thought he [Gard] had" (M. Austin). Deduce, in non-technical language, usually means to infer, with added implications of very definite grounds for the inference;

in strict logical use, it means to derive an inference from a general principle; that is, to make a deduction as opposed to an induction (see DEDUCTION, 3). This distinction, an important one to logicians and philosophers, is nearly lost in general use, where deduce and deduction imply inferences of any kind. "Then the diets [of polished and of unpolished rice] were reversed. The sick group recovered and the well group came down with the disease. It warranted the deduction that a diet which included vitamin B was a preventive for beriberi" (V. Heiser). "What a man is as an end perishes when he dies; what he produces as a means continues to the end of time. We cannot deny this, but we can deny the consequences deduced from it" (B. Russell). Conclude is often loosely employed as an equivalent of deduce in its general sense. Strictly, it means to draw the inference that is the necessary consequence of preceding propositions, whether these propositions be the premises of a syllogism or the members of a series of previously drawn inferences constituting an unbroken chain of reasoning. A conclusion is therefore either the third proposition of a syllogism or the final, summarizing proposition in a rational process. In general use, conclude and conclusion are not always so strictly applied, though they frequently preserve the implication of logical necessity in the inference. "Do not conclude that all State activities will be State monopolies" (Shaw). "The more one scans the later pages of Mark Twain's history the more one is forced to the conclusion that there was something gravely amiss with his inner life" (Van W. Brooks). Judge and judgment, as here compared, are nearly equivalent to conclude and conclusion, but in their strictest construction they (especially judgment) connote careful examination of evidence or critical testing of premises and the fitness of the conclusion for affirmation. "You must have had a charming evening... if I may judge from the way you have kept the memory green" (Conrad). "An economist should form an independent judgment on currency questions, but an ordinary mortal had better follow authority" (B. Russell). To gather is to conclude, but it connotes reflection (rather than careful reasoning) and the putting of two and two together; as, "thereby he may gather The ground of your ill-will" (Shak.); "From Thomasin's words and manner he had plainly gathered that Wildeve neglected her" (Hardy). Do not confuse infer with imply.

Ana. Reason, speculate, *think: surmise, *conjecture, guess.

2 Infer, imply are not always as strictly distinguished even by otherwise careful writers and speakers as they are by linguistic authorities, with the result that infer is often used where imply would be the correct or desirable word. In general, infer (for fuller treatment see INFER, 1) means to draw a conclusion from facts, evidence, premises, statements, or the like, by deductive or inductive reasoning (as, Darwin inferred an evolutionary process in nature from evidence gathered on voyages over a long period), and imply (as here considered; see also SUGGEST, 1; INCLUDE), means to give a ground or the grounds for an inference, as by a hint, an intimation, a significant omission, an act, or the like (as, his words imply that he means to leave his family; "praise less claims my gratitude, Than the indulgent insight it implies"—Browning). The use of infer in the sense of to hint at or to intimate (as, by his remarks he infers [correctly implies] that she is mentally unsound) is still regarded as erroneous. However, in the past infer sometimes meant, and still to some extent means, to give grounds for believing (something that is stated) or to permit (something) to be inferred. In such use, a personal subject is to be avoided, for in precise English only that which gives the ground for or permits an inference, or which leads to a given conclusion, can rightly be the subject; as, "This doth infer the zeal I had to see him" (Shak.); "Consider first that great Or bright infers not excellence" (Milton); "Matters were by no means so far advanced between the young people as Hinchard's jealous grief inferred" (Hardy). Many good writers of the present prefer imply to infer in this particular sense.

Inference. 1 Deduction, conclusion, judgment. See under INFER.

2 Inference, illation, ratiocination come into comparison when they denote the process of arriving at conclusions from data or premises. Inference, in colloquial use, often connotes guesswork; in strict logical use, it merely names the process of inferring (see INFER, 1), but does not, as illation does, suggest careful reasoning, especially in deduction. Ratiocination adds the implication of an extended process or the passing by steps from one inference to another. In present use, it often carries the humorous connotation of tediousness or of logic chopping. The same distinctions in implications are observable in the corresponding adjectives inferential, illative, and ratiocinative.

Ana. Deduction, conclusion, judgment (see under INFER, 1): reasoning, thinking, speculation, cogitation (see corresponding verbs at THINK): surmise, conjecture (see under CONJECTURE, v.).

Con. Intuition, understanding (see REASON): assumption, presumption, presupposition (see under PRESUPPOSE).

3 *Implication.

Inferential. Illative, ratiocinative. See under INFERENCE, 2.

Ana. Hypothetical, putative, conjectural, supposititious. *supposed: *theoretical, speculative, academic: *implicit, constructive, virtual.

Con. *Explicit, express, definite, categorical: intuitive, *instinctive: proved, demonstrated, tried, tested (see PROVE).

Infernal. Infernal, chthonian, hellish, Hadean, Tartarean, Stygian agree in meaning of or characteristic of the abode of the dead. Infernal, which is derived from a Latin word meaning subterranean, in its strictest sense denotes of or characteristic of the underworld, or regions inhabited by the earth gods and spirits of the dead. Through confusion of pagan conceptions of the underworld with Jewish and Christian conceptions of hell as the abode of devils and a place of torment for the souls of the damned, infernal has acquired connotations of horror, torturing fiends, and unendurable suffering through fire, which nearly always blur and sometimes blot out its etymological implications. When the classical conception of the underworld must be suggested without any admixture of alien connotations, chthonian, a learned word, is sometimes used. "From the infernal Gods, 'mid shades forlorn'" (Wordsworth). "The most abhorred fiend in the infernal regions is sent to torment me" (Scott). Hellish comes close to the current meaning of infernal but carries so strong an implication of devilishness that it now more nearly approaches fiendish in its meaning. "Heavenly love shall outdo hellish hate" (Milton). "Burned them both with hellish mockery" (Shelley). Hadean, Tartarean, and Stygian are used in poetry in place of infernal, sometimes without any reference to the conception of Hades, Tartarus, and the Styx in classic mythology. Very frequently, Hadean is a loose equivalent for chthonian, Tartarean suggests darkness and remoteness, Stygian connotes bounds with no outlet for escape, but all three are without fixed content.

Ana. *Fiendish, devilish, diabolical, demoniacal: damnable, accursed, cursed, *execrable: nefarious, flagitious, iniquitous, villainous, *vicious.

Ant. Supernal.

infertile. *Sterile, barren, impotent, unfruitful.

Ana. *Dry, arid: impoverished, exhausted, drained, depleted (see DEplete).

Ant. Fertile. — Con. Fecund, fruitful, prolific (see FERTILE): producing or productive, bearing, yielding (see corresponding verbs at BEAR): reproducing, propagating, breeding, generating (see GENERATE).

infest. Infest, overrun, beset come into comparison only when they are used in reference to disagreeable or noxious things and mean to make trouble because of their presence in swarms. To infest carries only by suggestion the idea of annoyance or repugnance, because the idiom does not require reference to the person so affected. "And robber-bands infest the mountain's foot!" (Browning); nevertheless, the term is always derogatory. "To poison vermin that infest his plants" (Cowper). "The idle rich who at present infest the older universities" (B. Russell). Overrun, as here compared, is often interchangeable with infest, especially in the passive. Usually it retains the implications of its literal sense and is, therefore, the precise word when the idea of running or spreading is to be conveyed; as, the cellar is overrun with mice; the garden is overrun with weeds. Beset, which in its primary sense denotes to set or stud, has now more frequently the meaning to trouble through frequency and persistence, and often connotes assailing or attacking; as, he was beset by enemies on every side. "She hurried at his words, beset with fears" (Keats).

Ana. *Frequent, haunt: *teem, swarm, abound, superabound: harass, harry, pester, plague, *worry, annoy.

Ant. Disinfest. — Con. *Exterminate, extirpate, eradicate, wipe out: *abolish, annihilate, extinguish, abate.

infidel. Unbeliever, *atheist, freethinker, agnostic, deist. Ana. Heathen, *pagan, paynim.

infinite. Infinite, eternal, sempiternal, boundless, illimitable, uncircumscribed agree in meaning having neither beginning nor end or being without known limits of any sort. Infinite (etymologically, without limits of any kind) was in early English use applied chiefly to God and to his attributes: in such applications, it implied immeasurability or an incapacity for being estimated in extent, duration, or in any conceivable respect; as, "Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite" (Psalms cxlvii. 5); "Great are thy works, Jehovah! infinite Thy power! what thought can measure thee, or tongue Relate thee" (Milton). In popular mathematical and scientific use, the term usually stresses indeterminateness rather than immeasurability: often it implies that no limits can be set to which a thing does or may extend, or that no point at which it ends can be discerned; thus, the number of positive integers (i.e., numerals) is infinite (i.e., no one can set a limit to the number that can be indicated); an infinite decimal is one that cannot be brought to a termination, such as a repeating (or recurring) decimal or a circulating decimal. "The total number of stars is supposed, even by those who reject the idea of infinite extension, to run into thousands of millions" (Inge). In general and looser use, infinite usually implies not only exceeding greatness or vastness but indefiniteness or seeming endlessness of extent; as, "Chinese landscape [painting] is certainly pre-eminent . . . in suggesting infinite horizons, the look of mountains . . . melting away into remote sky" (Binyon); "The Truth . . . is of necessity infinite and so is not for any poor finite creature like man" (Babbitt). Eternal, in its earliest and still prevailing sense, implies neither beginning nor end in time: it is therefore applied chiefly to God, in the sense of being uncaused or uncreated and unending; as, "The eternal God is thy refuge" (Deuteronomy xxxiii. 27); "Eternal Providence" (Milton). It is also sometimes applied to things, especially to those regarded as abstractions which are creations of the human and therefore finite mind, for which no beginning is known or under present conditions is discoverable, and for which no end can be foreseen or predicted; as, to argue that matter is eternal; the idea that the world is eternal is now seldom, if ever, advanced. "If space is infinite and time eternal," Mark murmured, "I am in infinity and I am in eternity" (C. Mackenzie). In some thinking, eternal applies to that which is independent of, or capable of being thought of without reference to, human and finite concepts such as those of time and space; as, "to think . . . of heaven as a state rather than a place—a state, too, which is eternal in a deeper sense than that of unending time-succession" (Inge). Equally common is the use of eternal in the sense of endless or everlasting (see EVERLASTING) when it applies to things which have a known or an acknowledged beginning in time; as, to enter into eternal life; those dying unrepentant will suffer eternal punishment for their sins. In nonreligious contexts, this sense is frequent in hyperbolic or humorous use (as, "the staircase door opened with its eternal creak"—Bennett), but it also applies to that which, though it changes in appearance, form, or method, never dies out; as, "The tragedy of The Changing [i.e., 'of the not naturally bad but irresponsible and undeveloped nature, caught in the consequences of its own action'] is an eternal tragedy" (T. S. Eliot); "Macaulay, who has a special affinity for the eternal schoolboy" (Inge). Sempiternal, a bookish word, is, in origin at least, an intensive of eternal, with somewhat greater emphasis upon the continuity of the thing so described (as, "All truth is from the sempiternal source Of Light Divine"—Cowper; "he did not really believe that infinity was infinite or that the eternal was also sempiternal"—Shaw), but, as is often the case with intensives, it is now chiefly a hyperbolic term (as, "Dull dinners . . . with the sempiternal saddle of mutton"—J. Jekyll). Boundless, except in recent scientific and mathematical use, where it and infinite are employed as contrasted terms, implies little more than an apparent lack of restrictions or bounds, or a capacity for extending, expanding, or increasing indefinitely: it often applies to something which so far exceeds in range, measure, or amount what is usual for a thing of its kind that it staggers the human mind; as, boundless wealth; boundless impudence; "My bounty is as boundless as the sea" (Shak.); "A boundless command of the rhetoric in which the vulgar express hatred and contempt" (Macaulay); "When that which drew from out the boundless deep Turns again home" (Tennyson). In current mathematical and scientific usage, boundless refers to a space (as represented by a closed curved line, or a spherical surface, etc., and without regard to its calculable extension or area) which has the property of permitting an object starting from any point in the space and proceeding by one mathematical law to return to the same point without being interrupted; thus, in the Einsteinian conception, physical space is boundless but not infinite, since a ray of light, assumed to travel along a curve rather than a straight line, can conceivably return to its starting point after an estimated 500 billion years. Illimitable also stresses a lack of bounds or limits, and may be used in place of boundless (as, "an illimitable appetite"—L. Stephen), but it is often applied specifically to that (such as a distance) which can usually be measured in extent but which, in the instance noted, exceeds the capacity of human ingenuity or of any human instrument for measurement or determination of extent; as, "The heavens' illimitable height" (Spenser); the illimitable distances between the earth and some of the stars. Uncircumscribed implies the lack of a determinable limit in any conceivable direction: it applies to anything that extends or expands or seems to extend or expand in all directions in the manner of radii from the center of a circle; as, uncircumscribed freedom; "So arbitrary and uncircumscribed a Power" (Charles I of England).

Ant. Finite. — Con. Circumscribed, limited, restricted (see LIMIT, v.): *dependent, conditional, contingent, relative, adjective.

infirm. Feeble, decrepit, *weak, frail, fragile.

Ana. Debilitated, disabled, crippled (see WEAKEN): *sick, ill.

Ant. Hale. — Con. *Strong, sturdy, stalwart, stout: *healthy, robust, sound.

infix. *Implant, inculcate, instill, inseminate.

Ana. *Set, settle, fix, establish, firm: *enter, introduce, admit: ingrain, inoculate, *infuse, imbue.

inflame. Fire, kindle, enkindle, *light, ignite.

Ana. *Inform, inspire, animate: incense, infuriate, enrage (see ANGER, v.): exasperate, provoke, aggravate, nettle, *irritate.

Ant. Extinguish (a fire, a passion).

inflate. Distend, swell, *expand, amplify, dilate.

Ana. Enlarge, *increase, augment: magnify, aggrandize, *exalt.

Ant. Deflate. — Con. *Contract, compress, shrink, condense, constrict.

inflated. Inflated, flatulent, tumid, turgid are here considered not only in their literal senses but also, and chiefly in their secondary senses, especially as applied to persons, their temperaments, their language, and their style. Literally, all agree in meaning filled with something insubstantial such as air or gas. Inflated implies expansion by the introduction of air or gas or something equally lacking in substance to the point where the walls are stretched taut or tension is evident; as, an inflated tire; an inflated balloon. In its extended use, inflated implies a stretching or expanding, often by artificial or questionable means, to a point not justified by reality or truth; thus, currency is said to be inflated when the amount in circulation far exceeds the amount normally necessary to meet the demands of trade and commerce; one's ego is said to be inflated when one is puffed up with self-confidence and pride not warranted by one's ability or achievements; a style may be described as inflated when it is far more pretentious or imposing than its subject matter warrants. Flatulent, in literal use, is applied chiefly to persons or their organs affected by a condition (flatulence) where wind or gases generating in the alimentary canal cause distention of stomach or bowels. In its extended use, flatulent usually implies emptiness with the appearance of fullness, or a lack of pith or substance; as, "Flatulent with fumes of self-applause" (Young). "A score or two of poems, each more feeble and more flatulent than the last" (Swinburne). "To this day he [Emerson] is the victim of gross misrepresentation by enthusiasts who read into him all sorts of flatulent bombast" (Mencken). Tumid implies noticeable enlargement by swelling or bloating, especially as a result of a morbid or abnormal condition; as, "my thighs grow very tumid" (Johnson); "So high as heaved the tumid hills [at the command of the Creator], so low Down sunk a hollow bottom broad and deep, Capacious bed of waters" (Milton). In its extended use, tumid implies an abnormal or conspicuous increase in volume without a proportionate increase in mass or weight. "To compare, in thy tumid pride, with me?" (Shelley). "While Shakespeare, using great words on the lowlier subject, contrives to make them appropriate, with Burke, writing on the loftier subject, the same or similar words have become tumid" (Quiller-Couch). Turgid is not always distinguishable from tumid in its literal use; however, it is the preferred word when normal distention as distinct from morbid bloating is implied; as, healthy living cells are turgid; woody tissue turgid with sap. Consequently, in extended use, especially as applied to expression or style, turgid often adds to tumid the connotation of unrestrained vitality or of undisciplined emotion, especially as manifest in bombast, rant, or rhapsody (see BOMBAST). In general, however, turgid is used to describe any style or language that is not measured or restrained and perfectly in keeping with the thought. "The turgid speech And stately tone of moralists, who boast, As if, like him of fabulous renown, They... were each An Orpheus, and omnipotent in song" (Cowper). "The effects... already... show in French architecture—which is growing repulsive—and in French prose—which is growing turgid" (Belloc). Ana. Bombastic, grandiloquent, magniloquent, aureate, flowery, *rhetorical: pompous, pretentious, ostentatious, *showy: rhapsodical, ranting, fustian (see corresponding nouns at BOMBAST): *wordy, verbose, prolix, diffuse. Ant. Pithy. — Con. Compendious, *concise, summary, terse, succinct, laconic.

inflection or inflexion. Inflection (or inflexion), intonation, accent are comparable when they designate a particular manner of employing the tones of the voice in speech. Inflection implies change in pitch or tone; it often suggests a variation expressive of emotion or sentiment, and, usually, a momentary mood; as, it was not her words, but her inflection, that hurt. "A slight inflection made one feel that one had received a great compliment" (Cather). Intonation is often, though not necessarily, individual but it is seldom thought of as the result of a mood; it is applied to the rise and fall in pitch that constitutes what is called "speech melody" and that distinguishes the utterance of one individual or group from another; as, a ministerial intonation. "We still write... for the actors, reckon upon their intonations, their gestures" (Quiller-Couch). "That peculiar and pleasant intonation that marks the speech of the Hebridean" (W. Black). In some languages (as Chinese), called "tone languages," fixed pitch, or intonation, distinguishes the various meanings of single words. In a more specific sense, intonation often (as intone always) implies reciting or speaking a psalm, prayer, or the like, in a singing voice, usually in monotone. "Intonation of that majestic iambic [Greek] verse whose measure would have been obscured by a rapid and conversational delivery" (G. L. Dickinson). Accent denotes such manner or quality of utterance or tone as may distinguish the speech peculiar to a person, race, district, class, etc.; as, a Southern, a Parisian, or a nasal accent; to speak with a refined accent. Like the other terms in this group, it often suggests, and sometimes indicates, the speaker's feelings. "A different accent was notable in Joseph's voice when he spoke of Azariah" (G. Moore).

Ana. Enunciation, pronunciation, articulation (see corresponding verbs at PRONOUNCE).

inflexible. 1 Rigid, *stiff, tense, stark, wooden.

Ana. Hard, solid, *firm: *rigid, rigorous, strict, stringent: tough, tenacious, stout, *strong: immobile, *immoveable.

Ant. Flexible. — Con. *Elastic, resilient, supple, springy: pliable, pliant, *plastic, malleable, ductile: fluid, *liquid.

2 Inflexible, inexorable, obdurate, adamant, adamantine come into comparison when they mean not to be moved from or changed in one's predetermined course or purpose. All are applicable to persons, decisions, laws, and principles; otherwise, they vary in their applications. Inflexible usually implies firmly established principles rigidly adhered to; sometimes it connotes resolute steadfastness, sometimes slavish conformity, sometimes mere pigheadedness. "Society's attitude toward drink and dishonesty was still inflexible" (E. Wharton). "A morality that is rigid and inflexible and dead" (H. Ellis). Inexorable, when applied to persons, stresses deafness to entreaty. "More fierce and more inexorable far Than empty tigers or the roaring sea" (Shak.). When applied to decisions, rules, laws, and their enforcement, it often connotes relentlessness, ruthlessness, and finality beyond question. "Nature inexorably ordains that the human race shall perish of famine if it stops working" (Shaw). It is also often applied to that which exists or happens of necessity or which cannot be avoided or evaded; as, the inexorable limitations of human nature; inexorable destiny. Obdurate is applicable chiefly to persons for it now almost invariably implies hardness of heart or insensitiveness to external influences such as divine grace or to appeals for mercy, forgiveness, or assistance. "If when you make your prayers, God should be so obdurate as yourselves, How would it fare with your departed souls?" (Shak.). Adamant and adamantine usually imply extraordinary strength of will or impenetrability to temptation or entreaty. "Cromwell's adamantine courage was shown on many a field of battle" (G. Smith). "When Eve upon the first of men The apple pressed with specious cant, O, what a thousand pities then That Adam was not Adam-ant!" (T. Moore).

Ana. *Rigid, strict, rigorous, stringent: intractable, refractory, headstrong, *unruly, ungovernable: implacable, relentless, unrelenting, *grim: stubborn, *obstinate, dogged, stiff-necked, mulish.

Ant. Flexible. — Con. *Elastic, resilient, expansive, volatile, buoyant: amenable, tractable, docile, biddable (see OBEDIENT).

influence, n. Influence, authority, prestige, weight, credit come into comparison when they mean power exerted over the minds or acts of others either without apparent effort or as the result of the qualities, the position, or the reputation of the person or thing that exerts this power. Influence etymologically suggests a flowing out, from one thing into another, of something imperceptible or impalpable: this connotation is retained when the word implies the effect or effects which one person or thing insensibly has on another or the ascendancy which one person or thing similarly acquires over another; as, every close friend has some influence in shaping one's character or personality; he was not strong enough to resist the influence of bad companions; the influence of Milton's poetry on Keats has been carefully traced by more than one critic. "We find primitive men thinking that almost everything... can exert influence of some sort" (W. James). However, in current use, influence often loses this implication of insensible or unconscious operation and suggests the conscious use of personal power or, sometimes, of underhanded means to determine the acts of another; in this sense it often follows the verb use or one of its synonyms; as, to use undue influence over a person making a will; to use one's influence in getting a bill through a legislature. Authority originally was applied to a preacher, teacher, writer, or the like, or to any of his writings or utterances that had the power to compel belief or to win acceptance. In such cases the word usually imputed great learning, great wisdom, divine inspiration, or the like, to the person or his work. "By turning o'er authorities, I have...made familiar To me...the blest infusions That dwell in vegetives, in metals, stones" (Shak.). In modern use, authority is still applied to the person, book, or the like, that is able to gain such credence or to inspire belief in its authoritativeness; as, do not cite this historian; he is not an authority. "An economist should form an independent judgment on currency questions, but an ordinary mortal had better follow authority" (B. Russell). From this use mainly, but also from its other sense (see POWER, 3), authority has come to be applied also to the power resident in any person or thing that is able because of his or its inherent qualities to win the devotion or allegiance of men and to gain (rather than exact) their obedience and belief; as, a book of manifest authority. "That personal authority [of Augustus], which, far more than any legal or constitutional device, was the true secret of his later power" (Buchan). "A doctrine that has acquired authority in our own time" (S. Alexander). "Some of the new philosophies undermine the authority of science, as some of the older systems undermined the authority of religion" (Inge). Prestige, in contrast with authority, implies the power to gain ascendancy over the minds of men and to command their admiration for distinguished and superior performance, or for conspicuous excellence in its kind. "Nothing more affects the prestige of a power than its dramatic and rapid defeat in the field" (Belloc). "Augustus sought to make of it [the Roman Senate] a true colleague and in every way to enhance its prestige" (Buchan). "The almost magical prestige that had belonged to the original humanists" (A. Huxley). Weight denotes measurable influence, especially in determining the acts of others; as, persons whose judgments have weight on the decisions of others "Mrs. Hawthorne's authoritative air was beginning to have some weight with him" (Arch. Marshall). "She seemed scarcely of any weight beyond a man's need of her youth and her gift of making men comfortable" (E. M. Roberts). Credit (as here compared: see also BELIEF, 1) denotes influence that arises from one's reputation for inspiring confidence or admiration, or the like. "Buckingham...resolved to employ all his credit in order to prevent the marriage" (Hume). "As it [the ballet] declined as an art, so also it declined in credit and in popularity; it became scarcely respectable even to admire dancing" (H. Ellis).

Ana. Driving or drive, impelling or impulsion, actuation (see corresponding verbs at MOVE): *power, control, dominion, sway, authority: ascendancy, *supremacy: dominance (see corresponding adjective DOMINANT).

influence, v. *Affect, sway, impress, touch, strike.

Ana. *Move, actuate, drive, impel: stimulate, *provoke, excite: *stir, arouse, rouse. *incline, dispose, predispose, bias.

inform, v. 1 Inform, animate, inspire, fire are synonyms when they mean to infuse into (a person or thing) a spirit, a principle, an idea, a passion, or the like, that gives (him or it) effective power or an urge to action or activity. Sometimes, especially in the last three words, the idea of driving or actuating is so strong that it becomes their common denotation and the idea of infusion is merely a common connotation. To inform is to endow with a form, or formative principle. But in its philosophical earlier sense inform implies a concept of form as that element in a thing which makes it what it is generically or specifically (a man, a tree, a horse) as distinguished from the matter in which the form is embodied; in modern literary use, it suggests a concept of form as the active principle of a thing or the spirit or quality that gives it its peculiar, essential, and often abiding, character. "The inspiration of religion passed on to inform and subtly to perfume an art [Buddhist art] nominally concerned with the aspects of earth and sky, wild creatures and wild flowers" (Binyon). "Everything that is made from without and by dead rules, and does not spring from within through some spirit informing it" (Wilde). "That which makes Chartres Cathedral...the Song of Roland, the Arthurian Legends, great art and unique, is...the peculiar spiritual impulse which informed the time" (R. A. Cram). To animate is to endow with a soul, or a principle of life, or an impulse to action. Although animate is often used where inform is also possible, it suggests, far more than inform, vitality and living energy; as, "religion...which is animated...by faith and hope" (Johnson). When that which is affected is a person or when motivation of action or transiency of impulse is to be implied, animate is the required word; as, he was animated (not informed) with love for all men; "when the community is animated with anger against some heinous offence" (S. Alexander); his hatred of restraint animated his resistance to authority. To inspire is to communicate to a person, as if by breathing in, power or energy in excess of that which he believes to be his own. In its strictest sense, the word usually implies both the operation of a supernatural power or of some inexplicable agency and an effect such as a spiritual illumination, or a quickening of intellectual or imaginative activity, or an exaltation of feeling. "Great artists know or believe that they are inspired from something outside themselves" (S. Alexander). "That sublimated language used by the finest minds in their inspired moments" (Hudson). "We climb the mountains for their views and the sense of grandeur they inspire" (Jefferies). In looser use, inspire often implies indirect rather than inexplicable influence, methods, or source, as in imparting knowledge, arousing a feeling, or the like; as, teachers should inspire their pupils to work hard; today's editorial on the mayor's policy was certainly inspired (that is, it does not represent the editor's views but those of someone in power). To fire is to animate or inspire so powerfully that one is inflamed with passion, ardor, enthusiasm, or the like. "Patient of constitutional control...One step beyond the boundary of the laws Fires him at once in Freedom's glorious cause" (Couper). "O how they fire the heart devout" (Burns).

Ana. *Infuse, inoculate, imbue, leaven: instill, *implant, inculcate, inseminate: enlighten, *illuminate: inflame, fire, enkindle, kindle (see LIGHT, v.): endue, endow (see POWER).

Con. Stultify, atrophy, *stunt.

2 Inform, acquaint, apprise, advise, notify, advertise agree in meaning to make one aware or cognizant of something. One informs a person of something when one imparts knowledge of any sort, but particularly of occurrences or of facts necessary to the understanding of a situation; as, to inform a person of his success in a competition; the radio announcer informed his audience of the accident ten minutes after it happened. "Fyne told her that I was fully informed" (Conrad). Also, one informs oneself (of, on, upon, how, why, etc.) when by study or investigation one gathers the pertinent facts; as, to inform oneself why the expedition was a failure. "He must inform himself upon Miss Mary Ferris's condition, if he would make himself pleasing to the family" (Deland). Inform, in a more restricted use, also carries the implication of talebearing or accusation. "I shall not inform upon you. It is not my business" (Wilde). One acquaints a person with something when by introducing him to the experience of it or by imparting information concerning it one makes him familiar with it; as, in the first meeting of the class, the teacher acquainted his pupils with the program of study. Familiarity is even more strongly implied in the participial adjective acquainted than in the finite verb. "A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief" (Isaiah liii. 3). One apprises a person of something when by a message or sign one communicates something which is of interest or importance to him; as, to apprise one's employers of one's intention to resign. "I made up my mind to send the waiter to . . . apprise him that I was there" (M. Austin). One advises a person of something when one informs him of something that is important to him, as in making a decision, determining a policy, arranging plans, or the like; as, the president asked to be kept advised of changes in public sentiment. Oftentimes, there is a suggestion of forewarning or counsel; as, the passengers were advised of the risk before the vessel left New York. One notifies a person of something when one sends a notice or formal communication concerning a thing requiring his attention; as, to notify students of a change in the date of opening college; the court clerk promised to notify the witnesses when to appear. In commercial use, advise is used in preference to notify when information is given by letter, telegram, cable, or the like; as, please advise us when the shipment is made. One advertises a person of or concerning something when one gives him information by way of warning or of formal notification. This sense of advertise, once common, is now obsolescent. "Let me now add a short hint on the subject of another [event]; of which we have been advertised by the same authority" (Austen).

Ana. *Communicate, impart: *teach, instruct, school, discipline, educate, train: *warn, forewarn, caution.

information. Lore, learning, *knowledge, science, erudition, scholarship.

Ana. *News, tidings, intelligence, advice.

infraction. *Breach, violation, transgression, infringement, trespass, contravention.

Ana. *Offense, sin, crime, vice, scandal: slip, lapse, faux pas, *error.

Ant. Observance.

infrequent. Infrequent, uncommon, scarce, rare, occasional, sporadic are not close synonyms but they come into comparison because they agree in meaning appearing, happening, or met with so seldom as to attract attention or to create a shortage. That is infrequent which does not occur often, especially within a given period of time, or which does not recur except at very wide intervals of time or of space; as, tornadoes are infrequent in New England; "far from being infrequent, the crystalline state is almost universal among solids" (Karl K. Darrow); infrequent pines dot the forest. "Though it was only a few hundred miles north of Santa Fé, communication with that region was so infrequent that news traveled to Santa Fé from Europe more quickly than from Pike's Peak" (Cather). That is uncommon which does not occur or is not found ordinarily and which therefore is singular, exceptional, or extraordinary; as, smallpox is now uncommon in most parts of the United States; "In certain country districts in Europe families of fifteen are not uncommon enough to be regarded as extraordinary" (Shaw); such muscular strength is uncommon among girls. That is scarce which at the moment in mind is not easily found or which does not exist or is not produced in sufficient quantities; as, butter is cheap when it is plentiful and dear when it is scarce; a bad harvest makes wheat scarce; highly skilled mechanics are now scarce. That is rare (as here compared: see also CHOICE, THIN) of which but few examples, specimens, or instances are found; also, the term often carries the implications of uncommon, such as exceptional or extraordinary character; as, rare postage stamps; rare books and first editions; "A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world" (Burke); "Great men are scarce (to use the book-sellers' distinction), but great biographers are positively rare" (T. Seccombe); "I may say again, if only rare, how this butterfly would be prized!" (Jefferies); "[He] . . . was reported to give very indifferent wines to the rare guests he received in his grim old house" (E. Wharton). That is occasional which happens or is met with merely now and then. Occasional more than any of the preceding terms implies irregularity or nonconformity to any rule or law that might govern occurrences or appearances; as, "This was not an occasional outburst of activity; it was Wesley's routine" (S. M. Crothers); "Artemus Ward was all fun and sweet reasonableness. . . with an occasional barb that by its unexpectedness did the more damage" (Lucas). That is sporadic which has no continuous existence or continuity in its manifestations and which comes into existence or occurs only in rare and, usually, isolated instances; as, sporadic cases of an infectious disease; sporadic outbursts of opposition to high taxes; sporadic occurrences of loan words in the manuscripts of that period; "Humanism and religion are thus, as historical facts, by no means parallel; humanism has been sporadic, but Christianity continuous" (T. S. Eliot).

Ana. *Exceptional: singular, unique, *strange: *irregular, anomalous, unnatural.

Ant. Frequent. — Con. *Usual, customary, accustomed: ordinary, *common, familiar.

infringe. Encroach, trench, entrench, *trespass, invade

Ana. *Intrude, obtrude, butt in, interlope: violate, break, transgress (see corresponding nouns at BREACH) infringement. *Breach, infraction, violation, trespass, transgression, contravention.

Ana. Encroachment, invading or invasion, entrenchment (see corresponding verbs at TRESPASS): intruding or intrusion, obtruding or obtrusion (see corresponding verbs at INTRUDE).

infuriate. Enrage, incense, *anger, madden.

Ana. Provoke, roil, exasperate, aggravate (see IRRITATE): outrage, insult, affront, *offend.

infuse. Infuse, suffuse, imbue, ingrain (or engrain), inoculate, leaven are here compared as meaning to introduce one thing into another so as to change or affect it superficially, extensively, or profoundly. Infuse (literally, to pour into), in the sense here considered, refers to the act of an agent or agency that introduces something which gives physical, mental, or spiritual life or vigor, or new significance to the thing (often the person) affected; as, "thou didst smile, Infused with a fortitude from heaven, When I . . . Under my burthen groan'd" (Shak.); "He infused his own intrepid spirit into the troops" (Gibbon); "Unfortunately Okio [a Japanese painter] . . . was of too cold a temperament to infuse a powerful current of life into the old tradition" (Binyon). Suffuse (etymologically, to pour under) implies an over-spreading of a surface by, or a spreading through an extent of, something that gives the thing affected a distinctive or unusual color, aspect, texture, quality, or the like; as, a blush suffused her cheek; eyes suffused with tears; "when purple light shall next suffuse the skies" (Pope); "she . . . pulled the chain of the incandescent mantle . . . the room was suffused with the sickly illumination" (C. Mackenzie); "the poetic faculty will, in fact, have to deal—not with an abstract idea,—but with an idea suffused and moulded by emotion" (Day Lewis). Imbue (literally, to saturate, especially with color as in dyeing) implies the introduction of something that enters so deeply and so extensively into the thing's substance or nature that no part is left untouched or unaffected: unlike infuse, which it otherwise closely resembles, imbue takes as its object the person or thing affected, and not the thing that is introduced; thus, to infuse courage into his soldiers; to imbue his soldiers with courage; to infuse grace into the soul; to imbue the soul with grace. "Thy words, with grace divine Imbued, bring to their sweetness no satiety" (Milton). "[Virgil] has imbued every object that he touches, with the light and warmth and color absorbed from its contact with life" (Lowes). Ingrain (literally, to dye in a fast color, especially before weaving) is now found, in the sense here considered, in the past participle or passive forms only: like imbue, it implies an incorporation of something comparable to a pervading dye with the body, substance, or nature of whatever is affected, but unlike imbue, it takes for its object (or, when the verb is passive, as its subject) the thing introduced rather than the person or thing affected; as, "Cruelty and jealousy seemed to be ingrained in a man who has these vices at all" (Sir A. Helps); "The idea of absolute financial probity as the first law of a gentleman's code was...deeply ingrained in him" (E. Wharton); "The feeling...is so deeply ingrained in human nature" (Max Muller). Inoculate (literally, to introduce a disease germ, virus, or the like, so that it produces infection or disease or, more often in current use, serves as a step in producing immunity) in extended use implies imbuing a person with something that acts in the manner of a disease germ. Often, the term implies an introduction of an idea, an emotion, a taste, or the like, by highly surreptitious or artificial means, in order to achieve a desired end: less often, it also implies a similar introduction of something evil and destructive; as, to inoculate a group with suspicion of their government; "the theory...that if the great masses of the plain people could be inoculated with it [a taste for music] they would cease to herd into the moving-picture theaters" (Mencken). Leaven (literally, to make dough rise and become light and porous by the introduction of yeast) implies a transforming or tempering of a body, mass, or the like, by the introduction of something which enlivens, elevates, exalts, or, on the other hand, that causes disturbance, agitation, or corruption. "Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump" (1 Corinthians v. 6-7). "[The believer] knows that if indeed the spirit of Christ could truly leaven the world, the pomps, the glories, the splendours which veil it [religion], would melt like unsubstantial wreaths of smoke" (A. C. Benson).

Ana. Impregnate, saturate, impenetrate, *permeate, pervade: *inform, inspire, animate, fire: instill, inculcate, *implant, inseminate, infix.

ingeminate. *Repeat, iterate, reiterate.

ingenious. Cunning, *clever, adroit.

Ana. Inventing or inventive, creating or creative, discovering (see corresponding verbs at INVENT): *dexterous, feat, handy, deft: skillful, adept, skilled, expert, *proficient.

☞ Do not confuse ingenious with ingenuous.

ingenuous. *Natural, simple, naïve, unsophisticated, artless.

Ana. Open, *frank, candid, plain: transparent, *clear:

*childlike, childish: *straightforward, aboveboard: *sincere, unfeigned.

Ant. Disingenuous: cunning. — Con. Stealthy, covert, furtive, surreptitious, underhand (see SECRET): wily, artful, crafty, tricky, foxy, *sly.

☞ Do not confuse ingenuous with ingenious.

ingrain or engrain. *Infuse, suffuse, imbue, inoculate, leaven.

Ana. Impregnate, saturate, *permeate, pervade, interpenetrate, impenetrate: instill, infix, inculcate, *implant, inseminate: incorporate, embody (see IDENTIFY).

ingrained. *Inherent, constitutional, essential, intrinsic. Ana. Confirmed, *inveterate, deep-seated, deep-rooted, chronic: infixed, implanted, inseminated (see IMPLANT): imbued, inoculated (see INFUSE).

Con. Shallow, *superficial: external, outward, *outer, exterior, outside: extraneous, *extrinsic, alien, foreign.

ingratiating. *Disarming, insinuating, insinuating.

Ana. Obsequious, *subservient, servile: fawning, truckling, toadying (see FAWN): flattering, complimenting (see corresponding nouns at COMPLIMENT): blandering, cajoling, wheedling (see COAX).

Ant. Forbidding.

ingredient, n. Constituent, component, *element, integrant, factor.

Ana. *Item, detail, particular.

Con. Compound, composite, amalgam, *mixture, admixture, blend.

ingress. *Entrance, entry, entree, access.

Ant. Egress.

inhabitant. Inhabitant, denizen, resident, citizen are here compared as meaning one whose home or dwelling place is in a definite location. Of these terms inhabitant applies regularly in nonfigurative use to animals as well as persons, and only denizen applies also to plants, and sometimes even to words. Inhabitant, the least specific word, implies nothing more than an abode in a given place; as, in 1940 the city had 243,718 inhabitants; "certain disagreeable inhabitants of open impounded water supplies, known as algae" (A. C. Morrison). Denizen denotes one that belongs by birth or naturalization to a given locality; as, denizens of the deep; "winged denizens of the crag" (Scott); "as if the old denizens of the forest had been felled with an axe" (M. F. Maury). Originally, though now rarely in literal use, denizen denoted one who lives within a country (sometimes a city) as distinguished from a foreigner; later it came sometimes to be applied specifically to a naturalized alien (as, "Charles [I] seemed ambitious of making English denizens of every man of genius in Europe"—I. D'Israeli). Even when substituted in literary use for inhabitant, denizen retains something of its own flavor of belonging to the locality by birth or naturalization; as, "jaded and oversophisticated denizens of towns" (Lowes). Resident is not always clearly distinguished from inhabitant, especially when a town or city, as distinguished from a state or country, is in question. Often the term implies nothing more than tenancy of a room, an apartment, a house, or the like, for a considerable length of time; as, the summer residents of Bar Harbor. Often, in the case of a person who has several residences or who lives mainly in a place other than the one regarded as his home, the term suggests not permanent inhabitancy but legal recognition of one of these places as his domicile, and as the place where he votes, pays his income taxes, and the like; thus, proof that the multimillionaire was a resident of Massachusetts brought several million dollars in inheritance taxes to that state; are the students at this college considered residents of the town and entitled to vote in town matters? In reference to a country, resident is preferred to inhabitant as a designation of an alien living in that country for a time and regarded as subject to certain taxes. "An alien actually present in the United States who is not a mere transient or sojourner is a resident of the United States for purposes of the income tax" (Income Tax Regulations, U. S.). Citizen, as here compared (see also CITIZEN, 2, for discussion of citizen of a country), applies to a resident of a city or town, especially to one of full age who enjoys the right to vote and other privileges; as, to call a mass meeting of citizens to protest the proposed legislation.

inherent. Inherent, ingrained, intrinsic, essential, constitutional come into comparison as meaning being a part, element, or quality of a thing's internal character or inmost being. That is inherent which is so deeply infixed in a thing that it is an element or quality resident in its very nature or essence; as, "certain inherent and indestructible qualities of the human mind" (Wordsworth); "Is the inferiority of the modern to the ancient languages, as a means of mental discipline, inherent in these tongues, or does it arise from causes that can be overcome?" (Grandgent); "Too much insistence on the fatalism inherent in their religion has reduced them [Arabs] to the condition of static lethargy... in which they now find themselves" (A. Huxley). That is ingrained (originally, dyed a fast red; now, technically, dyed in the fiber or yarn as distinguished from the woven fabric) which is wrought into the very fiber or texture of a person's being; as, an ingrained prejudice; "Attributable rather to the ingrained law-abidingness of the [French] people than to the perfection of the Paris police system" (Brownell); "her deeply ingrained habit of never letting herself go" (H. G. Wells). That is intrinsic which belongs to or is a property of a thing itself, as considered apart from all the external relations, connections, or conditions that affect its usefulness, value, significance, or the like; as, "When the subject has no intrinsic dignity, it must necessarily owe its attractions to artificial embellishments" (Johnson); "A fine big bird he [the turkey-cock] is... but there is no intrinsic beauty about him" (Jefferies); "The knowledge of geographical facts is useful, but without intrinsic intellectual value" (B. Russell). That is essential (see also ESSENTIAL, 2; NEEDFUL) which is an element of a thing's essence and therefore indissolubly involved in its very nature or being; as, "Certain essential differences between verse and prose" (Quiller-Couch); "that essential sweetness of the moor, born of the heather roots and the south-west wind" (Galsworthy). That is constitutional which is inherent in the physical structure or composition of the body or mind given one by nature; as, a constitutional infirmity; his vigor is constitutional; "thoughtful ones will assure you that happiness and unhappiness are constitutional, and have nothing to do with money" (Shaw).

Ana. *Innate, inborn, inbred, congenital: *inner, inward, internal: natural, typical, normal, *regular: integrated or integral (see corresponding verb INTEGRATE).

Ant. Adventitious. — Con. *Accidental, fortuitous, incidental: extraneous, foreign, alien, *extrinsic.

inheritance. 1 *Heritage, patrimony, birthright.

2 Inheritance, heredity are here compared only as denoting the acquisition of physical or mental characters from one's parents or ancestors. Inheritance, as here compared (see HERITAGE), denotes the act or state of receiving or deriving qualities, powers, physical peculiarities, or the like, by transmission from parent to offspring; as, "Instincts... acquired by habit in one generation, and then transmitted by inheritance in succeeding generations" (Darwin). Heredity may be used in place of inheritance, but more often it designates the biological law in accordance with which such transmission takes place; as, "These two, heredity and environment, are the master influences of the organic world" (H. Drummond).

inherited. Hereditary, inborn, inbred, *innate, congenital.

Ana. Transmitted, conveyed (see CARRY): generated, engendered, bred (see GENERATE).

Con. Acquired, gained, obtained, gotten (see GET).

inhibit. 1 *Forbid, prohibit, interdict, ban, enjoin.

Ana. *Prevent, preclude, obviate, avert, ward off: debar, rule out, *exclude: *hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar.

Ant. Allow. — Con. *Let, permit, suffer, leave.

2 *Restrain, curb, check, snaffle, bridle.

Ana. *Suppress, repress: *prevent, forestall: *arrest, check.

Ant. Animate (sense 2): activate (sense 2).

inhuman. Savage, barbarous, *fierce, truculent, ferocious, cruel, fell.

Ana. Pitiless, ruthless (see affirmative nouns at PITY): malign, malignant, *malicious, despicable: merciless, relentless, unrelenting, implacable, *grim: *fiendish, diabolical, devilish.

Ant. Humane. — Con. Benevolent, humanitarian, *charitable, altruistic, philanthropic: compassionate, *tender.

iniquitous. Nefarious, flagitious, *vicious, villainous, infamous, corrupt, degenerate.

Ana. Wicked, evil, ill, *bad: atrocious, heinous, *outrageous, monstrous: ungodly, godless, *irreligious.

Ant. Righteous. — Con. Virtuous, *moral, ethical, noble: just, *upright, honorable, honest.

initiate, v. 1 *Begin, commence, start, inaugurate.

Ana. *Found, establish, organize, institute.

Ant. Consummate. — Con. Effect, fulfill, execute, accomplish, achieve, *perform: *enforce, implement.

2 Initiate, induct, inaugurate, install (or instal), invest agree in meaning to put one through the processes, ceremonies, or other formalities regarded as essential to one's being admitted to one's duties as a member, an official, or the like. Initiate, as here compared (see also BEGIN), usually implies admission to some organization, cult, craft, or the like, especially to one requiring indoctrination in its mysteries or mysterious (often pseudo-mysterious) rites or ceremonies in the introduction of new members; as, to initiate the newly elected members of a college fraternity; "to initiate young people in the elements of physical science" (T. H. Huxley); to initiate a new reporter into the secrets of successful news gathering. Induct may often be used in place of initiate, especially when introduction under guidance is also implied; as, to induct a person into a new position or into the duties of a new position. But induct, as well as inaugurate, install, and invest may imply a formal or ceremonious endowing of a person with the powers and prerogatives of an office or post; as, to induct the new governor of a colony. Induct is used technically of clergymen who are put in possession of a benefice or living, or of officials who are established in their office with appropriate rites or ceremonies; as, to induct the new rector of a parish; the new superintendent of schools was inducted into office at last night's meeting of the board of education. Inaugurate (see also BEGIN) usually implies more formal and dignified ceremonies and much more publicity than induct; as, to inaugurate the president of the United States; to inaugurate the new president of the university. Install etymologically implies an establishing in a stall or seat; in both literal and figurative use, it implies induction into an office associated with a seat; as, to install the officers of a society; to install a canon of a cathedral; to install a bishop as the archbishop of his new diocese. The term also may be used in reference to persons who are formally or comfortably seated (as, to install the guest of honor in the most comfortable of their chairs; to install the tottering old lady in a chair by the fireside); it is also the only one of these terms which may be used (in the meaning here discussed) in reference to things as well as to persons (as, to install new machinery in a factory; to install electric light fixtures). Invest (for fuller treatment of this sense see СЛОТЯ) usually implies a clothing with the robes or other insignia of an office and, by extension, with the powers of that office. It often also implies a ceremony (as, to invest a king with his crown) but it may suggest only the addition of powers that come to one on one's induction into a position or office (as, "By the constitution of the United States the president is invested with certain important political powers"—Ch. Just. Marshall).

Ana. Introduce, admit, *enter.

Con. *Eject, oust, expel, dismiss: *exclude, eliminate, disbar, blackball, shut out: divest, *strip.

Initiative. Referendum, *mandate, plebiscite.

Injunction. *Command, order, bidding, behest, mandate, dictate.

Ana. Instruction, direction, charging or charge (see corresponding verbs at COMMAND): warning (see WARN): precept, rule, regulation, *law, statute, ordinance, canon.

Injure. Injure, harm, hurt, damage, impair, mar, spoil agree in meaning to affect someone or something so as to rob it of soundness, strength, or perfection, or to reduce its value, usefulness, or effectiveness. Injure, in its earliest and still not uncommon sense, implies the doing of an injustice or the wronging of another as by robbing him of his good name, of a rightful possession, or the like; in this sense, it often suggests intent or knowledge on the part of one that injures; as, "When have I injured thee? when done thee wrong?" (Shak.); "I would not injure him so much as to suppose the truth of it possible" (Austen). In later use, the verb came to imply the infliction not of injustice but of anything detrimental to one's appearance, health, success, comfort, or the like; as, a bullet injured his eye; "Is it best for you to injure your prospects for such a voluptuous, idle woman as that?" (Hardy); "Industrialism has been very injurious to art; may it not have injured religion also?" (Inge).

Harm often carries a stronger implication of inflicting annoyance, pain, suffering, or loss than injure; as, the boy is so gentle that he would not harm a fly; the circulation of the rumor greatly harmed his business; "For many have been harmed by speech, Through thinking, few or none" (Vaux); "For none of woman born Shall harm Macbeth" (Shak.). Hurt, a term in wide colloquial use, usually implies the infliction of a wound (figuratively as well as literally), not only to the body or feelings, but to anything capable of sustaining an injury that may or may not be cured or healed; often, it is used where injure is also possible; as, he was severely hurt by a falling brick; to hurt a friend's feelings; "It's damnable to have to hurt the people we love" (R. Macaulay); "a limitless desire to hurt and humiliate" (H. G. Wells). Damage implies an injury that results in lowered value or involves loss in effectiveness, attractiveness, efficiency, or the like; as, his automobile was damaged in a collision; the frost damaged the late crops; "her fair skin little damaged by time" (R. Macaulay). "Whatever psycho-analysts may say, the parental instinct is essentially different from the sex instinct, and is damaged by the intrusion of emotions appropriate to sex" (B. Russell). Impair, though coming close to damage in its meaning and often interchangeable with it, more frequently suggests deterioration or diminution as in value, strength, validity, or the like (as, a weak piece of evidence often impairs the strength of a good argument; his value as a candidate has been impaired by his hysterical attacks on his opponent) or a weakening as of a function or power of functioning (as, his eye was injured and his vision impaired). "Kindness that left an impression on my heart not yet impaired" (De Quincey); "Religion, always a principle of energy, in this new people is no way worn out or impaired" (Burke). Mar implies the infliction of an injury that disfigures or maims or involves the loss of a thing's perfection or well-being; as, "I pray you, mar no more trees with writing love-songs in their barks" (Shak.); "Striving to better, oft we mar what's well" (Shak.); "Plato asserts that a life of drudgery disfigures the body and mars and enervates the soul" (G. L. Dickinson). Spoil, as here compared (see also DECAY, INDULGE), carries a stronger implication of ruin than mar, for it suggests the operation of something that not only induces the impairment of strength, vigor, value, or the like, but also brings about their inevitable destruction; as, "Bitter shame hath spoiled the sweet world's taste" (Shak.); "a man who had spoiled his constitution with bad living" (Shaw); "When a child persistently interferes with other children or spoils their pleasures, the obvious punishment is banishment" (B. Russell).

Ana. *Deface, disfigure, disfigure: *deform, distort, contort: *afflict, torture, torment: *maim, cripple, mutilate, mangle, batter: *abuse, ill-treat, maltreat, outrage, mistreat, misuse.

Ant. Aid. — Con. *Help, assist: *benefit, profit, avail, bestead: preserve, conserve, *save.

Injury. 1 Injury, hurt, damage, harm, mischief are here compared as denoting the act or the result of doing to a person or thing something that causes loss, pain, or the like. Injury is the comprehensive term referable to any act or to any result of that act which involves a violation of a right or of health, freedom, soundness, and the like, or causes a partial or entire loss of something of value; as, an injury to one's eyes, to one's feelings, to one's reputation; to forgive an injury; an injury to a tree, to a watch. "The very essence of civil liberty . . . consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of laws, whenever he receives an injury" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Hurt applies literally to a physical injury such as a wound, a lesion, a contusion, or the like, that results from a hit, a stab, or other blow; as, "Get him to bed, and let his hurt be look'd to" (Shak.). Figuratively, hurt applies chiefly to an act or result that involves pain, suffering, or loss; thus, a person whose rights as an heir have been violated may be said to suffer an injury but not a hurt; a person whose reputation has been damaged by a false rumor has suffered both an injury to his business and a hurt to his feelings; a dentist in drilling a tooth may cause a hurt, but not an injury. But hurt may also imply, especially in archaic use, a disadvantage; as, "He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not" (Psalms xv. 4). Damage always applies to an injury that involves loss (usually calculable loss) as in property, in value, or in usefulness; as, the fire caused great damage to the house; to repair the damage done to the cathedral by the bombs. "Deliver Helen, and all damage else— As honour, loss of time, travail, expense . . . Shall be struck off" (Shak.). Harm (usually without an article) is refer-able to any evil that is or may be suffered or sustained to one's injury; often it suggests suffering such as grief, shame, or the like, but this connotation is far from invariable; as, "Do thyself no harm" (Acts xvi. 28); I meant no harm; to put one out of harm's way. "Almost every evening he saw Lucy. The inexperienced little wife apprehended no harm in his visits" (Meredith). Mischief carries a far stronger reference to the person or thing that works harm or is capable of inflicting injury; in fact, it applies either to the harm or injury as the work of such an agent or agency (as, "We don't begin to imagine all the mischief it [the war] is going to do"—H. G. Wells; "That's the mischief of the Modernists. . . . They don't claim that the Divine revelation has been supplanted or even added to, but that it has been amplified"—C. MacKenzie), or to the person or thing which serves as a cause of harm, vexation, or the like (as, "This power [of erecting such buildings as one pleases on one's own property] . . . may, we presume, be restrained, if exercised so as to produce a public mischief"—Ch. Just. Marshall). Ana. *Distress, suffering, agony, misery: *pain, pang: violation, transgression, trespass, infringement (see BREACH): detriment (see corresponding adjective at PERNICIOUS): *evil, ill, bale.

2 Wrong, tort, *injustice, grievance.

Ana. See those at INJURY, 1.

injustice. Injustice, injury, wrong, tort, grievance are comparable, though not strictly synonymous, terms when they denote an act that inflicts undeserved damage, loss, or hardship on a person. Injustice is the general term applicable not only to any act which involves unfairness to another or a violation of his rights (as, "class-privileges which make injustices easy"—H. Spencer) but, as a collective noun, to all acts which come under this description (as, "[Galsworthy] flamed out against injustice because he was a lover of justice"—Bliss Perry). Injury, in this sense chiefly a legal term, applies to any injustice to a person for which the law allows an action to recover compensation or specific property, or both; thus, a person whose payment for services is wrongfully withheld suffers an injury in the legal sense of that word. Wrong is, in law, a more general term than injury for it applies not only to all injuries as just defined (private wrongs) but to any misdemeanors or crimes which affect the community (public wrongs) and which are punishable according to the criminal code. But in general use, wrong differs little from injustice, except in carrying a stronger connotation of flagrancy or of seriousness; as, to endure wrongs from their oppressors over a long period; "we are . . . steel to the very back. Yet wrong with wrongs more than our backs can bear" (Shak.). Tort is now almost exclusively a legal term, referable to any injury (as defined in law) except a breach of contract: it therefore always suggests a civil proceeding; as, to bring an action in tort; to get a judgment for tort. Grievance, which is a general rather than a legal term, applies to any circumstance or condition that, in the opinion of those affected, constitutes a wrong or that, in a lighter sense, gives one just grounds for complaint; as, "They sent to the King a statement of their grievances" (T. Keighley); "In an early state of society any kind of taxation is apt to be looked on as a grievance" (Freeman).

Ana. Damage, hurt, harm, mischief, *injury: infringement, trespass, transgression, violation, infraction, *breach: unfairness, inequiteness (see affirmative adjectives at FAIR).

Con. *Justice, equity.

innate. Innate, inborn, inbred, congenital, hereditary, inherited are not always synonymous terms, but they come into comparison because of their literal meaning: not acquired after birth but derived from one's inheritance or from conditions attending one's birth. Innate (the Latin term) and inborn (the Anglo-Saxon term) are often used without distinction. But innate (opposed to acquired) is frequently synonymous, in a broad sense, with inherent, essential, or constitutional, not only because it may apply to qualities, characters, or elements of an organism, organ, or the like, that are not inherited but belong to it as part of its nature or essence (thus, innate ideas are by definition ideas that exist in the mind as a result of its constitution and are therefore found wherever a mind exists), but because it may apply to elements or qualities, such as virtues or defects, which arise out of the very nature or character of a thing that has no life and therefore literally no birth (as, the innate defect of this plan; the innate tendency of a dictatorship to overreach itself). "I do not believe that a sense of justice is innate, but I have been astonished to see how quickly it can be created" (B. Russell). On the other hand, inborn, which is frequently synonymous with natural or native, retains more specific reference to that which is actually born in one or is so deep-seated as to seem to have been born in one; the term is therefore usually, but not invariably, applied to qualities or characters that are peculiar or distinctive, sometimes to the type, often to the individual; as, inborn aptitudes; his inborn ability to sing; an inborn love of country life. Inbred etymologically implies reference to breeding, or to any of the processes concerned with the generation, nourishment, and rearing of offspring; the term therefore is more readily applied to that which is deeply rooted or ingrained as a result of one's immediate parentage or the circumstances attending one's earliest education or training than to that which is constitutional or merely natural; as, an inbred love of freedom; an inbred feeling of superiority; "those inbred sentiments which are . . . the true supporters of all liberal and manly morals" (Burke). Congenital, in current English, applies chiefly to something which dates from the birth of the person, animal, or plant concerned; as, congenital hip disease; congenital blindness; congenital deafness; "the theory that what was acquired habit in the ancestor may become congenital tendency in the offspring" (W. James). Both hereditary and inherited apply to that which is the result of heredity; as, a hereditary, or an inherited, mental defect. Hereditary, however, and not inherited, applies usually to that which passes to one or is derived through inheritance; as, a hereditary office; "several hereditary enemies of the Olivares brothers" (Cather). In biology, congenital and hereditary are regarded as synonyms that are, however, clearly distinguishable, for congenital implies acquirement (as of a disease or an organic defect) during the development of the fetus in the womb and hereditary implies transmission (as of a tendency, a weakness, or the like) from an ancestor through the germ plasma; thus, a birthmark is a congenital blemish of the skin; the color of one's hair or of one's eyes is hereditary.

Ana. Constitutional, *inherent, intrinsic, essential, ingrained: *instinctive, intuitive: natural, typical, *regular, normal: *native, indigenous.

Ant. Acquired. — Con. *Accidental, adventitious, incidental, fortuitous: assumed, affected, feigned, simulated (see ASSUME): cultivated, fostered, nurtured (see NURSE).

inner. Inner, inward, inside, interior, internal, intestine (or intestinal) are here compared as adjectives meaning being or placed within something. Although in many cases interchangeable, they are more or less restricted in their applications and therefore clearly distinguished in their implications. Inner and, less frequently, inward may be used when spatial relations are implied, but inner often applies to that which is farther within or nearer the center (as, "[He] thrust them into the inner prison" — Acts xvi. 24; an inner room, the inner bark of a tree) and inward often applies to that which is hidden within (as, the inward organs of the body; the inward part of an apple is the core) or to that which moves to a point within (as, inward mails; the inward curve of a scroll). Both words apply also to that which is mental or spiritual, frequently with the added implication of something intimate, secret, or inaccessible; as, "the sense By which thy inner nature was apprised Of outward shows" (Shelley); the inner life; the Inner Light (in Quaker doctrine, a divine and guiding presence in the soul of each person); "Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day" (2 Corinthians iv. 16); "that inward eye Which is the bliss of solitude" (Wordsworth). Inside is used chiefly of spatial relations (as, an inside seat, the inside track) but it may be used with reference to persons who are so placed in their work or who have such contacts that they may be said to be figuratively inside a place or group (thus, inside work implies a contrast with field or road work; inside knowledge of a negotiation implies participation to some extent in that negotiation; so, inside employees; to have inside information of what is going on in a club). Interior and internal commonly suggest more abstract or technical, less intimate, relations than inner and inward. Interior frequently implies contrast with the exterior, or outer, limits of the thing itself; thus, the interior features of a country are by implication opposed to those of the coast or boundaries; interior decoration (as a profession) deals with the decoration and furnishing of the inside of a house or other building rather than with its outside; one's interior life is one's life as expressed in thoughts and aspirations rather than in outward activities. Internal implies contrast with that which lies beyond or outside of the outer limits of a thing; thus, internal evidence of a poem's authorship is gained from a study of the poem itself rather than from outside sources; the internal affairs of a country are its domestic, as opposed to its foreign, affairs (but cf. secretary of the interior, a cabinet official who has charge of internal affairs); internal medicine is that branch of medicine dealing with the diagnosis and treatment of diseases affecting the inward organs, such as the heart, lungs, stomach, liver, etc. Intestine (or the rarer intestinal), as here compared, is a close synonym of internal, applicable in current use only to that which may otherwise be described as domestic or civil (as opposed to foreign), with, however, the connotation of an evil or mischievous origin or nature; as, intestine difficulties in France were largely responsible for the defeat of that country in 1940; an intestine or intestinal (i.e., a civil) war.

Ana. Central, middle, focal, nuclear (see corresponding nouns at CENTER): intimate, close, *familiar; intrinsic, constitutional, essential, *inherent: *instinctive, intuitive: deep-seated, deep-rooted (see INVETERATE).

Ant. Outer. — Con. Outward, outside, exterior, external (see OUTER).

Innuendo. *Insinuation.

Ana. Hinting or hint, intimation, suggestion (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST): *implication, inference: allusion (see corresponding verb at REFER).

Inoculate. *Infuse, imbue, ingrain, leaven, suffuse.

Ana. Impregnate, saturate, interpenetrate, impregnate, *permeate, pervade: introduce, admit, *enter: instill, inculcate, infix, inseminate, *implant.

Inordinate. *Excessive, immoderate, exorbitant, extreme, extravagant.

Ana. *Irrational, unreasonable: *supererogatory, wanton, uncalled-for, gratuitous: *superfluous, surplus, extra.

Ant. Ordinate (rare): temperate. — Con. *Moderate: restrained, curbed, checked, inhibited (see RESTRAIN): *due, rightful, condign: *fair, just, equitable.

Inquest. Investigation, probe, *inquiry, inquisition, research.

Ana. Examination, inspection, scrutiny, audit (see under SCRUTINIZE): questioning, interrogation, catechizing, examining (see corresponding verbs at ASK).

Inquire or enquire. Query, question, *ask, interrogate, speer, catechize, quiz, examine.

Con. Reply, *answer, respond, rejoin, retort.

Inquiry or enquiry. Inquiry (or enquiry), inquisition, investigation, inquest, probe, research are here compared as meaning a search for truth, knowledge, or information. Inquiry is the most general of these terms, applicable to any such search regardless of the means (questioning, observation, experimentation, etc.) used or of the end in view; as, a letter of inquiry; to address an inquiry to the proper authorities; to make inquiries about a sick friend; "The passion for pure knowledge is to be gratified only through the scientific method of inquiry" (C. W. Eliot); "the True, which is the goal of all scientific and all philosophical inquiry" (Inge); "a primitive but effective police inquiry" (T. S. Eliot). Inquisition ordinarily carries heightened implications of searchingness and of penetration far below the surface to uncover what is concealed or withheld; as, to be subjected to an inquisition into one's motives; "the nicest inquisition of the microscope" (Burke). The term, however, is chiefly applied to a judicial inquiry aiming to unearth facts or conditions to support suspicions, charges, or the like: often, because it is applied historically both to a body of ecclesiastical (or sometimes, civil) officials engaged in ferreting out heretics or heresy, especially in the late Middle Ages and in the Reformation period, and to methods of inquiry pursued by such a body (as, for example, the Spanish Inquisition), the term not only in its specific sense but even in its general sense connotes relentless pursuit of a clue or of a suspect, and sometimes merciless and ruthless persecution. "When, as becomes a man who would prepare For such an arduous work, I through myself Make rigorous inquisition, the report Is often cheering" (Wordsworth). "What shall I do? Cenci must find me here, and I must bear The imperious inquisition of his looks As to what brought me hither" (Shelley). Investigation applies to an inquiry which has for its aim the uncovering of the facts and the establishment of the truth. In very precise use, it implies a systematic tracking down of something that one hopes to discover or needs to know, if true; as, an investigation of the causes of the prolonged depression; the bank never employs a clerk or teller without an investigation of his habits and record; senatorial committees of investigation. Inquest is now used rarely, even in a poetic or rhetorical context, in place of inquiry or inquisition, for it is commonly a legal term applying to an investigation by a jury and judge, and specifically to one conducted by a coroner and jury in order to determine the cause of a death when there is good ground for suspecting other than natural causes; as, when the rumors of murder became rife, the body was exhumed and an inquest held. Consequently, in general use, the term usually applies to an investigation that has some of the characteristics of a coroner's inquest, such as the determination of the grounds for an accusation or suspicion; as, "Remembering this [Ben Jonson's creative power], we turn to Mr. Gregory Smith's objection—that Jonson's characters lack the third dimension, have no life out of the theatrical existence in which they appear—and demand an inquest" (T. S. Eliot). Probe, which is chiefly an Americanism in this sense, applies to an investigation that searches deeply and extensively with the intent to detect wrongdoing, if any: it suggests methods of exploration comparable to a surgeon's probing for a bullet, a diseased condition, etc.; as, a legislative probe of banking activities. Research now applies chiefly to an inquiry or investigation which requires prolonged and careful study, especially of actual conditions or of primary sources of information. In precise use, it is restricted to inquiries or investigations carried on by scientists, historians, and other scholars, especially for the sake of uncovering new knowledge, of getting at the facts when these are not known, or of discovering laws of nature: the popular tendency to use it for any study leading to the writing of a résumé of facts or laws already known is consequently decried. "Research has shown and practice has established the futility of the charge that it was a usurpation when this Court undertook to declare an Act of Congress unconstitutional" (Justice Holmes). "Scientists who had done distinctive work in leprosy . . . laid down a set of principles for the guidance of leprosy research" (V. Heiser).

Insane. Insane, mad, crazy, crazed, demented, deranged, lunatic, maniac (or maniacal), wood, non compos mentis are here compared chiefly in their general or nontechnical senses (for senses of corresponding nouns used technically see INSANITY) and as meaning afflicted by or manifesting unsoundness of mind or an inability to control one's rational processes. Insane as applied in medicine, psychiatry, and law to persons, usually implies such unsoundness of mind that one does not recognize one's own condition or is not responsible for one's actions; as, to be adjudged insane after a period of observation. In more general use, insane implies utter folly or irrationality; the person (or more often, the act or utterance) so described is, by implication, governed by blind passion, senselessness, or the like; as, "Day after day he would seek his dear mistress, pour insane hopes, supplications, rhapsodies, raptures, into her ear" (Thackeray); "insane spite" (Shaw); "Now that wars . . . have become far more horrible and . . . insane" (Inge). Mad usually implies more frenzy than insane and therefore carries a stronger suggestion of wildness, rabidness, raving, or complete loss of self-control; as, "O, let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heaven! Keep me in temper: I would not be mad!" (Shak.); "A mad pleasure in the prospect of wreaking vengeance on the villain who had laid the trap for him" (Meredith); "And then to hear a dead man chatter Is enough to drive one mad" (Tennyson). Crazy (etymologically, broken or shattered) often, especially in its oldest sense, suggests a breakdown, especially a complete mental breakdown, such as may result from illness or old age; as, he has gone crazy; "We will bestow you in some better place, fitter for sickness and for crazy age" (Shak.). In current use, the term more often suggests a distraught or wild state of mind induced by some intense emotion such as anxiety, grief, joy, desire, excitement, or the like; as, "the lady in the gallery is half crazy with anxiety for St. George" (Shaw); "Somebody had shot a squirrel and he took on about it as though he had lost a child. I said then he was crazy" (S. Anderson). As applied to things such as schemes, projects, notions, or the like, crazy usually suggests that they are the product of a crackbrained mind; as, "no educated Socialist believes such crazy nonsense" (Shaw); who would pay such a crazy price for a book? Crazed is often used in place of crazy when a going crazy is implied; as, crazed with grief; he seems crazed of late. Demented and deranged are less colloquial than the preceding words and less rich in connotations; both terms, moreover, imply a change from mental soundness to unsoundness, demented commonly suggesting signs, such as profound apathy or incoherence in thought, speech, or action, which indicate deterioration of the mental powers (as, there was now no doubt that the sick man was demented), deranged (cf. derangement under ABERRATION, 2) suggesting a loss of mental balance or a state of mental disorder resulting from a functional disturbance of the brain or nervous system (as, he was temporarily deranged by the shock). Lunatic is usually far wider in its range of application than maniac. The former term is approximately the equivalent of insane, though it often retains from its earliest sense a suggestion of alternations between irrational and rational states of mind; as, "Persuade him that he hath been lunatic" (Shak.); "it is easier for an inferior dramatic poet to write poetry when he has a lunatic character to speak it, because . . . he is less tied down to relevance and ordinary sense" (T. S. Eliot). Maniac comes closer to mad, for it commonly (but not invariably) connotes violence, fury, raving, or the like; as, the maniac rage of the multitude; "the maniac dreamer; cruel . . . Is he with fear?" (Shelley). Wood is now obsolete or dialectal for mad or maniac; as, "Our hoste gan to swear as [if] he were wood" (Chaucer). Non compos mentis (Latin for "not sound of mind") is a legal term which specifies a state, but does not define the particular condition or kind, of mental unsoundness. It, especially in its shortened form non compos, is often used colloquially with similar indefiniteness.

Ana. *Irrational, unreasonable: distracted, bewildered (see PUZZLE, v.).

Ant. Sane. — Con. Sensible, judicious, *wise, sapient, prudent.

Insanity. Insanity, lunacy, psychosis, mania, dementia are here compared as the leading general terms denoting serious mental disorder. Insanity is a technical term of law rather than of medicine, although it has some use in medicine: in neither field is it strictly defined but is used as a general term to cover a wide variety of mental disorders, all of which have in common one characteristic—an unfitting of the afflicted individual to manage his own affairs or perform his social duties. Mental deficiency and delirious conditions are usually but not invariably excluded, the former because inborn and not acquired, the latter because temporary and not lasting. Since in law a person's sanity or insanity becomes an issue when he is charged with a crime or when his legal capacity to make a will or contract, to transfer property, or the like, is questioned, proof of insanity is tantamount to proof of his inability to act rationally and to understand the nature of his act and its natural consequences in affecting his rights, obligations, and liabilities. In general use, insanity is commonly distinguished from mental deficiency and from neuroses, and is applied chiefly to disorders involving loss of mind or mental derangement. Lunacy, a term derived from the adjective lunatic, still carries some suggestion of the implication inherent in the earliest meaning of lunatic—that of recurring periods dependent on changes of the moon. In popular use it often applies to a form of insanity that comes occasionally and manifests itself in madness and fury: the term, therefore, often implies spells of lucidity; as, "The terms of our estate may not endure Hazard so near us as doth hourly grow Out of his lunacies" (Shak.); "It's the tangle of good and badness; It's the lunacy linked with sanity Makes up, and mocks, humanity!" (A. Stringer). In Great Britain, lunacy was originally and still is, to a certain extent, used in place of insanity in law, and in practically the same sense as that given for insanity; as, a lunacy commission. Psychosis is the psychiatric term for any mental disease. It is preferred to insanity because of its lack of legal connotations, and to lunacy because of legal and popular connotations. Mania is now used in medicine and psychiatry for one of the spells of excitement or mental derangement that characterize certain mental diseases (for fuller treatment, see MANIA, 2). Dementia is also a technical term of psychiatry, implying a sharp contrast with mental deficiency, and applicable to any condition or disease that outwardly manifests a marked mental deterioration. It therefore covers practically all mental diseases that involve organic deterioration, not only those manifesting themselves in spells of excitement but those manifesting themselves in apathy, depression, flightiness, split personality (schizophrenia), and the like. Ana. Alienation, derangement, *aberration: frenzy, delirium, *mania, hysteria.

Con. Sensible, sane, judicious, *wise, prudent, sapient, sage: *rational, reasonable: *intelligent, quick-witted, knowing, alert.

insensible. 1 Insensible, insensitive, impassible, anesthetic (or anaesthetic) agree in meaning unresponsive to stimuli or to external influences. Insensible usually implies total unresponsiveness, and therefore unawareness or unconsciousness, caused by any of a number of things, such as blunted powers of sensation, obtuseness of mind, apathy, or complete absorption in something else; as, "insensible to fatigue, to pleasure, and to pain" (Macaulay); so engrossed in his work that he was insensible of the flight of time. "Vulgar constitutions . . . insensible of a thousand things that fret and gall . . .

delicate people" (Berkeley). "This Court can be insensible neither to the magnitude nor delicacy of this question" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Insensitive, on the other hand, implies sluggishness in response or less than normal susceptibility; more specifically, it suggests dullness rather than acuteness of sensation or perception, thickness rather than thinness of skin, callousness rather than sympathy or compassion; as, an ear insensitive to changes of pitch; "he was insensitive to all kinds of discourtesy" (Joyce); insensitive to the misery of others. "Their genius for prose is a possession which involves an incapacity for poetry, an insensitiveness to what is intimately poetic" (Brownell). Impassible, in its historic and precise sense, implies absence of response because of incapacity for feeling or suffering. Originally derived from theology, where it was applied chiefly to the resurrected body united to its soul after the Last Judgment, the word is now rarely used except as confused with impassive or in reference to persons who by discipline have conquered the normal human susceptibility to pain or suffering (as, the Hindu striving for Nirvana renders himself impassible), or in reference to things in contrast with persons (or creatures) thought of as beings who through necessity of nature suffer pain or are susceptible to injury. "The language of strategy and politics is designed . . . to make it appear as though wars were not fought by individuals . . . but either by impersonal and therefore wholly non-moral and impassible forces, or else by personified abstractions" (A. Huxley). Anesthetic implies a deadening of the mind or senses (literally, by chloroform, ether, or the like; figuratively, by any agency having a similar effect) and, usually, an induced rather than a natural insensitiveness. "The intelligentsia . . . neither as anaesthetic to ideas as the plutocracy on the one hand nor as much the slaves of emotion as the proletariat on the other" (Mencken).

insinuation. Insinuation, innuendo agree in meaning covert suggestion or a covert allusion to something. Insinuation applies chiefly to any remark, comment, question, or the like, which conveys or seems to convey a hint or implication, often but not invariably one that is discreditable to the person at whom it is aimed; as, "Had he ever been a spy himself? No, he scorned the base insinuation" (Dickens); "By tacit agreement they ignored the remarks and insinuations of their acquaintances" (D. H. Lawrence). Innuendo more often applies to the method of covert suggestion than does insinuation, and when it applies to a definite instance, it is referable to meaningful smiles, glances, inflections, as well as to remarks; in both cases the term definitely implies a suggestion of something that is injurious to the reputation of the person concerned; as, "I prefer the most disagreeable certainties to hints and innuendos" (Byron); "in this play Middleton shows his interest... in innuendo and double meanings" (T. S. Eliot); "'He—eventually—married her.' There were volumes of innuendo in the way the 'eventually' was spaced, and each syllable given its due stress" (E. Wharton).

Ana. Hinting or hint, implying or implication, suggestion, intimation (see corresponding verbs at SUGGEST): *animadversion, aspersion, reflection: imputation, ascription (see corresponding verbs at ASCRIBE): allusion (see corresponding verb at REFER).

insipid. Insipid, vapid, flat, jejune, banal, wishy-washy, inane come into comparison when they mean devoid of qualities which give spirit, character, or substance to a thing. That is insipid which is without taste, or savor, or pungency, literally or figuratively; it is applied not only to food and drink which are so tasteless as to give no pleasure or stimulation to the palate (as, insipid substitutes for coffee; the insipid vegetable marrow), but also to persons and their utterances, their ideas, their contributions to art, and the like, which strike one as thin, weak, and characterless and leave one completely indifferent. "You have so much animation, which is exactly what Miss Andrews wants; for I must confess there is something amazingly insipid about her" (Austen). "Happiness is a wine of the rarest vintage, and seems insipid to a vulgar taste" (L. P. Smith). "The insipid veracity with which Crabbe used to report some of the most trite doings of Nature and of man" (C. E. Montague). That is vapid which has lost its characteristic taste, savor, or zest, literally or figuratively; it is applied by very discriminating writers only to that which has lost or seems to have lost its freshness, spirit, sparkle, or tang, and is stale, uninteresting, pointless, or the like. "The table beer was sour... the wine vapid" (Smollett). "The happy and joyous temper, which characterizes a fresh and confident faith, degenerates [when religion is decadent] into moroseness, or into... vapid hilarity" (Inge). That is flat which is so vapid that it seems dead or lifeless. The word is applied chiefly to that out of which all savor, sparkle, zest, or capacity for stimulating interest or pleasure has departed. "How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable. Seem to me all the uses of this world" (Shak.). "The sonnet became, in the hands of innumerable practitioners, a thing... of artificial sentiment, flat as the lees and dregs of wine" (Loves). That is jejune which is so devoid of substance or nutritive quality that it cannot satisfy the appetite (as, the jejune diet of the very poor); the word is occasionally used with reference to physical hunger, but is far more often employed with reference to the hunger of the mind, or the emotions, or the soul. In discerning use, it often connotes barrenness, aridity, or meagerness, in addition to its basic implications; only in loose use does it imply merely one of these qualities. "Mark... read through the sermon once more. It seemed more jejune than ever" (C. Mackenzie). "Naturalism is not science, but a jejune and self-contradictory philosophy" (Inge). That is banal which is so commonplace or so trite that it lacks all freshness or power to stimulate or appeal, and strikes one as flat or jejune. It often also carries one or more of various connotations such as vulgarity, tastelessness, pedestrianism, triviality, or platitudinism. "A simple person marvelously protected from vulgarity and the banal" (T. E. Brown). "Just the sort of banality, you know, one does come out with" (Arnold). "Mark found that... by attending to his parish duties without making himself too prominent by his enthusiasm or his originality, by preaching sermons of the most perfect banality... he could acquire himself satisfactorily in the eyes of the parochial world" (C. Mackenzie). That is wishy-washy (a somewhat colloquial term) in which the essential or characteristic qualities are so weak or diluted that it strikes one as extremely insipid or vapid; as, weak and wishy-washy tea; she is too wishy-washy to attract interesting friends. "Baudelaire's notion of beatitude certainly tended to the wishy-washy" (T. S. Eliot). That is inane (literally, void or empty) which is devoid of sense, significance, or point; as, "To us the book seems a very inane, tiresome, and purposeless affair" (Manchester Examiner); "In order to cover his embarrassment, he made some inane remark on the weather" (Conrad).

Ana. *Thin, slight, tenuous, rare: *weak, feeble: *tame, subdued: bland, mild, *soft.

Ant. Sapid: zestful. — Con. *Pungent, piquant, poignant, racy, spicy: *spirited, high-spirited, mettlesome, spunky, fiery, peppery, gingery: savory, saporous, tasty, *palatable, appetizing: stimulating, exciting, piquing, provoking or provocative (see corresponding verbs at PROVOKE).

insolent. Arrogant, overbearing, supercilious, disdainful, haughty, lordly. See PROUD.

Ana. Domineering, *masterful, imperious, peremptory, imperative: pompous, pretentious, ostentatious (see SHOWY): *dictatorial, magisterial: scornful, contemptuous (see corresponding nouns under DESPISE, v.).

Ant. Deferential. — Con. Submissive (see TAME): courteous, polite, *civil.

insolvency. Insolvency, bankruptcy, receivership, failure, suspension are not synonyms, but they are not always clearly distinguished when used to designate one of the situations in which a person, an institution, or a business unable to meet his (or its) financial obligations may find himself (or itself). Insolvency is the condition of a person or business that is insolvent, that is, unable to meet his or its debts because of insufficient funds or realizable assets; as, the estate was legally declared insolvent; unless the members pay their dues immediately, the organization faces insolvency. Bankruptcy is the state of an insolvent person or business that is bankrupt; that is, in the position of having his or its property administered under the law for the benefit of the creditors. Originally, bankruptcy was a state into which a trader who committed or was suspected of committing fraudulent acts was forced on petition of his creditors who wished to protect themselves; in present use, and as a result of changes in legislation in Great Britain and the United States since about the middle of the nineteenth century, it is also a state in which any insolvent person may find himself by his own petition or that of another. In general, the ends of bankruptcy today are to treat all creditors equitably and to effect a legal discharge of the obligations of the debtor. Receivership, like bankruptcy, implies administration of the property of a person or business under the law. It may or may not imply insolvency, but it always implies that the property is subject to litigation. Such property may be the estate of an incompetent or the assets of a business being liquidated, of a partnership being dissolved, or of a corporation undergoing reorganization, but it is perhaps more commonly the assets of a business which finds itself not necessarily insolvent but in a state of serious financial embarrassment. Failure (a popular term) is commonly applied to the discontinuance of a business brought about by insolvency or bankruptcy; suspension (also a popular term) to the temporary discontinuance of a business brought about by its insolvency or by its being under receivership.

inspiration. Inspiration, enthusiasm, afflatus, fury, furor (or furor), frenzy (or phrenzy), especially when qualified by divine or poetic, come into comparison as the commonest terms in English designating the involuntary element in the arts of expression for which the artist holds a power outside himself responsible. The words are often vaguely used even by good writers, and their meanings have been so affected by the dominating theology, philosophy, or opinion of the age, that it is almost impossible to fix them. Inspiration, in discriminating use which respects its etymology and its historical development, implies a preternatural enlightening and quickening of the mind, and connotes, especially when used by religious persons, a supernatural influence, such as the Holy Spirit. "Among such men there remains a... belief in what is vaguely called inspiration. They know by hard experience that there are days when their ideas flow freely and clearly, and days when they are dammed up damnably" (Mencken). Oftentimes, from its use in connection with the authorship of the Scriptures, inspiration implies supernatural or supranatural communication of knowledge. "Has the highest aspect of Greek religion ever been better expressed than by Wordsworth himself, to whom... it came by inspiration and not from books?" (Inge). Enthusiasm, a word derived from Greek which is etymologically the equivalent of the Latin word inspiration, was used, in the sense here considered, chiefly from the Renaissance to the eighteenth century. It characteristically implies an infusion of the divine power which compels utterance. Consequently, it came to be used not only of poets, but also of preachers, especially of unordained men in some of the new religious sects who felt a call to preaching. From their methods, the term in the 17th and 18th centuries acquired connotations of extravagance, fanaticism, and even lunacy, and so fell into disrepute. "Inspiration is a real feeling of the Divine Presence, and Enthusiasm a false one" (Shafesbury). Afflatus, now a bookish word, in most precise use applies to the inspiring influence rather than to the process or its effects. "The artists and poets who but once in their lives had known the divine afflatus, and touched the high level of the best" (H. James). In loose use, it, as the preceding terms, often names a quality rather than an influence or an operation. "There must be the inspiration, the enthusiasm, the afflatus, the glow; and they are here in Sidney's tractate" (Saintsbury). Fury, furor, and frenzy all emphasize the emotional excitement that attends artistic creation and the tendency of the artist to be carried out of himself. Fury and furor, found most often in the phrases "poetic fury or furor" (especially the Latin "furor poeticus") and "divine fury," do not, except in loose or humorous use, imply extreme agitation: they characteristically connote profound ecstasy induced by the poet's vision (or sometimes, conception). "They are so beloved of the Gods, that whatsoever they write, proceeds of a divine fury," (Sidney). "By turns they felt the glowing Mind, Disturb'd, delighted, rais'd, refin'd.... Filled with Fury, rapt, inspir'd" (Collins). Frenzy usually implies agitation rather than rapture, and stresses the imaginative or inventive element in creation more than any of the others. Sometimes it does not even connote an extraneous influence. "The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling, Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven" (Shak.).

instance, n. Instance, case, illustration, example, sample, specimen agree in meaning a concrete thing which has or manifests the qualities, characters, or nature of the type, the class, the group, or the like. Instance applies to any individual (person or thing) brought forth in support or disproof of a general statement (as, "He [T. H. Green] claims that great men have... been determinative of the course of things... in so far as their work was the vehicle of larger forces. His instance is Napoleon"—S. Alexander) or as a means of indicating the character of a genus, species, or the like (as, this novel is a good instance of his best work). Case (etymologically, a happening or occurrence), as here considered, applies only to an act, situation, condition, event, or the like, that shows the occurrence or the existence of something which is being considered, studied, investigated, or dealt with, as a whole or in general, or that exhibits it in actual operation; as, to cite cases of bribes given as payments for services never performed; students of the effects of poverty now base their conclusions on cases actually investigated; there has been no case of malaria in this section for three years; the professor cited the case of the Jukes family as an instance of the relation of heredity to crime, immorality, disease, and pauperism. Illustration applies only to an instance or a case adduced or cited as a means of throwing light upon what has been explained or discussed in general terms; as, to give several illustrations of the use of a word in a particular sense; Matthew Arnold used Milton's lines "which cost Ceres all that pain To seek her through the world" as an illustration of poetry of the highest quality. An example, as here compared (see MODEL), is a typical, representative, or illustrative instance or case; as, "If I were asked to define what this gentlemanliness is, I should say that it is only to be defined by examples" (Byron); it is impossible to study a writer without examples of his work. A sample (etymologically from the same original as example) is a part of a thing itself, designed to show the quality of the whole. "When I deal in wine, cloth, or cheese, I will give samples, but of verse never" (Cowper). A specimen is commonly representative of a class of things rather than of an individual object; but sample and specimen are often used without distinction; as, a collection of geological or botanical specimens; "The subjects being so various, no single passage can in all respects be a specimen of the book at large" (Cowper).

Ana. Proof, *reason, ground: *evidence: particular, *item, detail instant, n. Instant, moment, minute, second, flash, trice, jiffy, twinkling, twinkle, split second come into comparison when they mean a particular point of time, usually, but not invariably, one of almost imperceptible duration. Instant and moment are often used interchangeably in this sense (as, the instant [or moment] he comes, let me know), but instant carries so much stronger a suggestion of infinitely small duration that it is better fitted than moment for contexts that imply urgency, extreme transiency, inconceivable swiftness, or the like; as, come this instant; he was not an instant too soon; it passed in an instant. Moment, on the other hand, is particularly serviceable when the word or the context carries the implication of a definitely apprehended, even though extremely brief, point of time; as, wait a moment; it was the finest moment of her life; I haven't had a moment to attend to it. "To us . . . the moment 8.17 A.M. means something . . . very important, if it happens to be the starting time of our daily train. To our ancestors, such an odd eccentric instant was without significance—did not even exist" (A. Huxley). Minute and second in technical use apply only to measured fractions of an hour, but in looser use and as here compared, minute, even more than moment, suggests an appreciable (though extremely short) duration of time, and second, quite as much as instant, suggests its imperceptible duration; as, "Who buys a minute's mirth to wait a week?" (Shak.); the train will start in a minute; I was gone only a minute; please hold this a second or two; I'll get it this second. Flash suggests duration comparable to that of a flash of lightning; the term is therefore often used when incredible speed in movement, action, thought, or the like, is implied; as, "The secret of the poor wretch's death was plain to me in a flash" (Kipling); "eyes that in a flash could pick out a friend . . . from a throng" (Calder). Trice (etymologically, a pull or a tug) implies a duration suggestive of, rather than equal to, the time it takes to haul up a sail, or the like. The word is found chiefly in the phrase in a trice, which is equivalent to immediately or directly; as, I'll be there in a trice. Jiffy, a colloquial term, is now more common than trice, which seems literary or affected; as, I'll be there in a jiffy. Twinkling and twinkle, often but not invariably with an added "of the eye," suggest the quickness of a wink or blink; as, "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye . . . the trumpet shall sound" (1 Corinthians xv. 52). Split second (literally, the fractional part of a second, usually one tenth of a second; as, the stop watch showed Smith the winner of the race by a split second) is a recently adopted phrase which heightens the implication of brevity as expressed by second; as, "Mr. Moon stood for one split second astonished" (Chasterton).

instantaneously. Instantly, immediately, *directly, forthwith, straightway, at once, anon, right away.

instantly. Immediately, instantaneously, *directly, forthwith, straightway, at once, anon, right away.

instigate. *Incite, abet, foment.

Ana. *Activate, actuate, motivate: *suggest, hint, insinuate: plan, plot, scheme (see under PLAN, n.).

instill or instil. Inculcate, *implant, insemiate, infix.

Ana. *Infuse, inoculate, imbue, ingrain, leaven: impregnate, *permeate, saturate, pervade, impenetrate, interpenetrate.

instinct. Intuition (see under INSTINCTIVE).

Ana. Incitement, impetus, *stimulus: impulse, spring, *motive: bent, turn, faculty, aptitude, knack, *gift.

instinctive. 1 Instinctive, intuitive are here compared because, in ordinary usage, they are frequently employed as close synonyms meaning having or manifesting the power to reach a conclusion or to apprehend truth without reasoning. Instinctive (for correct senses, see SPONTANEOUS, 1) is applicable only to something which seems to involve knowledge, conclusions, judgments, etc., that come quickly, when that thing is associated with instinct, or a tendency innate in the species rather than in the individual (thus, a reaction which is characteristic of man as a species, and which comes whether one wills it or not, or is aware of it or not, may be described as instinctive) or, permissively, with something almost as deep and native as instinct, such as inbred habit (as, an instinctive avoidance of excess; an instinctive comprehension of another's preference for privacy). But the emphasis in both these cases is on the lack of need for willing or thinking rather than, as in intuitive, upon the use of a specific power of the intellect, that is, intuition (see under REASON, 3), which enables one to reach knowledge or truth immediately, and not mediately as through inference from facts; as, "Women . . . judge rather by intuitive perceptions than by deliberate reasoning" (Lecky); "the intuitive concepts of space and time which we derive from individual experience" (Jeans); "His intuitive faculties were constantly cultivated at the expense of the rational process of the mind" (C. Mackenzie). But neither term is correctly applied to that which is known by clever guessing, conjecture, or through a "hunch."

Ana. *Innate, inborn, congenital: constitutional, *inherent, ingrained.

Ant. Reasoned.

Ana. *Work, labor, toil: *effort, exertion, trouble, pains: *power, energy, force, might: *action, deed, act.

insubordinate. Insubordinate, rebellious, mutinous, seditious, factious, contumacious come into comparison when meaning having or manifesting a spirit of defiance or indifference to constituted authority. Insubordinate in careful English is used only in reference to a person whose status is that of a subordinate, such as a member of a force, a crew, a staff, or other organized group under the control of a military or naval officer, a chief, a head, a master, or the like, who is responsible for their service as individuals and their discipline as a group: the term implies disobedience to orders or infraction of rules, in a particular instance or as a habit, and is therefore often used less strictly of one who will not submit to the discipline of a parent, a teacher, or the like; as, insubordinate sailors are confined in the warship's brig; the insubordinate soldiers will be disciplined; "Lady Blandish was still...decidedly insubordinate" (Meredith). Rebellious implies disaffection and insubordination: it may refer to a state of mind or to a temperamental tendency (as, the undisciplined are often rebellious in spirit), but more often it suggests organized resistance (as, rebellious troops; the rebellious acts of those who participated in the Boston Tea Party). Mutinous is a stronger and more derogatory term than rebellious (which may imply justifiable resistance) for it suggests the refusal to obey the lawful demands or commands of an officer in charge, especially a military, naval, or ship's officer, with the result that there is no longer discipline and efficiency in the group or, if the mutiny is successful, that a new control is set up; as, the master ordered the mutinous sailors put into irons; the mutinous members of the crew finally gained the upper hand. Mutinous is also frequently applied to passions, winds, waters, and the like, that are exceedingly turbulent or uncontrollable; as, "I have...call'd forth the mutinous winds" (Shak.); "Mutinous passions, and conflicting fears" (Shelley). Seditious implies treasonable activities and often specifically a stirring up of discontent, or of opposition to or rebellion against the government; as, seditious societies; seditious writings. "A seditious preacher, who inculcated on his audience...the tyranny of artificial distinctions, and the abuses which had arisen" (Hume). Factious stresses the contentious, perverse, or turbulent provocation of party spirit or a tendency to break up into embittered and irreconcilable factions: only when it implies as a result the destruction of peace in the group as a whole does it suggest indifference to or defiance of constituted authority: very frequently it suggests the opposition of legislative groups or blocs to the government; as, a factious race; the government's plan to entertain the proposals for peace aroused the factious spirit of the parliament; "factious fury" (Burke); "Florence...sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind, wearing her soul out by factious struggles" (Mrs. Oliphant). Contumacious is found chiefly in legal and ecclesiastical use. It implies persistent, willful, or open disobedience of the orders of a court or of one's superiors:

often, it specifically suggests contempt of court by a bold refusal to obey a summons or subpoena, or open and stubborn defiance of laws or orders that for one reason or other are seldom disobeyed; as, "On her refusal to appear in person or by her attorney, she was pronounced contumacious" (J. Lingard). "Magistrates and populace were incensed at a refusal [by Fox the Quaker] of customary marks of courtesy and respect for the laws, which in their eyes was purely contumacious" (Inge).

Ana. Recalcitrant, refractory, *unruly, ungovernable, intractable.

Con. *Obedient, amenable, docile, tractable, biddable: submissive, subdued, *tame.

insult, v. Affront, outrage, *offend.

Ana. Humiliate, humble, debase, degrade, *abase: flout, *scoff, jeer, gird, gibe, flier, sneer: mock, taunt, deride, *ridicule.

Ant. Honor. — Con. Gratify, *please: respect, esteem, admire (see under REGARD, n.).

insult, n. *Affront, indignity.

Ana. *Abuse, vituperation, invective, obloquy: dishonor, shame, ignominy, opprobrium, *disgrace: insolence, superciliousness, disdainfulness (see corresponding adjectives at PROUD): contempt, despite, scorn, disdain (see under DESPISE).

Con. *Compliment, flattery, adulation: *honor, homage, obeisance, deference, reverence.

insurance. Insurance, assurance are both used in reference to the business of guaranteeing compensation for loss or damage by a specified contingent event such as fire, death, shipwreck, and the like. Insurance is the common and customary term in the United States and the popular term in British use, not only for any business of this character but for the policies issued and the protection afforded by a company engaging in this business. Assurance is not infrequent in British use, especially in the titles of some of the older concerns engaged in the business of insuring lives. Some British writers on this subject regard this latter distinction of importance and use assurance for contracts (or the business involving the issuing of such contracts) taking risks on lives, and insurance for those guaranteeing indemnification against loss by fire, perils of the sea, war, and the like. Others make a distinction on etymological grounds, for which there is more or less justification in the historical use of these words. By these persons, assurance is applied to the business of undertaking risks and to the contracts issued in the course of such a business, insurance is applied to the protection sought and paid for by those who hold policies and to the policies they hold; as, one is in the assurance business; he wants insurance on his furniture; a company sells assurance; a person buys insurance. This distinction, however, is far from universally accepted.

insure. *Ensure, assure, secure.

Ana. Protect, shield, guard, safeguard (see DEFEND): indemnify, requite, compensate (see PAY, v.).

insurgent, n. *Rebel, iconoclast.

insurrection. Uprising, revolt, mutiny, *rebellion, revolution, Putsch.

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Tangible. — Con. Palpable. *perceptible, sensible, appreciable, ponderable: *material, physical, corporeal.

integrant, n. Component, *element, constituent, ingredient, factor.

integrate, v. Integrate, articulate, concatenate are synonyms only in their extended senses where they mean to join together a number of distinct things so that they move, operate, or function as a unit. The implications of these senses are probably more often found in the participial adjectives integrated, articulated (or articulate), concatenated, and in the derived nouns integration, articulation, concatenation, than in the finite verbs. Integrate [Latin integer, a whole] implies that the things combined (parts, elements, factors, details, etc.) are so intimately connected with each other that a perfect whole results. Usually it suggests a complete fusion or coalescence of particulars with loss therefore of their separate identities; as, the integration of races in the United States into a single people; in perception, we unconsciously integrate a vast number of details into a single visual image. Articulate [Latin articulus, a joint] also implies as its result a perfect whole, but it differs from integrate in implying no loss of identity or of distinctness of the things combined (usually parts, branches, departments, and the like) and in suggesting a connection between them that is found in its perfection in the skeletons of vertebrate animals, and especially in man. For articulate, as here considered (in the sense of joint, see articulation under JOINT, n.), implies organization in which each part fits into another in a manner comparable to the fitting into each other of two bones at a movable joint and a structure is built up that functions as a whole yet without loss of flexibility or distinctness in any of its component units or without any conflict between them; as, a perfectly articulated system of railroads. "Few people have definitely articulated philosophies of their own" (W. James). "In four years the principate had scarcely begun that process of articulation which was to make it one of the most complex and yet smooth-running systems of government known to history" (Buchan). Concatenate [Latin catena, a chain] suggests neither fusion nor organization, but a linking together of smaller units until figuratively a powerful chain is forged. It implies addition of one thing to another with cumulative effect; as, not one cause brings about war, but a concatenation of causes; the concatenated circumstantial evidence presented by the prosecutor was sufficient to offset the lack of direct evidence against the defendant. "Henchard...could not help thinking that the concatenation of events this evening had produced was the scheme of some sinister intelligence bent on punishing him" (Hardy).

Ana. *Unite, combine, conjoin: unify, consolidate, concentrate, *compact: fuse, blend, merge, coalesce (see MIX): organize, systematize (see ORDER).

Ant. Disintegrate. — Con. Crumble, decompose (see DECAY): dissipate, disperse, *scatter: *analyze, resolve, break down.

integrated. Articulated, concatenated. See under INTEGRATE, v.

Ana. Unified, consolidated, concentrated (see COMPACT, v.): fused, blended, coalesced, merged (see MIX): whole, entire, intact, *perfect: organized, systematized (see ORDER, v.).

Ant. Disintegrated. integration. Articulation, concatenation. See under INTEGRATE, v.

Ana. Unification, consolidation, concentration (see corresponding verbs at COMPACT): integrity, union, *unity, solidarity.

integrity. 1 *Unity, solidarity, union.

Ana. Wholeness, entirety, perfection, intactness (see corresponding adjectives at PERFECT): consummateness (see corresponding adjective at CONSUMMATE): purity, simplicity, absoluteness (see corresponding adjectives at PURE).

2 Probity, *honesty, honor.

Ana. Uprightness, justness, conscientiousness, scrupulousness or scrupulosity (see corresponding adjectives at UPRIGHT): rectitude, virtue, *goodness, morality: *truth, veracity, verity.

Ant. Duplicity. — Con. *Deceit, dissimulation, guile: dishonesty, deceitfulness, mendaciousness or mendacity (see corresponding adjectives at DISHONEST).

intellect. *Mind, soul, psyche, brain, brains, intelligence, wit, wits.

Ana. *Reason, understanding, intuition.

intellectual. *Mental, psychic, cerebral, intelligent.

Ant. Carnal. — Con. *Bodily, physical, corporeal, corporal, somatic: fleshly, animal, animalistic, sensual (see CARNAL).

intelligence. 1 Brain, brains, *mind, intellect, soul, psyche, wit, wits.

Ana. *Sense, judgment, wisdom, gumption: *discernment, penetration, insight, acumen: sagaciousness or sagacity, perspicaciousness or perspicacity, astuteness, shrewdness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD).

2 *News, tidings, advice.

intelligencer. *Emissary, spy, secret-service agent, scout.

intelligent. 1 Intellectual, *mental, cerebral, psychic.

2 Intelligent, clever, alert, quick-witted, bright, smart, knowing, brilliant come into comparison when they mean intellectually keen. Intelligent stresses the power to use one's mind successfully when demands are made upon it, as in understanding the new or abstruse, or in meeting and solving problems, especially novel practical problems. "Intelligent self-interest should lead to a careful consideration of what the road [that is, railroad] is able to do without ruin" (Justice Holmes). "The moral obligation to be intelligent" (J. Erskine). Clever implies native ability or aptness more strongly than intelligent; it also emphasizes quickness in apprehension rather than fullness of comprehension, and dexterity or adroitness, rather than soundness, in the mental processes. "The poor girl liked to be thought clever, but she hated to be thought bookish" (H. James). "He could deal competently with effects, but he was not clever at assigning causes" (M. Sinclair). Oftentimes the word suggests a contrast with more substantial qualities. "Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever" (Kingsley). "A clever boy trains for an examination as he trains for a race; and goes out of training as fast as possible when it is over" (Inge). Alert stresses quickness in the mental processes, especially in comprehending a situation. Though often applied to persons, it is chiefly used to characterize minds, habits of thought, and the like. "She seemed more feeble in body...but her mind was still alert" (L. P. Smith). Quick-witted also implies quickness in thinking but in addition it suggests promptness in action as in an emergency, or in response, as to a challenge, in conversation or in debate. "We are not a quick-witted race; and we have succeeded...by dint of a kind of instinct for improvising the right course of action" (Inge). Bright and smart have a colloquial rather than a literary flavor, and are more often applied to young or promising persons than to those who are proficient or of proved intelligence. Bright suggests cleverness that is apparent as in liveness

of mind or in liveliness of talk or manner. "I began life unluckily by being the wag and bright fellow at school" (Irving). Smart, too, implies cleverness but it also suggests alertness or quick-wittedness that enables one to get ahead. "I wish I was smart enough to invent something and maybe get rich" (S. Anderson). "The master said he was the smartest lad in the school" (D. H. Lawrence). Both words are used ironically, bright (less frequently than smart) then implying dullness or stupidity and smart, pertness, facetiousness, or sometimes trickery or duplicity; as, a smart aleck; given to making smart retorts. "I am Hector's father, as this bright Britisher would have guessed in the course of another hour or two" (Shaw). "'I do not want,' he says, 'to be converted by a smart syllogism'" (Birrell). "The smart work is hidden in the wording of the Monroe doctrine" (Emporia Gazette). Knowing carries a stronger implication than any of the preceding terms of the possession of the knowledge that is necessary or useful under the circumstances, but it also carries a strong connotation of mental alertness and of ability to deal competently with situations as they arise; as, "My master... was thought the knowingest gentleman about court" (Lytton); "He is the most knowing of all living men" (Jowett). Occasionally the term further suggests a less agreeable quality such as sophistication, secretiveness, or the possession of knowledge of others' secrets; as, a knowing wink; "I don't quite like this chit. She looks knowing" (Goldsmith); "A face so mean, so knowing" (Thackeray). Brilliant occurs frequently in current writing and speech when one wishes to add to intelligent or to any other of the terms here considered (when used without derogatory connotations) the implication of unusual and outstanding keenness of intellect that manifests itself so openly or effectively as to excite admiration: the term usually suggests an opposition to qualities that characterize one whose mind works more slowly or cautiously; as, a brilliant mathematician; "John Todhunter was esteemed a shrewd sensible man—only not brilliant" (Meredith); "[Prescott's History of] the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella... was a brilliant performance, as any child could see and no scholar was ever to deny" (Van W. Brooks).

Ana. *Sharp, keen, acute: *shrewd, sagacious, perspicacious, astute: cunning, ingenious, adroit, *clever.

intend. Intend, mean, design, propose, purpose come into comparison when they signify to have in mind as an aim, end, or function. Intend implies that the mind is directed to some definite accomplishment or to the achievement of a definite end (as, to intend to write a book; "He did not intend annexation of Italian land" — Belloc; "that He [God] intended joy, of a purified and elevated kind, to be the ultimate inheritance of His creatures" — A. C. Benson) or is bent upon some person or some thing (such as a thing invented, written, or otherwise produced) serving a certain purpose or use, fulfilling a certain destiny, or the like (as, the younger son is intended for the church; "a play, Intended for great Theseus' nuptial-day" — Shak.; "a strong suspicion that the new instrument with which Einstein has presented the mathematicians is being put to uses for which it was never intended" — Inge). Intend often implies an aim to express a definite idea by a given word or phrase; as, the word, because of its connotations, says more than I intend; just what the framers of the constitution intended by the phrase "to be twice put in jeopardy" is still a matter of some doubt. "Whenever this word [i.e.,

"mob"] occurs in our writings, it intends persons without virtue or sense, in all stations" (Fielding). This sense of intend is now more often carried by mean, signify, or denote (see MEAN, 2). On the other hand, mean still often carries a denotation close to that of the usual sense of intend: it does not, however, convey so clear an implication of determination to effect one's end as does intend and, sometimes, it implies little more than volition or decision; as, he always means to work harder (cf. well-meaning); he intends to succeed. "I don't mean to defend Charles' errors, but before I form my judgment of either of them I intend to make a trial of their hearts" (Sheridan). "He shouldn't have done it, of course; but he was thoughtless. And he meant to pay the money back" (Deland). Design (as here compared: see under PLAN, n.) usually stresses forethought and deliberation in arriving at an intention: on the other hand, it carries no suggestion of probable or improbable success; as, "the American people... did not design to make their government dependent on the States" (Ch. Just. Marshall); "At twelve we met to give an account to one another of what we had done since our last meeting and what we designed to do before our next" (S. M. Crothers); "the great drive that was apparently designed to reach Calais" (H. G. Wells). Often, the term also implies scheming or contriving, especially by underhand means (cf. the adjective designing), in an attempt to effect what is designed; as, "your father and sister, in their civilities and invitations, were designing a match between the heir and the young lady" (Austen); "Ah! Friend! to dazzle let the vain design; To raise the thought, and touch the heart be thine!" (Pope). Propose implies a declaration of one's intention or a setting it clearly before oneself or others. It therefore usually connotes clear definition or open avowal; as, what do you propose to do when your funds run out? "I propose to describe the circumstances under which Richelieu worked when he produced and realised the centralised nation of to-day" (Belloc); "The child was not clandestine; she proposed returning in the same open way. She also proposed telling Mr. King that she would make no more promises" (Deland); "What is reached in the end may be better or worse than what was proposed" (W. James). Purpose differs little from propose except in carrying a somewhat stronger implication of determination to effect or achieve one's intention, and in occasionally connoting clearer definition in one's own mind; as, "he who has so little knowledge of human nature as to seek happiness by changing anything but his own disposition, will waste his life in fruitless efforts and multiply the griefs which he purposes to remove" (Johnson); "I purpose to write the history of England from the accession of King James the Second" (Macaulay).

Ana. *Aim, aspire: *attempt, try, endeavor, strive, essay, assay: plan, design, scheme, plot (see under PLAN, n.).

intense. Intense, vehement are often used interchangeably when they mean extreme in degree, pitch, power, fury, or the like; thus, the average writer or speaker sees little difference between intense rage and vehement rage or between an intense prejudice and a vehement prejudice. Nevertheless, precise writers and speakers use these words in ways that reveal many differences in implications and applications. Intense is preferred when the idea of great depth, as in quality, in reach, in effect, or the like, is to be implied. In such use, intense may apply to thought or thoughts, to feeling or emotion, to any activity, or to any outstanding quality or character such as color, brilliancy, tone, or the like; as, intense concentration; intense hatred; an intense red; "the intense blue sky" (L. P. Smith); intense silence; an intense friendship; "The intense, clear, star-sown vault of heaven" (Arnold); "work so intense that it takes the last inch out of the workers" (Shaw). When the term is applied directly to a person or his mood or temper, it usually carries a suggestion of tenseness as well as of deep feeling, effort, ambition, or the like; as, "the intense Dante is intense in all things" (Carlyle); "He was in such an intense mood that humor was entirely barred out" (M. Wilkins); "an intense and voluble mother, and three blowsy daughters who imitated her" (E. Wharton); "One of the inspired moments that come to intense natures, working intensely, had come to him" (S. Anderson). Vehement is preferred when a manifestation of abundant energy is to be suggested or where the ardency, violence, or driving force of the thing so described are to be connoted. "Jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame" (Song of Solomon viii. 6). "He cursed himself like a less scrupulous Job, as a vehement man will do when he loses self-respect, the last mental prop under poverty" (Hardy). "The most vehement scorn of cowardly compromise with things base" (J. R. Lowell). "The temper of monists has been so vehement, as almost at times to be convulsive" (W. James). "Lastly, if vehement assertions on the one side have driven me into too vehement dissent on the other, I crave pardon" (Quiller-Couch).

Ana. Extreme, immoderate, *excessive, inordinate: heightened, intensified, enhanced, aggravated (see INTENSIFY): *impassioned, ardent, fervent, fervid, perverted, passionate.

Ant. Subdued (colors, lights, emotions, etc.).

intensify. Intensify, aggravate, heighten, enhance agree in meaning to increase markedly in degree or measure. Intensify implies a deepening or strengthening of a thing, or especially of its characteristic quality, until it is noticeably or abnormally deep or strong; as, a clear atmosphere intensifies the blue of the sky; frustration only served to intensify his desire (or the urgency of his desire). "Historical circumstances of recent years have conspired to intensify Nationalism" (A. Huxley). "The unknown labyrinth around... seemed to intensify his sense of loneliness" (G. Eliot). Aggravate implies a manifest increase in seriousness or gravity without, however, conveying any suggestion of an approach to an extreme. The word is most often used in reference to something that is evil or unpleasant in itself or because of its qualities; as, false rumors that aggravate racial animosities. "Truth and frankness dispel difficulties, but the attempt at repressive moral discipline only aggravates them" (B. Russell). Heighten and enhance both imply a lifting or raising; heighten, however, tends to imply a lifting above the ordinary, the trite, the commonplace, and a consequent increase in sharpness and poignancy, and enhance a lifting above the norm or the average in desirability or attractiveness by the addition of something that increases the value, charm, prestige, or the like, of the thing enhanced; as, a dramatist heightens the effect of his scenes by rapidity of the action and he enhances his dialogue by the addition of witty repartee. "[Vitality] heightens pleasures and diminishes pains" (B. Russell). "A painter discards many trivial points of exactness, in order to heighten the truthfulness of a few fundamentals" (C. E. Montague). "Augustus sought... in every way to enhance its [the Roman Senate's] prestige and dignity" (Buchan).

Ana. Accentuate, emphasize, stress, accent (see corresponding nouns at EMPHASIS): magnify, aggrandize, *exalt.

Ant. Temper, attemper: mitigate, allay: abate (sense

2). — Con. *Moderate, qualify: alleviate, lighten, *relieve: reduce, lessen, diminish, *decrease.

intent, adj. Intent, engrossed, absorbed, rapt agree in meaning having one's mind or attention deeply fixed on something. Intent (etymologically, stretched toward) implies that one's mind, one's desires, or one's energies are eagerly bent on something: it therefore suggests the direction of the entire attention to that which engages it; as, "persons whose hearts are wholly bent toward pleasure, or intent upon gain" (Spectator); "the wise author intent on getting at truth" (Quiller-Couch); "Those who make poetry are intent, and rightly, on moulding it in living forms" (Lowes). Engrossed implies monopolization of one's attention either by a driving purpose or emotion or an eager interest or by the force or urgency of circumstances beyond one's control; as, "the dramatist engrossed in his creative job" (C. E. Montague); "alike when one's mind is deeply engrossed in congenial work, as well as when one is busy and distracted" (A. C. Benson). "These constitutional changes... were pushed through during and after the war by a group of busybodies who were not too much engrossed by the agony of their country to conduct a raging agitation in all parts of England" (Inge). Absorbed often differs little from engrossed in this sense, but in very precise use it commonly carries a stronger suggestion of the power of the thing on which the attention is fixed to capture one's attention and to hold it firmly so that there is difficulty in distracting it; as, "wholly absorbed in his preparations for saving souls in the gold camps—blind to everything else" (Cather). "Human beings are prone to become absorbed in themselves, unable to be interested in what they see and hear or in anything outside their own skins" (B. Russell). "Already they had read 'Farthest North.' Imogen, at eight years old, had read it, absorbed, breathless, intent, tongue clenched between teeth" (Macaulay). Rapt implies both extreme intentness and complete absorption, as though one were taken out of oneself or were in an ecstatic trance; as, "rapt in adoring contemplation" (F. W. Farrar); "He was so rapt that nothing else interested him" (Cather); "expounded the ultimate meaning of existence to the white, rapt faces of Humanity" (L. P. Smith). "In open-mouthed wonder the lama turned to this and that, and finally checked in rapt attention before a large alto-relief representing a coronation or apotheosis of the Lord Buddha" (Kipling). Ana. Attending or attentive, minding, watching (see corresponding verbs at TEND): *abstracted, preoccupied: concentrated (see COMPACT, v.): riveted (see SECURE, v.).

Ant. Distracted.

intent, n. *Intention, purpose, design, aim, end, object, objective, goal.

Ana. *Will, volition, conation: determination, *decision.

Ant. Accident. — Con. *Chance, hap, luck, fortune, hazard.

intention. Intention, intent, purpose, design, aim, end, object, objective, goal agree in meaning that which one proposes to accomplish or to attain by doing or making something, in distinction from that which prompts one (the motive), or from the activity itself (the means), or from the envisioned outcome (the effect). The first four of these words stress the clearly defined will to do or make something. Intention, however, often denotes little more than what one has in mind to do or to bring about. "She had not had an intention or a thought of going home" (Dickens). "Sir, Hell is paved with good intentions" (Johnson). "She had divined the intention behind her mother's tolerance" (Joyce). Intent, except in the phrase "to all intents and purposes," is chiefly legal; even in general use it suggests clearer formulation and greater deliberateness than intention. "To tell a lie... with intent to deceive, was a serious offence" (H. Ellis). "Behind my look You saw such unmistakable intent" (Millay). Purpose implies more settled determination or more resolution than intention; as, to have a purpose in life. "The missionary was here for a purpose, and he pressed his point" (Cather). "There lie youth and irresolution: here manhood and purpose" (Meredith). Design denoting intention is not always clearly distinguishable from design denoting plan for it retains the implications of careful ordering of details, of calculation, and sometimes of scheming; as, achieved rather by accident than by design. "I had suspected him of harbouring... sinister designs" (Hudson). "Should he find me here, [he] would discover my name, and perhaps my designs, to the rest of the family" (Goldsmith). Aim, the transitional word of this group of synonyms, implies a clear definition of that which one hopes to effect and a direction of one's efforts or energies to its attainment; thus, one who proposes to make the best of his powers and of his opportunities may be said to have a purpose in life: one who has clearly defined the mark he hopes to reach and determines his actions by it may be said to have an aim in life. "To [his trust] keeps faithful with a singleness of aim" (Wordsworth). "Her steadiness and courage in the pursuit of her aims" (J. R. Green). The last four words of this group, like aim, imply that what one does is affected by what one hopes to accomplish or attain. End stresses the determination of what one does by the effect one aims to produce or by the condition one hopes to attain; it usually connotes, therefore, the subordination of the activity (the means). "In every work regard the writer's End. Since none can compass more than they intend" (Pope). "The final end of Government is not to exert restraint but to do good" (R. Choate). "Vision should be a by-product of an activity, not its end" (Day Lewis). Object often equals end, but careful writers usually prefer it when the end is determined by a wish or a need rather than by principle or logical necessity; thus, one's object in writing is to earn money, but one's end is the edification of the reader; the object of a satire may be to discredit a person, but the end of satire is usually to expose follies or vices. Objective strongly implies attainability; it is chiefly applied to an end that is concrete and can be achieved as easily as a destination is reached by travel; as, the immediate objective of this project is flood control; its ultimate objective is the conservation of water power. Goal often evokes the image of one running a race; usually, it implies struggle and endurance of hardships and cessation of effort at attainment. "The Good, which is the goal of all moral endeavour" (Inge). "In the average man's mind... leisure is... a goal to strive for" (C. C. Furnas). "Life is real! Life is earnest! And the grave is not its goal" (Longfellow).

Ana. *Plan, design, scheme, project: desiring or desire, wishing or wish (see corresponding verbs at DESIRE).

Intentional. *Voluntary, deliberate, willful, willing.

Ana. Intended, meant, purposed, proposed (see INTEND): considered, premeditated, advised, studied, designed, *deliberate.

Anf. Instinctive. — Con. *Accidental, casual, fortuitous: inadvertent, thoughtless, *careless, heedless.

Intercalate. Interpolate, insert, *introduce, interpose, interject, insinuate.

Intercede. Mediate, intervene, *interpose, interfere.

Ana. Plead, petition, sue, pray (see under PRAYER).

Interchange, v. *Exchange, bandy, swap.

Ana. Trade, barter (see SELL): transpose, *reverse.

Intercourse. Intercourse, commerce, traffic, dealings, communication, communion, commune, conversation, converse, correspondence are here compared as meaning the connection established between persons or peoples through any medium that permits interchange such as of information, of opinions, of ideas, of goods, or the like. Intercourse, the commonest term of this group, usually means little more than this and requires a qualifying adjective to indicate the things interchanged or the medium permitting interchange; as, business intercourse; trade intercourse; spiritual intercourse; sexual intercourse; social intercourse. In ordinary use, when employed without qualification, intercourse means social intercourse, or the normal interchange of ideas, opinions, news, civilities, and the like, between one person or group and another with whom (or which) there are more or less intimate relations; as, "They had no... intercourse but what the commonest civility required. Once so much to each other! Now nothing!" (Austen); "the truth was, he could not be happy for long without human intercourse" (Cather); "the keen and animated intercourse with its exchange of disputable convictions" (A. Repplier). Commerce, which etymologically implies the interchange of goods by buying from and selling to each other (for this sense, see BUSINESS, 3), also is used in the more general sense of intercourse; as, "Commerce with the world has made him wiser" (Macaulay). In current use, the word tends to be restricted in its application to intercourse, through the spirit or mind, that involves an interchange of ideas, influences, and the like, without a necessary interchange of words (as, "our repair thither [i.e., to the churches] is especially for... commerce to be had between God and us"—Hooker; "How is poetry born in us? There is, I think, some commerce between the outer and an inner being"—G. W. Russell), or, in an evil sense, to illicit sexual intercourse (as, "What say ye to Sir Lancelot...? That commerce with the Queen... is it... whisper'd in the corner?"—Tennyson). Traffic (as here considered: see also BUSINESS, 3 & 4) is now somewhat rare in the sense of intercourse, but it is still used when connotations derived from the other senses are to be suggested, such as the interchange of goods, especially of tangible or material goods, or a rapid passing to and from the persons or things concerned. "The latter [the Stoic] believed in a World-Soul immanent in man, the former [the Epicurean] held that there was no traffic between the human and the divine" (Buchan). "This flippant traffic... with Clara" (D. H. Lawrence). Dealings is a more homely and a more suggestive term than intercourse, for it usually implies a closer connection, such as one with more familiarity or less formality, or one having for its object mutual or personal gain; as, they said they would have no dealings with the new neighbors; they suspected that he was having dealings with the enemy. "Being a woman is a terribly difficult trade since it consists principally of dealings with men" (Conrad). Communication is less general than any of the preceding terms because it implies intercourse based upon an interchange of words (spoken, written, cabled, or the like) or meaningful signals of some sort; as, there has been no communication with the island since the storm; communication even with their nearest neighbors was impossible when they were snowbound; the men in prison had communication with each other only by tapping on the wall; the enemy has broken off all communication between his prisoners and the outside world. Communion, or the poetic form commune, usually implies intercourse between those who are close in love or sympathy or in mutual understanding: both terms often suggest rather than imply spiritual intercourse or the absence of words; as, "the consummation of communion with God coincides with the final resolution of the sense of estrangement from Him" (Inge); "during all these middle years we had been growing closer in communion" (H. Ellis); "Delia sat down beside her, and their clasped hands lay upon the coverlet. They did not say much... their communion had no need of words" (E. Wharton); "An austere commune with the stars" (Masefield). Conversation has an archaic sense in which it is a close synonym of commerce (as, "contrariety frustrates... all the... peace of wedded conversation"—Millon) and a use (in the phrase "criminal conversation") in which it is equivalent to "sexual intercourse," and converse has a poetic sense in which it approaches communion, or commune (as, "With nature here, high converse hold"—Shenstone). In current use, however, both terms usually imply a free, and often lively, oral interchange of opinions, comments, news, or the like, between two or more persons: conversation often applies specifically to the act of interchanging opinions, etc., in talk, and converse, to the ideas, gossip, etc., involved in such conversation; as, the conversation went on briskly for an hour; "all useful exchange of converse in our daily life" (Quiller-Couch). Correspondence implies intercourse through an interchange of letters; as, there has been no let-up in their correspondence for fifty years; the business was conducted by correspondence.

interdict, n. *Excommunication, anathema.

interdict, v. Ban, inhibit, enjoin, *forbid, prohibit.

Ana. Proscribe (see SENTENCE): debar, rule out, *exclude: *restrain, curb, check, snaffle.

Ant. Sanction. — Con. *Let, allow, permit.

interfere. 1 *Interpose, intervene, mediate, intercede.

Ana. Impede, obstruct, block, *hinder, bar.

2 *Meddle, intermeddle, tamper.

Ana. Intrude, interlope, butt in, obtrude: molest, incommode, discommode, *inconvenience, trouble: thwart, foil, balk, baffle, *frustrate.

interior, adj. Inside, internal, *inner, inward, intestine.

Ana. Intimate, *familiar: spiritual (see HOLY): intrinsic, constitutional, *inherent.

Ant. Exterior. — Con. *Outer, outward, outside, external: extraneous, foreign, *extrinsic.

interject. *Introduce, interpolate, interpose, insert, intercalate, insinuate.

Ana. *Throw (in), cast (in), toss (in): obtrude, *intrude, interlope, butt in: comment, *remark, animadvert.

interlope. *Intrude, butt in, obtrude.

Ana. *Trespass, encroach, invade, entrench, infringe: interfere, *interpose, intervene.

intermeddle. *Meddle, interfere, tamper.

Ana. *Intrude, obtrude, butt in, interlope: entrench, encroach, *trespass, invade: molest (see INCONVENIENCE).

interminable. Unceasing, never-ending, *everlasting, endless.

Ana. Perpetual, *lasting, perdurable, permanent: incessant, *continual, continuous, constant: eternal, *infinite.

Con. *Intermittent, periodic: stopped, discontinued (see STOP): ended, terminated, closed, finished, completed (see CLOSE, v.).

intermit. Suspend, stay, *defer, postpone.

Ana. Interrupt, *arrest, check: *stop, discontinue: abate, reduce, lessen, *decrease.

Con. *Continue, persist: *repeat, iterate, reiterate.

intermittent. Intermittent, recurrent, periodic, alternate come into comparison when they mean recurring or reappearing more or less regularly but in interrupted sequence. That is intermittent which from time to time is omitted or disappears but always returns; as, an intermittent fever or pulse; an intermittent correspondence. "In most poets there is an intermittent conflict between the poetic self and the rest of the man" (Day Lewis). That is recurrent which returns or has the habit of returning after omission or disappearance. In contrast, intermittent stresses breaks in continuity and recurrent stresses repetition; as, intermittent attacks of appendicitis; recurrent attacks of appendicitis; an intermittent noise; a recurrent noise. That is periodic which is known to be recurrent at more or less fixed intervals over a long period of time and which, therefore, can be fairly accurately forecast; as, periodic epidemics; periodic appearances of a comet. That is alternate which is both intermittent and recurrent, each in turn with something else. When applied to two contrasted or different things, alternate implies a succession of one after the other; as, alternate smiles and tears; alternate work and play; alternate stripes of orange and green. When applied to things of the same kind or description that follow each other in serial order, alternate means every other one; as, the class meets on alternate days of the week, beginning Tuesday; the alternate stripes are narrow and white.

Ana. Interrupted, checked, arrested (see ARREST, v.): *fitful, spasmodic: sporadic, occasional, *infrequent: discontinuing or discontinuous, stopping, quitting (see corresponding verbs at STOP).

Ant. Incessant, continual. — Con. Continuous, constant, perpetual (see CONTINUAL): *everlasting, unceasing, never-ending, interminable.

intern, v. *Imprison, immure, incarcerate, jail.

Ana. Confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit: *restrain, curb, check, snaffle: fetter, manacle, shackle, *hamper.

Con. Release, liberate, *free.

internal. Interior, intestine, *inner, inward, inside.

Ana. Intrinsic, constitutional, *inherent, essential.

Ant. External. — Con. Exterior, *outer, outward, outside: extraneous, *extrinsic, foreign, alien.

internuncio. Nuncio, legate, *ambassador, minister, envoy.

interpenetrate. Impenetrable, penetrate, *permeate, pervade, impregnate, saturate.

Ana. See those at IMPENETRABLE.

interpolate. Insert, intercalate, *introduce, insinuate, interpose, interject.

Ana. *Enter, introduce, admit: *intrude, interlope: *add, superadd, annex, append.

Con. Delete, dele, expunge, *erase, cancel.

interpose. 1 Interject, *introduce, insert, insinuate, interpolate, intercalate.

Ana. *Throw (in), toss (in), cast (in): *intrude, obtrude: *push (in), shove (in), thrust (in).

2 Interpose, interfere, intervene, mediate, intercede come into comparison because they all basically mean to come or to go between two persons, two things, or a person and thing. Interpose (as here considered: see also INTRODUCE, 2) may be used in place of any of the succeeding words largely because it carries no further implications, except as these are derived from the context, but it is now used intransitively chiefly in reference to persons; as, "I listened... to this dispute, and at length interposed once more on the old man's side" (Hudson); "Our host... interposed and forbade the experiment, pleading at the same time for a change of subject" (Shaw). Interfere (as here compared: see also MEDDLE) implies a getting in the way of a person or thing as by crossing his or its path or, more often, by creating a condition that hinders his movement, activity, view, or the like, or its free operation or full effectiveness; as, "Parliament interfered to protect employers against their labourers" (Froude); the atmospheric disturbance interfered with radio reception of the speech; "wooden palings that did not interfere with a wide view" (C. Mac- kensie). Intervene may be used with reference to anything that interposes itself or is interposed between things as in space or time (as, "There still intervenes a narrow space between the last house of London and the ancient Forest Hall"—Jefferies; a long period intervened between the declaration of war and the beginning of hostilities), or between persons (as, to intervene between two persons engaged in a fight; to intervene between the warring groups with a plea for conciliation), or between a person and his interests, work, or the like (as, "the trained self-consciousness, which... intervenes between the poet's moods and his poetry"—Day Lewis). Mediate often specifically implies intervention between those who are hostile, antagonistic, or otherwise opposed to each other, for the sake of reconciling them or settling their difficulties; mediate usually implies, as intervene may or may not imply, an interest in both sides or freedom from bias toward either side; as, in Christian belief, Christ mediates between God and the sinner; "Bacon attempted to mediate between his friend [the earl of Essex] and the Queen" (Macaulay); "Philosophy tries to mediate between them [religion, science, art], and the task has so far been beyond its powers" (Inge). But mediate may also be used abstractly in reference to something that lies between extremes or contradictories and effects either their union or a transition between them; as, "The problem of mediating between the two terms [that is, "the shapely" and "the vital" as the dual elements of beauty]... is one that may be solved in innumerable ways" (Babbitt). Intercede implies intervention on another's (usually an offender's) behalf and the use of one's good offices in imploring mercy or forgiveness for him from the one who has been injured or offended; as, "For each at utter need — True comrade and true foe — Madonna, intercede!" (Kipling); the Duchess of Aiguillon interceded for Marie de Médicis with Richelieu.

Ana. *Intrude, butt in, interlope: *meddle, intermeddle: interrupt (see ARREST).

Interpret. Elucidate, construe, *explain, expound, explicate.

Ana. Illustrate, *exemplify: gloss, *annotate: comment, commentate (see REMARK, v.).

Con. Distort, contort, *deform: *misrepresent: *mistake, confuse, confound.

Interrogate. Question, catechize, quiz, examine, *ask, query, inquire, spear.

Con. *Answer, reply, respond, rejoin, retort.

Interrupt. *Arrest, check.

Ana. Suspend, stay, intermit, *defer, postpone: *intrude, obtrude, interlope, butt in: interfere, *interpose, intervene.

Interstice. *Aperture, orifice.

Intervene. *Interpose, mediate, intercede, interfere.

Ana. *Separate, part, divide, sever: *intrude, interlope, butt in, obtrude.

Intestine, intestinal. Internal, *inner, interior, inside.

Ant. Foreign. — Con. External, *outer, exterior, outside, outward: extraneous, alien, *extrinsic.

Intimate, v. *Suggest, imply, hint, insinuate.

Ana. *Indicate, betoken, attest, bespeak: allude, advert, *refer.

Con. *Express, voice, utter, vent, air: declare, *assert, affirm, aver, avouch: *suppress, repress: conceal, *hide.

Intimate, adj. *Familiar, close, confidential, chummy, thick.

Ana. *Nearest, next: devoted, fond, affectionate, *loving: *secret, privy: friendly, neighborly (see AMICABLE): companionable, convivial, *social, hospitable, co-operative.

Con. Formal, conventional, ceremonious, *ceremonial: *distant, remote.

Intimate, n. *Friend, confidant, acquaintance.

Ana. Comrade, companion, crony, pal, chum, buddy, *associate.

Ant. Stranger, outsider.

Intimidate. Intimidate, cow, bulldoze, bully, browbeat agree in meaning to frighten one into submission or obedience. Intimidate etymologically implies a making timid or fearful, but in current use it often suggests a display of force or the use of coercive measures as the cause of the fear and consequent submission; as, he would not be intimidated by vociferous public opposition to his plans; "A musket was, therefore, fired over them, but... they seemed rather to be provoked than intimidated" (Capt. Cook); "He wasn't lazy, he wasn't a fool, and he meant to be honest; but he was intimidated by that miserable sort of departmental life" (Cather). Cow implies reduction to a state where the spirit is broken or all courage is lost; as, "The lash of that woman... had cowed that helpless, gentle, noble spirit" (Thackeray); "One night he rescued a young leveret from a stoat, who seemed... inclined to give him battle for its prey until he cowed and defeated it with the glare of his electric torch" (H. G. Wells). Bulldoze, an American colloquialism (used originally of the intimidation of Negro voters, in Louisiana), implies the use of terroristic methods, such as threatening, displaying one's power, and the like, in asserting one's will or authority over others. "If he [President Hayes] has strength of character and tact, the bulldozers cannot subdue him... If he gives up Mr. Evarts... the bulldozers will subdue his cabinet" (N. Y. Herald). Bully implies intimidation through overbearing, swaggering threats or insults, but in school-boy use it usually suggests bulldozing of small boys by those who are larger or more aggressive; as, "suppose the cabman bullies you for double fare" (Shaw); "I know what you're going to call me... but I am not to be bullied by words" (L. P. Smith). Browbeat implies a cowering through arrogant, scornful, contemptuous, or insolent treatment; as, "He browbeat the informers against us, and treated their evidence with... little favour" (Fielding). "Who saw my old kind parents... too much trustful... Cheated, brow-beaten, stripped and starved, cast out Into the kennel" (Browning).

Ana. Terrorize, terrify, *frighten: hector, hound, ride, chevy, *bait, badger: coerce, *force, compel, constrain, oblige.

Con. *Coax, wheedle, cajole, blandish: persuade, prevail on or upon, *induce.

Intonation. *Inflection, accent.

Intoxicated. *Drunk, drunken, inebriate, inebriated, tipsy, tight.

Ana. Fuddled, befuddled, confused, bemuddled, muddled (see CONFUSE): maudlin, *sentimental.

Con. *Sober, temperate.

Intractable. *Unruly, ungovernable, refractory, recalcitrant, willful, headstrong.

Ana. Obstreperous, boisterous (see VOCIFEROUS): contumacious, rebellious, factious, *insubordinate: froward, perverse, *contrary, wayward, balky.

Ant. Tractable. — Con. *Obedient, docile, biddable, amenable: *tame, submissive, subdued: *compliant, acquiescent.

Intrench. Variant of ENTRENCH.

Intrepid. Dauntless, undaunted, valiant, valorous, doughty, bold, audacious, *brave, courageous.

Ana. Daring, venturesome, venturesome, *adventurous, temerarious, daredevil: mettlesome, high-spirited, *spirited, fiery: plucky, gritty (see corresponding nouns at FORTITUDE).

Con. *Cowardly, pusillanimous, craven, poltroon, dastardly: timorous, *timid: *fearful, apprehensive, afraid.

intricate. Complicated, involved, *complex, knotty.

Ana. Perplexing, puzzling, mystifying, bewildering (see PUZZLE, 9): tortuous, anfractuous (see WINDING): difficult, *hard, arduous.

Con. *Easy, simple, light, smooth, facile, effortless: obvious, plain, clear, patent, *evident, manifest.

intrigue, n. 1 Conspiracy, machination, *plot, complot, cabal, frame-up.

Ana. Scheme, design, *plan: stratagem, maneuver, ruse, artifice, *trick, feint.

2 Liaison, affair, affaire, *amour.

intrinsic. *Inherent, ingrained, constitutional, essential.

Ana. *Inner, inward, internal, interior, inside, intestine: *innate, inborn, inbred, congenital: natural, normal, typical, *regular.

Ant. Extrinsic. — Con. *Outer, outward, external, outside, exterior: adventitious, *accidental, incidental: added, annexed, appended, superadded (see ADD): extraneous, alien, foreign (see EXTRINSIC).

introduce. 1 *Enter, admit.

Ana. *Bring (in): induct, install, inaugurate (see INITIATE): instill, inculcate, infix, *implant, inseminate: *infuse, inoculate, imbue.

2 Introduce, insert, insinuate, interpolate, intercalate, interpose, interject are not close synonyms, but they come into comparison when they mean to put something (or someone) in a place among or between other things (or persons). Introduce (see also ENTER, 2) implies a bringing forward of someone or something not already in company with the other persons or things, but it also suggests as the aim of such an act the placing of the person or thing in the midst of that group or collection so as to form a part of it; as, to introduce a new subject into the conversation; to introduce several amendments into a bill before the legislature; to introduce some new stanzas into an old hymn. Insert implies a setting of a thing in a fixed place between or among other things; thus, to insert lace in a garment is to put it between two pieces of the material which forms the garment; to insert leaves in a book is to put leaves (usually additional leaves) into their proper places, as by the use of glue; so, to insert an egg in a robin's nest; to insert additional words in a statement; to insert an advertisement in a newspaper. Insinuate implies a slow, careful, often gentle or artful, introduction as into or through a narrow or winding passage, by pushing, worming its (or one's) way, or the like; as, the dog liked to insinuate his nose into his master's closed hand; to insinuate oneself into the good graces of another; trees which insinuate their roots into the fissures of near-by rocks; slowly but surely they insinuated themselves through the crowd to the edge of the pavement. "Horace... insinuates virtue rather by familiar examples than by the severity of precepts" (Dryden). Interpolate implies the insertion of something that does not belong, as because it is extraneous to the subject under discussion or because it is spurious and not part of the original; as, "It may be well if I interpolate here some remarks upon certain errors" (S. Alexander); some passages in this manuscript were interpolated by copyists. Intercalate primarily implies an insertion in the calendar, as of a day or month, but in its extended sense, it implies insertion into a sequence or series, then often also connoting intrusion; as, an inserted stanza (implying nothing beyond its introduction); an intercalated stanza (suggesting an intrusion into a sequence); an interpolated (i. e., spurious) stanza. Interpose, as here compared (see also INTERPOSE, 2), differs from interpolate mainly in its implication that that which is inserted serves as an obstacle, obstruction, cause of delay, or the like; as, "I ask leave to break the order of my argument and to interpose some words" (Quiller-Couch); "No ye don't! Father Victor saw Kim edging towards the door, and interposed a strong leg" (Kipling); "Professor [Gilbert] Murray has simply interposed between Euripides and ourselves a barrier more impenetrable than the Greek language" (T. S. Eliot). Of all of these words, interject carries the strongest implication of abrupt or forced introduction; as, he remained silent for the most part but occasionally interjected a question. In current use, the word is often employed in place of said, or the like, in introducing a remark, statement, or question that comes more or less as an interruption or addition. "I fear we must give him up tonight," observed Lady Blandish. "If he said he would come, he will come," Sir Austin interjected" (Meredith).

Ant. Withdraw (something or someone present): abstract (something from a file, etc.). — Con. *Remove, draw: *eject, oust, evict: eliminate, *exclude.

introduction. Introduction, prologue, induction, prelude, overture, preface, foreword, prolegomenon, proem, exordium, preamble, prolusion, protasis, avant-propos come into comparison as denoting something that serves as a preliminary or as an antecedent to an extended treatment, development, discussion, or presentation, as in an exposition, a dramatic or musical work, a poem, or the like. In their extended senses many of these terms are interchangeable, but in the special or technical senses in which they are here chiefly considered they tend to be (with a few exceptions) mutually exclusive. Introduction, the ordinary term of this group, and the comprehensive one, specifically applies to that part of a discourse, treatise, play, musical composition, or the like, which prepares the reader or auditor for the body of the work, especially by giving him that which is necessary for his understanding of what follows; as, he always writes the body of his treatise first and then adds the introduction and conclusion. Prologue applies specifically to the initial and distinct part of a poetic or dramatic work that may serve the purposes of an introduction, as by describing the characters or expounding the situations in which they find themselves (as, Chaucer's Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales"), or which may be a discourse, preceding the opening of a play, by a character of the play or by an actor who serves as a mouthpiece for the author, and giving a hint of the author's purposes or methods or attempting to attract the auditors' attention to or interest in the play to come (as, the Prologue to Shakespeare's "Troilus and Cressida" and to each act of his "King Henry V"). In its extended use, therefore, prologue often suggests an act, an event, or the like, that sets the stage or paves the way for a series of exploits, achievements, or the like; as, "this as a prologue to her own later dazzling history" (Hugh Walpole). In older and now chiefly historical use, induction often appears in place of prologue (as, the Induction to "The Mirror for Magistrates") and sometimes in place of introduction (as, "That which he takes for the second argument... is no argument, but an induction to those that follow"—Milton). Prelude (etymologically, a preceding play) applies in its general sense to anything such as a series of events, actions, natural phenomena, or the like, which constitute figuratively a short play or performance, and serve as a sign or indication of, or a preparation for, what is to follow; as, functional changes in glands often serve as a prelude to structural changes. "That was the prelude to a stormy afternoon" (H. G. Wells). As a technical term in music, prelude applies sometimes to an opening voluntary in a religious service but more often, and more specifically, to an introductory piece forming a section or a movement, especially of a fugue or a suite but sometimes of an oratorio or of an opera, and serving usually to introduce the theme or chief subject of the work. In this sense, prelude applies sometimes to works (not always musical works) which have something of the character of an introductory section or movement, but are so constructed that they have intrinsic and independent value; as, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" ["Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune"]; Wordsworth's poem "The Prelude." Overture (etymologically, an opening), as here compared (see also OVERTURE, 1), applies to an elaborate orchestral preliminary to an extended musical work such as an opera or oratorio, sometimes but not always serving the functions of a prelude; as, Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser." Most of the great overtures, though composed as preliminary pieces, have independent musical value. In ecclesiastical use, preface still applies to the prayer of exhortation to thanksgiving and of divine praise which opens the important part of a solemn Eucharistic service (such as the canon of the Mass), where the consecration of the bread and wine occurs. In its more common general sense, preface applies specifically to a short discourse which is distinct from the literary work which follows (a treatise, a novel, a poem or collection of poems, or the like), which is written usually by the author, but sometimes by an editor or a friend, and which has for its main purpose either to put the reader into the right frame of mind for the understanding or appreciation of the work he is about to read or to supply him with information that may be necessary to his proper understanding or use of it. When, however, a work is preceded by both a preface and an introduction, preface is usually applied to the introductory discourse written, and often also signed, by the author, editor, or the like, and introduction to the one which is definitely informative rather than personal in its character and usually carries no signature. In extended use preface may apply to anything which serves as an introduction or prelude, such as an introductory work on or a more or less tentative treatment of a subject (as, Walter Lippmann's book entitled "A Preface to Morals"), or to an act or speech, or series of acts or speeches, which has no other purpose than to prepare the way for what is to follow. "They walked in the rose garden. 'Do you read Utopias?' said Mr. Direck, cutting any preface, in the English manner" (H. G. Wells). "We fight for lost causes because we know that our defeat and dismay may be the preface to our successor's victory" (T. S. Eliot). Foreword is now often used in place of preface to a book, especially by those who wish to suggest simplicity and brevity of treatment, in contrast to the profundity and prolixity associated with some historic prefaces. Prolegomenon (often in plural form prolegomena) applies either to a preface of a learned work, such as one presenting a philosophy, a new scientific theory, or an exposition of theological doctrine (as, "his Prolegomenon to the Polyglot Bible"—Evelyn), or now somewhat more often to a preface in the extended sense of an introductory work (as, Thomas Hill Green's "Prolegomena to Ethics"). Proem is a bookish or literary rather than a technical term, applying usually to the commencement of a discourse, especially to a formal commencement, such as the invocation to a muse in a poem, or to the introductory remarks in a spoken discourse which serve to bring the speaker into touch with his audience. "I seye that first with heigh style he endyeth, Er [ere] he the body of his tale he wryteth, A proheme [proem]" (Chaucer). Exordium, a technical term of rhetoric, applies to a formal beginning, especially of an oration but sometimes of a written exposition or argument, in which the speaker or writer makes an approach to his subject by remarks intended to awaken the interest of his auditors or readers and to pave the way for their understanding of what he is to say or for their acceptance of his conclusions. Preamble applies to a formal introduction, often only an introductory paragraph, as in a statute, a constitution, a treaty, a deed, or a set of resolutions, which states the grounds, purposes, or the like, of that which follows. Because of its etymological suggestion of ambling before, the term lends itself to humorous use as a designation of a long monotonous preface. "Now, dame... This [The Wife of Bath's prologue] is a long preamble of a tale" (Chaucer). Proclusion is a now rare synonym of prologue: distinctively it applies to a short literary work (now often called preface or prolegomena) which sets forth briefly ideas which the author may or may not intend to amplify later; as, "My treatise... was intended but for a proclusion" (Evelyn). Protasis, a now rare highly technical term once much used by rhetoricians dealing with the drama, applies to that part of a play which serves as an introduction to the body of the play (the epitasis), or in modern terms, as the exposition (see EXPOSITION, 2). Avant-propos, a French phrase not yet naturalized in English, is also rare but is sometimes used by those who prefer it to proem for a few introductory remarks, or to preface or foreword, as a more informal or more ingratiating term.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

intrude. Intrude, obtrude, interlope, butt in agree in meaning to thrust oneself or something in without invitation or authorization. Intrude both transitively and intransitively carries a strong implication of forcing someone or something in without leave, without right, or against the will of others; it often connotes rudeness, officiousness, or invasion of another's property, time, or the like; as, "Enow of such as, for their bellies' sake, Creep, and intrude, and clumb into the fold!" (Milton); "Sir," said I, "I am afraid that I intrude upon you. It is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you" (Boswell); "This court always had disavowed the right to intrude its judgment upon questions of policy or morals" (Justice Holmes). Obtrude (now chiefly but not exclusively a transitive verb) suggests even more strongly than intrude the impropriety, the boldness, or the futility of the act or the disagreeableness of the offense; as, "The former obtrudes his attention...; it is so pointed, that it always confuses me, and so public, that it attracts general notice" (Burney); "I intended plain prose, but a rhyme obtruded itself and I became poetical" (Cowper); "The first sin against style as against good manners is to obtrude or exploit personality" (Quiller-Couch). Interlope (etymologically, a back formation from the more common agent noun interloper) originally implied the action of an unauthorized trader who trespassed on the rights or charters of others, in this way obtaining advantages or profits belonging rightfully to another. In more recent use, both verb and noun imply an interposition of oneself in a place or position which has an injurious effect on one or both of the persons or things concerned; as, he regarded her new acquaintance as an interloping rival for her hand; the independent stores charged the chain stores with interloping. Butt in, originally American slang, implies an abrupt or offensive intrusion suggestive of the manner in which a horned animal attacks its enemy; in this sense, the term usually suggests absence of ceremony or of a sense of propriety, or of any other sign of good breeding; as, "I've not gone there or written, or anything yet, because I didn't want to butt in" (R. Macaulay).

Ana. *Trespass, invade, encroach, entrench, infringe: interject, interpose, insinuate, interpolate, intercalate, *introduce: interfere, intervene, *interpose: *meddle, intermeddle, interfere, tamper.

Ant. Stand off. — Con. Withdraw, retire (see GO): retreat, *recede.

Ant. Validate. — Con. *Enforce, implement: administer, *execute.

invaluable. Priceless, precious, valuable, dear, *costly, expensive.

Ant. Worthless.

invasion. Invasion, incursion, raid, irruption, inroad come into comparison not only as military terms, but also in their extended senses and as meaning an entrance effected by force or strategy. Invasion strictly implies entrance upon another's territory with hostile intentions, such as conquest, plunder, or use as a basis of operations; as, the Roman invasion of Britain; the German invasion of Belgium. In nonmilitary use it may imply encroachment, trespass, or any intrusion that involves an aggressive or hostile purpose; as, "She was conscious of an invasion of her rights" (Stevenson); "the Proletariat will extend its present invasion of Parliament until it achieves in effect complete conquest" (Shaw). In still looser use, it often implies entrance with, or as if with, a rush by a horde or crowd; as, summer brought with it the usual invasion of tourists. Incursion, especially in military use, carries a much stronger connotation of suddenness, unexpectedness, or haste than invasion; it often also suggests an immediate end and a quick withdrawal when the end is achieved; as, the American colonists were in constant fear of incursions by the Indians. In its extended sense, incursion applies chiefly to an invasion in large numbers of something dreaded or harmful, undesirable, but not necessarily inimical; as, the peace of the neighborhood was frequently broken by incursions of gangs of small boys; "terrible like an incursion of wild beasts" (J. Marlineau). Raid, now frequent in military use for a swift, sudden invasion (formerly of cavalry, now more often of air forces) may or may not suggest more preparation, more strategy, and more fury in attack than incursion, its close synonym; as, the raids in the Shenandoah Valley by Forrest's Confederate cavalry during 1863; nightly bombing raids on a city. In international law, however, raid is technically applicable only to an incursion of armed forces that are unauthorized or unrecognized by any state into a country that is at peace; thus, an incursion of armed persons on one side of a border, or boundary line, into the adjoining country for a predatory or hostile purpose is technically a raid. In its extended use, raid applies to any sudden descent, such as one by officers of the law upon a gambling resort or a place where liquor or the like is illicitly made or sold, to obtain evidence and arrest offenders (as, to make a raid upon a speakeasy), or as by speculators, politicians, etc., for the purpose of making profit, mulcting public moneys, or gaining control of a situation (as, to make a raid on the market; to make a raid on the Treasury), or, in still looser and somewhat humorous use, by hungry persons in search of food (as, nightly raids on the refrigerator). Irruption applies to any incursion that implies or suggests a breaking in or similar acts of violence; as, an irruption of Goths into Gaul; an irruption of schoolboys into a garden. Inroad was applied originally to an incursion or raid made by armed horsemen into the territory of another race or nation; as, "Aggressive war, as distinguished from mere plundering inroads" (Freeman). The term is now applicable to any invasion that involves encroachment or trespass with injurious results; as, activities that make inroads upon one's time and one's health; the physician discovered the inroads of the disease; "During Silas's absence in the daytime the door had been locked, and there had been no marks of any inroad on his return by daylight" (G. Eliot).

Ana. Aggression, *attack, offense, offensive: trespass, violation, transgression, infringement, infraction, *breach: intruding or intrusion, interloping, butting in, obtruding or obtrusion (see corresponding verbs at INTRUDE): encroachment, trenching, entrenchment (see corresponding verbs at TRESPASS).

investive. *Abuse, vituperation, obloquy, scurrility, billingsgate.

Ana. Vilifying or vilification, maligning, calumniation, traducing (see corresponding verbs at MALIGN): *animadversion, stricture, aspersion, reflection.

inveigle. Decoy, entice, *lure, tempt, seduce.

Ana. Snare, ensnare, trap, entrap (see CATCH): beguile, mislead, delude, *deceive, betray: cajole, wheedle, blandish, *coax.

invent. Invent, create, discover are not genuinely synonymous terms, but they are frequently confused in the sense of to bring into being something new. Invent (etymologically, to come upon, or find) in earlier times stressed fabrication of something new through the exercise of the imagination; it therefore was used chiefly in reference to poets and their fictions or plots. "A poet is a maker, as the word signifies: and he who cannot make, that is, invent, hath his name for nothing" (Dryden). This use, with stress on imagination, is now rare, for the emphasis is more on the fabrication of something new and, often, useful, as a result of study, thought, experiment, or the like; the word therefore often presupposes labor and ingenuity rather than, as in older times, inspiration; as, to invent a device for stopping a car quickly; the cotton gin was invented by Eli Whitney in 1793; "Socrates was in just as good a position as Benjamin Franklin to invent the stove which goes by the latter's name" (J. W. Krutch). However, invent often stresses the finding, as well as the bringing into being, of something new or hitherto unknown as the result of mental effort. "[Love, as conceived by Plato] was not invented but interpreted by Plato" (G. L. Dickinson). "She was tired of inventing means for making the days and nights pleasant and capriciously variable for others" (Van Vechten). Create stresses a causing of something to exist; it not only implies previous nonexistence but it often suggests an evoking of something into being out of, or as if out of, nothing, as by fiat, by an act of the will, by inspiration, or the like; as, God created the world; the poet creates beauty; the law creates rights; the king created an earldom for his favorite. "To this strange force within him, to this power that created his works of art, there was nothing to do but submit" (A. Huxley). "I do not believe that a sense of justice is innate, but I have been astonished to see how quickly it can be created" (B. Russell). Discover, as here compared (see also DISCOVER, 2; REVEAL), presupposes the pre-existence of something, and lack of knowledge of it; the term therefore implies the finding of that thing, often as the result of mental or physical effort, as by exploration, investigation, experiment, and the like; as, Columbus discovered America; William Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood. Hence, in precise use, one invents processes or ways of doing something, as well as instruments, tools, implements, or machines, but one discovers things which exist but have not yet been known, such as lands, stars, natural laws, and the like. "Newton invented the differential and the integral calculus...and discovered the laws of motion" (Karl K. Darrow).

Ana. Fabricate, fashion, form, shape, forge, *make: imagine, conceive, envision (see THINK): design, project, plan, plot, scheme (see under PLAN, n.): produce, turn out (see BEAR).

inventory, n. *List, register, schedule, catalogue, table, roll, roster, rota, canon.

invert, v. Transpose, *reverse.

Ana. Upset, *overturn, overset, capsize: interchange, *exchange: derange, disarrange (see DISORDER, v.).

invest. 1 Vest, robe, apparel, array, *clothe, attire, tire, dress.

2 Induct, install, inaugurate, *initiate.

Ana. Endue, endow (see DOWER): consecrate (see DEVOTE).

Ant. Divest, strip (of robes, insignia, power, etc.): unfrock.

investigation. Probe, inquest, inquisition, *inquiry, research.

Ana. Inspection, examination, scrutiny, audit (see under SCRUTINIZE): surveying or survey, observing or observation (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

inveterate. Inveterate, confirmed, chronic, deep-seated, deep-rooted come into comparison as meaning so firmly established or settled that change is almost impossible. Inveterate (etymologically, become old) applies especially to that which has persisted so long and so obstinately that it has become a fixed habit or an almost inalterable custom or tradition; as, "the growing infirmities of age manifest themselves in nothing more strongly, than in an inveterate dislike of interruption" (Lamb); "The Nonconformist Conscience...[and] its inveterate feud against everything that people mean by the word 'beauty'" (Day Lewis). When applied to a person, the term implies the formation of an ineradicable habit, attitude, or the like; as, an inveterate smoker; "an inveterate and formidable foe" (Peacock). Confirmed applies chiefly to that which has grown stronger or firmer with time until it resists all attack or assault or attempts to uproot it (as, a confirmed belief in God; a confirmed hatred of a person; "His intense egoism rendered him impatient of all reproof or instruction, and... as a natural consequence, he soon became the victim of confirmed mannerisms"—The Nation). Like inveterate, it may also apply to a person who is such as he is described in the noun by the strengthening or crystallization of a taste, a vice or virtue, an attitude, or the like (as, a confirmed bachelor; a confirmed drunkard; a confirmed invalid; a confirmed optimist; "I am a confirmed wanderer"—Disraeli). Chronic also implies long duration, but it applies either to diseases, habits, conditions, and the like, which persist without marked interruption in spite of attempts to alleviate or to cure them, or to the persons who are afflicted or affected by such diseases, habits, or the like; as, "his chronic state of mental restlessness" (G. Eliot); chronic bronchitis; "hysterical with failure and repeated disappointment and chronic poverty" (A. Huxley); "The working scientist... must steer a middle course between chronic indecision and precipitant judgment" (Eddington); a chronic fault-finder. Deep-seated and deep-rooted in their figurative senses emphasize rather the extent to which something has entered into the structure or texture of the thing (a person's body or mind, a people's nature, or the like) in which it becomes fixed or embedded; as, "the old, dependent, chaotic, haphazard pioneer instinct of his [Mark Twain's] childhood [was] so deep-seated, that... he slipped back into the boy he had been before" (Van W. Brooks); "a deep-rooted reverence for truth" (J. Morley).

Ana. Habituated, accustomed, addicted (see HABITUATE): habitual, customary, *usual: *hardened, indurated: settled, set, fixed, established (see SET): inbred, *innate: persisting or persistent, enduring, abiding (see corresponding verbs at CONTINUE).

invidious. Distasteful, obnoxious, *repugnant, repellent, abhorrent.

Ana. *Hateful, odious, abominable, detestable: *offensive, loathsome, revolting, repulsive.

Con. Agreeable, gratifying, grateful, pleasing, *pleasant: attractive, alluring, fascinating (see under ATTRACT): enticing, tempting, seducing or seductive (see corresponding verbs at LURE).

invincible. Invincible, unconquerable, indomitable, impregnable, inexpugnable, unassailable, invulnerable come into comparison as meaning proof against attack or assault. A person or thing is invincible or unconquerable that presents insuperable difficulties to his or its being overcome, resisted, displaced, or the like; invincible, however, usually implies a quality or character in the person or thing which makes him or it actually or seemingly incapable of being vanquished; unconquerable implies rather the fact of having successfully resisted all attempts at subdual or mastery; as, invincible ignorance; "the armed forces, police and military, form a large permanent body wholly subject to that which governs, a weapon which renders that which governs almost invincible" (Belloc); "He made plan after plan; but each one was discarded because he saw it would encounter invincible selfishness, or invincible self-sacrifice" (DeLand); "The story of a noble mind wrestling with unconquerable Fate" (I. D'Israeli); "the iron face of those men of empire and unconquerable will, those Caesars and Napoleons" (L. P. Smith). A person, a will, a mind, or the like, is indomitable that stubbornly and determinedly resists all attempts to gain mastery over him or it or endures seemingly insuperable difficulties with fortitude until they are overcome; as, indomitable courage; an indomitable will; indomitable energy; "Founding colonies . . . or exploring in crazy pinnaces the fierce latitudes of the polar seas—they are the same indomitable God-fearing men" (Froude). A fortress or stronghold (or something analogous) is impregnable that is strong enough or sufficiently guarded to repel all attacks or assaults; as, "the Tarpeian rock, her citadel Impregnable" (Milton). "There was always a traitor in the citadel; and after he (or generally she) had surrendered the keys, what was the use of pretending that it was impregnable?" (E. Wharton). A thing (sometimes, a person) is inexpugnable or unassailable either because it is impregnable, or, in very precise use, because it offers no point at which it can be attacked or no occasion or reason (such as a weakness or a defect) for attacking or impugning; as, castles were often built at the tops of craggy mountains in the hope that they might be inexpugnable; as long as Great Britain remains unassailable by all but air raiders, it cannot be conquered; the inexpugnable meekness of a saint; an argument so logical and convincing that it is unassailable. A person or thing is invulnerable that cannot be wounded or penetrated by any destructive weapon, any piercing instrument, or the like; as, according to legend, Achilles had been rendered invulnerable except at one spot when his mother, holding him by the heel, dipped him in the Styx; ironclad warships were once believed to be invulnerable. "What was one to do with people like that? How was one to pierce such hidebound complacency? It was invulnerable except to the Grace of God" (C. Mackenzie).

Ana. *Formidable, redoubtable: dauntless, undaunted, intrepid (see BRAVE).

Con. Conquerable, vanquishable, surmountable, subduable (see corresponding verbs at CONQUER).

inviolable. Inviolable, *sacred, sacrosanct.

Ana. Hallowed, consecrated, dedicated (see DEVOTE): *holy, sacred, blessed, divine, religious: pure, *chaste.

inviolate. Sacrosanct, *sacred, inviolable.

Ant. Violated. — Con. Profaned, desecrated (see corresponding nouns at PROFANATION): polluted, defiled (see CONTAMINATE).

invite. Invite, bid, solicit, court, woo come into comparison only when they mean to request or encourage a person or a thing to come to one or to fall in with one's plans or desires. Invite in its ordinary and usual sense implies a courteous request to go somewhere, do something, give some assistance, or the like, which going, doing, or the like, it is assumed will be agreeable, or at least not disagreeable, to the person invited; as, to invite a few friends to dinner; to invite an acquaintance to spend the night in one's home; to invite an audience to express their opinions. In this sense, the word usually implies providing an opening for those who otherwise might hesitate to go, or do, or give without such a request. Consequently, in its extended sense, invite implies providing an opening by any of various means, such as a seductive manner or a challenging statement or policy, that serves as an encouragement or temptation to another to do that to which he feels he has been called; as, to dress so conspicuously as to invite unwelcome attentions; "The public press no longer invites its readers to sustained thought" (C. W. Eliot); "the writer who brings a new revelation is not necessarily called upon to invite the execration of the herd" (H. Ellis). Bid is archaic or dialectal for invite, in the sense of to request the presence of as at a feast, a marriage, or other great occasion: the noun bid for invitation is, however, now not uncommon in colloquial use. "Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy. Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage" (Matthew xxii. 8-9). But bid for (literally, to offer a price for something up for sale) in extended use sometimes comes close to invite in the sense of to provide a tempting opening for something; as, politicians bidding for votes by promising lower taxes and higher wages. "In his lifelong passion for getting his name and fame associated with those of other men who were secure of the suffrages of the multitude Mark Twain was almost consciously bidding for approval" (Van W. Brooks). Solicit (as here considered: see also ASK, 2) differs from invite in implying urgency rather than courtesy in requesting or encouraging; as, "He . . . without any indelicate display of regard . . . was soliciting the good opinion of her friends" (Austen); "Not only is what is put forward by one person as true open to the judgment of others, but it solicits and compels such judgment" (S. Alexander). Court basically implies an endeavor to win the favor of a person by flattery, attentions, love-making, or the like. Only in its extended sense does it imply a providing of a favorable opportunity by tempting or encouraging something to come to one or to be visited upon one; as, "He kept himself somewhat aloof, seeming to avoid notice rather than to court it" (Arnold); "so long as a scientific textbook is obsolete in a decade or less, to poetize science is to court mortality" (Lowes). Woo literally implies amorous courting: consequently, in its extended sense, it frequently stresses a drawing to or upon one by allurements, blandishments, or the like; as, "Herodotus in search of a public . . . found a favourable 'pitch,' as we should say, and wooed an audience to him" (Quiller-Couch). Nevertheless, the word occasionally is very close to court and scarcely distinguishable from it; as, "You . . . woo your own destruction" (Shak.).

Ana. *Ask, request, solicit: *lure, tempt, entice, inveigle: excite, *provoke, stimulate.

involve. 1 Involve, implicate, as here compared (see also INCLUDE), agree in meaning to bring one (a person or thing) into circumstances or a situation from which one cannot easily free oneself. Involve may or may not impute disgrace to the circumstances or situation, but it usually implies complication or entangling and often suggests extreme embarrassment; as, to become involved in debt; the war may not end until every nation in Europe is involved in it; "The case of a judge involved by the exigencies of his office in a strong conflict between public duty and private interest or affection" (Colvin); "[he] had been involved in some affair that made it uncomfortable for him to return to live in that city" (S. Anderson). Implicate usually, but not invariably, implies a disgraceful connection or one that casts a reflection on a person's reputation; it may even imply definite proof of association with a crime; as, the detectives discovered that an uncle of the child was implicated in its kidnaping; they were unable to implicate any of the suspected political leaders in the conspiracy to defraud the city.

Ana. Ensnare, entrap, snare, trap (see CATCH): connect, link, associate, relate (see JOIN): *embarrass: fetter, shackle, *hamper.

Con. *Extricate, disentangle, untangle, disembarrass: disengage, *detach: *free, liberate, release.

2 Comprehend, embrace, *include, imply, implicate, subsume.

Ana. Comprise, *compose, constitute: import, *mean, signify, denote: bespeak, attest, betoken, *indicate, argue, prove.

A colon (:) groups words discriminated in this book. An asterisk (*) indicates place of treatment of each group.

Con. Eliminate, *exclude, rule out, debar.

involved. Intricate, complicated, knotty, *complex.

Ana. Confused, muddled, bemuddled (see CONFUSE): perplexing, puzzling, bewildering, mystifying (see PUZZLE): difficult, *hard, arduous.

Con. Simple, *easy, facile.

invulnerable. Impregnable, inexpugnable, unassailable, *invincible, unconquerable, indomitable.

Ant. Vulnerable.

inward. *Inner, interior, internal, inside, intestine.

Ana. Inbred, *innate, inborn: ingrained, *inherent, intrinsic, constitutional: intimate, *familiar: objective, sensible, *material: heartfelt, unfeigned, *sincere: impalpable, *imperceptible.

Ant. Outward. — Con. *Outer, exterior, external, outside: extraneous, *extrinsic, foreign, alien: spiritual (see corresponding noun at SOUL).

iota. Jot, tittle, whit, *particle, bit, mite, smitch, smidgen, atom.

irascible. Irascible, choleric, splenetic, testy, techy (or tetchy), touchy, cranky, cross come into comparison as meaning easily angered or enraged. Irascible implies the possession of a fiery or inflammable temper or a disposition to be incensed on the slightest provocation; as, "an English plebeian... coarse, proud, irascible, imperious" (Carlyle); a peppery and irascible old gentleman. Choleric implies excitability of temper, unreasonableness in anger and, usually, an impatient and uniformly irritable frame of mind; as, "That in the captain's but a choleric word, Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy" (Shak.); "Where melancholic men abandon effort, men of the choleric type take to kicking and smashing" (H. G. Wells). Splenetic implies a similar temperament, but one especially given to moroseness and fits of spleen which exhibit themselves in angry, sullen, or intensely peevish moods, words, or acts; as, "More peevish, cross, and splenetic, than dog distract or monkey sick" (Buller, 1612-1680); "That splenetic temper, which seems to grudge brightness to the flames of hell" (Landor); "he was not splenetic: nay, he proved in the offending volume he could be civil, courteous, chivalrous" (Meredith). Testy implies irascibility occasioned by small annoyances such as being thwarted, compelled to wait, or the like; as, men who are imperious by nature are inclined to grow more and more testy with age; "The testy major was in fume. To find no hunter standing waiting" (Masefield). Techy (or now more frequently its derivative touchy) suggests readiness to take offense; it often connotes undue irritability or over-sensitiveness; as, "He is techy and impatient of contradiction, sore with wounded pride" (Hazlitt); "I am not touchy under criticism" (Stevenson). Cranky and cross are the most common of these terms in colloquial use, both often meaning little more than difficult to please. In precise use, however, cranky carries a strong implication of the possession of set notions, fixed ideas, or unvarying standards, which predispose one to anger or a show of temper when others in their speech, conduct, requests, work, and the like, do not conform to them; as, a cranky critic; a cranky employer; a cranky teacher. Cross, on the other hand, implies a being out of sorts, owing to any of numerous causes or conditions; it also implies irascibility or irritability, but only for the duration of one's mood; as, "Sometimes, when I am cross and cannot sleep, I engage in angry contests with the Opinions I object to" (L. P. Smith); "the attempts to persuade the Intelligent Woman that she is having a glorious treat when she is in fact being... bored and tired out and sent home cross and miserable" (Shaw).

Ana. *Irritable, fractious, snappish, waspish, huffy, querulous, petulant, peevish: *impatient, restive, jumpy, jittery, nervous: crabbed, surly (see SULLEN).

Con. Good-natured, *amiable, complaisant, obliging: *calm, placid, serene, tranquil.

irate. *Angry, wrathful, mad, indignant, acrimonious.

Ana. Provoked, exasperated, nettled, irritated (see IRRITATE): incensed, infuriated, enraged (see ANGER, v.).

Con. Good-humored, good-tempered, good-natured (see corresponding noun phrases at GOOD NATURE): *forbearing, tolerant, clement, lenient, indulgent, merciful.

ire. Rage, fury, *anger, indignation, wrath.

Ana. *Passion: temper, humor, *mood.

irenic, irenical or eirenic, eirenical. *Pacific, peaceable, peaceful, pacifist, pacifistic.

Ana. Conciliating or conciliatory, placating or placatory, propitiating or propitiatory (see corresponding verbs at PACIFY).

Ant. Acrimonious.

iridescent. Opalescent, opaline, *prismatic.

irk. Vex, *annoy, bother.

Ana. Perturb, disturb, upset, *discompose: discommode, incommode, trouble, *inconvenience, molest: fret, chafe (see ABRADE).

irksome. Irksome, tiresome, wearisome, tedious, humdrum agree in meaning burdensome because tiring or boring or both. A person or thing is irksome that inspires distaste, reluctance, or impatience, because of its demand for effort not made easy by interest; as, "Mr. Collins... was neither sensible nor agreeable; his society was irksome" (Austen); "The difficulty of grasping abstract statements made learning very irksome to me" (Symonds); "Why is it that the study of the past seems irksome to the new generation?" (Grandgent). A person or thing is tiresome that is dull and unenlivening and therefore is either intensely boring or soon productive of fatigue; as, "It is tiresome to be funny for a whole evening" (Scott); "The second curate was Chator, who was so good as sometimes to be nearly tiresome" (C. Mackenzie); "We think of rain as tiresome and uncomfortable" (Binyon); "The importunity of the little boys was tiresome when one wanted to be alone" (A. Huxley). A person or, especially, a thing is wearisome that exhausts one's strength or patience through long-continued or constant call for effort, exertion, attention, and the like, or for tiresome uniformity of character; as, "These high wild hills and rough uneven ways Draw out our miles, and make them wearisome" (Shak.); "the same wearisome round of stereotyped habits" (Wilde); "The acquisition of exact knowledge is apt to be wearisome, but it is essential to every kind of excellence" (B. Russell). A person or thing is tedious that is tiresomely monotonous, slow, or prolix; as, "Life is as tedious as a twice-told tale Vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man" (Shak.). "The prose of the writer who can deliberately make his own personal cadences monotonously audible all the time grows wearisome; it affects us as a tedious mannerism" (H. Ellis). A person or thing is humdrum that is continuously commonplace in character, or goes on without variety or variation in a monotonous routine: often, the implication of wearisomeness is obscure or lost; as, "A plain, humdrum domestic life, with eight hundred a year, and a small house, full of babies" (Trollope); "They regarded their adversaries as humdrum people, slaves to routine, enemies to light" (Arnold); "For music, so far from showing a humdrum and homekeeping spirit, has kept pace with the other arts in its restless striving away from its own centre toward that doubtful periphery where it is on the point of passing over into something else" (Babbitt). Ana. Dull, *stupid: fatiguing, exhausting, fagging, tiring (see TIRE, v.).

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

Ant. Absorbing, engrossing.

ironical, ironic. Satirical, *sarcastic, sardonic.

Ana. Biting, cutting, *incisive, trenchant: *caustic, mordant, mordacious, scathing.

irony. *Wit, satire, sarcasm, humor, repartee.

irrational. Irrational, unreasonable are here compared as meaning not governed or guided by reason. Both terms have been used and very occasionally are still used in the sense of not having the power to reason; as, "Nothing has a greater effect on all plants and irrational animals" (Hume); "Whilst his fellow-man... Must as the unreasonable beast drag on A life of labour" (Souhey). In current good use, except in technical senses such as in mathematics, both words apply commonly to men, their acts, utterances, feelings, policies, demands, and the like. Irrational may imply mental derangement or a temporary loss of mental control (as, the patient was irrational during the course of his fever), but, more often, it suggests a lack of control or guidance by the reason, or direct conflict with reason's dictates: it therefore comes close to absurd, illogical, foolish, preposterous, senseless, or fantastic; as, to be governed by an irrational fear; irrational beliefs; an irrational policy; "his temperamental impulse to energetic practical action... and the reserve, passivity, and isolation which myopia enforced, seemed to him absolutely irrational" (H. Ellis); "His spirits, which had dropped at her last words, rose with an irrational leap" (E. Wharton). Unreasonable, on the other hand, implies guidance or control by some force, such as self-will, passion, ambition, avarice, or the like, which makes one deficient in judgment or good sense: as applied to one's acts, utterances, demands, etc., it suggests lack of justification by reason: the term therefore comes close to inequitable, immoderate, excessive, unfair, extravagant, and the like; as, you will not be so unreasonable as to send your child out in this storm; his demands are unreasonable; obstinate and unreasonable pertinacity; an unreasonable price for beef; "he contracted an unreasonable aversion towards his son" (Addison).

Ana. Absurd, preposterous, *foolish, silly: fatuous, asinine, *simple: crazy, demented, mad, *insane.

Ant. Rational. — Con. Reasonable (see RATIONAL): *wise, judicious, sage, sapient, prudent, sane, sensible: *logical.

irregular. Irregular, anomalous, unnatural come into comparison when they mean outside the sphere of that which conforms to, or is explainable by, law, rule, custom, or the like. Irregular implies failure to conform to a rule, a law, a pattern, especially to one imposed for the sake of uniformity in method, practice, or conduct; thus, an irregular marriage is one that does not conform to the regulations of church or state; an irregular verse does not correspond to an accepted metrical pattern for its type; guerilla warfare is called irregular because it does not accord with the practice of civilized nations or conventional military theory; irregular conduct may or may not be morally reprehensible but it defies the code or standard of the community or class. Anomalous stresses lack of conformity to what might be expected of a thing (sometimes a person) because of the class or type to which it belongs, the laws which govern its existence, the environment in which it is found, and the like. Sometimes, it specifically implies inconsistency, or a conflict of principles; as, "acts so anomalous, in such startling contradiction to all our usual ways and accepted notions of life and its value" (L. P. Smith): sometimes it specifically means unclassifiable or undefinable; as, anomalous literary works such as Holmes's "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table"; anomalous emotions: sometimes it suggests the absence of the character or of the characteristics essential to a thing of its kind; as, "the position of the [Roman] Senate [which had been deprived of its powers by the triumvirate] was no less anomalous and impotent" (Buchan): sometimes it suggests a contradiction between the professed aims or intentions of a person or institution and the conditions in which that person or institution exists or finds himself (itself) at a given time; as, President Wilson found himself in an anomalous position when congress rejected his proposal that the United States enter the League of Nations. Unnatural is the strongest of these words in its implication of censure, especially when it implies a violation of natural law, or of principles accepted by all civilized men as based on reason and essential to the well-being of society. In such cases it often specifically connotes moral perversion (as, an unnatural practice), or abnormal indifference or cruelty (as, an unnatural parent). Sometimes, the word merely means contrary to what is received as natural, either because it is not in accordance with the normal course of nature (as, snow in May is unnatural in this region), or because it is not in keeping with what one regards as normal, balanced, proper, fitting, or the like, under the circumstances (as, Platonic love is unnatural; an unnatural appetite for acid foods). "Thy deed, inhuman and unnatural Provokes this deluge most unnatural" (Shak.). "Charles [a child]... was naturally good. Unnaturally good might be a better term" (Deland).

Ana. Aberrant, *abnormal, atypic: *exceptional: singular, unique, *strange, peculiar, odd, queer.

Ant. Regular. — Con. Natural, normal, typical (see REGULAR): *usual, customary, wonted, accustomed, habitual: licit, legitimate, legal, *lawful.

irreligious. Irreligious, unreligious, nonreligious, ungodly, godless agree in meaning not religious or not devoted to the ends of religion. Irreligious is not only the most common of the negative forms of religious but the most clearly defined in meaning, for it implies not merely lack of religion but hostility to religion or courses in opposition to it or in violation of its precepts: it therefore sometimes suggests impiety, immorality, blasphemy, or the like; as, "it is unworthy a religious man to view an irreligious one either with alarm or aversion" (Carlyle); "Irreligious men, whose short prospects are filled with earth, and sense, and mortal life" (Berkeley). Unreligious commonly implies nothing more than lack of religion: it therefore usually applies to men, their utterances, works, etc., and suggests absence of religion or of religious training or religious ideas; as, "If unreligious, let him be at once, Among ten thousand innocents, enrolled A pupil" (Wordsworth); "The popular poetry... became... unreligious... in some parts irreligious" (Milman). Nonreligious applies not so much to persons as to institutions, activities, projects, themes for art, etc., that are outside the sphere or province of religion or not under the control of any religious body: it therefore comes close in meaning to secular (see under PROFANE, 1); as, nonreligious education; nonreligious charitable societies. Ungodly often comes close to irreligious, but it carries a stronger suggestion of disobedience to or defiance of the divine law; as, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly" (Psalms i. 1); "And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Peter iv. 18); "that ungodly custom of swearing" (Sir C. Wren). Godless, though usually closer to unreligious than to irreligious, commonly implies atheism or, in some cases, agnosticism: in current use, it often definitely implies rejection of religion; as, godless philosophers; teachings.

Ana. *Impious, profane, blasphemous, sacrilegious: *immoral, amoral, immoral.

Ant. Religious. — Con. Pious, *devout.

irritable. Irritable, fractious, peevish, snappish, waspish, petulant, pettish, huffy, huffish, fretful, querulous apply to persons or to their moods or dispositions in the sense of manifesting impatience or anger without due or sufficient cause. Irritable implies extreme excitability of temperament, often owing to a physical or nervous condition, that makes one exceedingly easy to annoy or difficult to please; as, "Mental work brings on...an irritable and nervous disgust" (Arnold); "Byron, growing irritable and fat in the enervating climate of Italy" (L. P. Smith). Fractious carries a stronger implication of willfulness or of ungovernableness than irritable and although it also implies extreme excitability, it suggests even greater loss of self-control: the term is often applied to animals as well as to persons; as, the teacher found the children unduly fractious that day; an extremely fractious horse. Peevish implies childish irritability and a tendency to give expression to petty complaints or ill-humored trivial criticisms; as, "The town, like a peevish child, knows not what it desires" (Fielding); "He [Gray] thought that Pope had a good heart, in spite of his peevish temper" (N. Nicholls); "I have heard some London wits, rather peevish at Macaulay's superiority, complain that he occupied too much of the talk" (Thackeray). Snappish implies irritability, sometimes peevishness that manifests itself in sharp, cutting questions, comments, or the like, that discourage conversation or sociability; as, an extremely unlikable, snappish old fellow; the cook found her mistress snappish that morning. Waspish stresses testiness rather than irritability but it implies a readiness to sting or hurt others without warrant or without sufficient warrant; as, beware of his waspish temper; her comments may be amusing but they are always waspish. Petulant usually suggests the sulkiness of or as of a spoiled child as well as peevishness and capricious impatience; as, "a girl of about nineteen with an impatient and petulant expression both in her face and in her shoulders" (Dickens); "her quick petulant nature" (Stevenson); "As he had no means of confuting his nephew, all he could do...was to utter petulant remarks on his powerlessness to appear at the dinner-table that day" (Meredith). Pettish implies sulky or childish ill-humor, as of one who is slighted or offended; as, "a pettish ejaculation" (N. Hawthorne); "Chivalry is a thing which must be courteously and generously conceded, and must never be pettishly claimed" (A. C. Benson). Huffy (or now less often huffish) also implies a tendency to take offense without due cause, but it suggests more of a display of injured pride than pettish; as, when he is reproved, he is huffy for the rest of the day; "To return...a huffish answer" (Dickens). Fretful implies irritability or peevishness that manifests itself in complaints, or in a complaining tone of voice; as, a fretful child; his fretfulness that afternoon disturbed the whole family. Querulous implies a profound and often habitual discontent that manifests itself in whining complaints or in fretfulness of temper; it often also suggests petulance; as, "her querulous and never-ending complaints" (Gaskell); "the man himself grew old and querulous and hysterical with failure and repeated disappointment and chronic poverty" (A. Huxley).

Ana. Cranky, cross, testy, touchy, techy, choleric, splenetic, *irascible.

Ant. Easygoing. — Con. *Amiable, good-natured, complaisant, obliging: genial, sociable, affable, cordial, *gracious.

irritate. Irritate, exasperate, nettle, provoke, aggravate, roll (or rile), peeve agree in meaning to excite a feeling of angry annoyance in a person. That which irritates is something which greatly displeases or offends and evokes a display of feeling ranging from momentary impatience to an outburst of rage. "The chattering crowd, with their rude jokes...irritated him sharply" (S. Anderson). "Her intensity, which would leave no emotion on a normal plane, irritated the youth into a frenzy" (D. H. Lawrence). That which exasperates arouses bitter or intense irritation as at something unendurable; the word, however, sometimes expresses nothing more than keen vexation or annoyance. "When we turn from Owen's work to Eliot's we turn from...anger to exasperation, from wounds to nerves, from the love of living to the will to die" (Day Lewis). "Though she could exasperate she could never offend" (H. G. Wells). That which nettles irritates sharply but momentarily and stings or piques more than angers. That which provokes awakens strong annoyance or vexation, or (esp. in the form provoking) teases or tantalizes. "[This]...must be very provoking to the dignity of some dissenting doctors; and to nettle them still the more, you in a manner impose upon them the necessity of being silent" (Cowper). "He is provoked with me for not talking more" (Burney). Aggravate, as equivalent to provoke, has not been accepted by careful writers and is rarely used by them except when it is needed for color or as indicating the quality of the speaker. "It is aggravating to have you talking about so small a business" (Shaw). That which roils (or, colloquially, riles) is that which disturbs one's serenity or peace and agitates as well as angers. "That his friends should believe it, was what roiled him exceedingly" (R. North). That which peevs (a colloquial word) excites fretfulness or a tendency to be easily irritated; as, he is easily peeved after a restless night.

Ana. *Annoy, vex, irk, bother: incense, *anger, madden, enrage, infuriate: *offend, affront: fret, chafe (see ABRASE).

Con. *Cause, antecedent, determinant: inception, *origin, source, root.

issue, v. Emanate, proceed, flow, derive, originate, *spring, arise, rise, stem.

Ana. Emerge, *appear, loom.

item. Item, detail, particular come into comparison as meaning one of the separate and distinct things which constitute a whole. Item applies mainly to each thing that is put down in a list, as of things needed, things to be done, things to be seen, etc., or in an account, a record, or an inventory: sometimes, the term applies to the actual thing as apart from the list; as, the bill has ten items; "each separate item of income" (J. A. Hobson); "The dog too went: the most noble-looking item in the beggarly assets [of an estate]" (Conrad). Detail (as here compared: see also PART) applies to each separate thing which enters into the building or construction of something, such as a house, a painting, a narrative, or enters into the performance of a task or job, the pursuit of a career, the living of a life, or the like: often, in this sense, detail is contrasted with structure, outline, design, and the like; as, "while...labouring indefatigably in the details of domestic life on a farm, her outlook was large" (H. Ellis); "Alike in its large outlines and its small details, Chinese life is always the art of balancing an aesthetic temperament and guarding against its excesses" (H. Ellis). Oftentimes, the singular form in this sense is used as a collective noun; as, "The poet's chief aim... is to communicate not the exact detail of an experience, but its tone and rhythm" (Day Lewis); to formulate a plan (or report an incident) in detail. Particular often implies a relation to something general or universal (as, "it foolishly derides the universal, saying that it chooses to consider the particular as more important"—Quiller-Couch), but still more often it implies a relation to any whole the individual units of which are called also items or details. In this sense, particular is often preferred to item and detail when it stresses smallness and the singleness and concreteness of each item or detail; thus, in law, a bill of particulars is a statement of the items of a plaintiff's claim or a defendant's counterclaim; so, I do not care to go into the particulars of the agreement; "the moment they bring us down from moral generalities to business particulars it becomes plain..." (Shaw); "The real question is what is the world... and that can be revealed only by the study of all nature's particulars" (W. James).

Ana. *Thing, object, article: constituent, component, *element, integrant, factor.

Itemized. Detailed, particularized, *circumstantial, minute, particular.

Ant. Summarized.

Iterate. *Repeat, reiterate, ingeminate.

Itinerant, adj. Itinerant, peripatetic, ambulatory, ambulant, nomadic, vagrant agree in meaning having no fixed or settled station but moving from place to place. Itinerant is applicable chiefly to individuals or to groups whose calling or office requires travel along a circuit or route; as, an itinerant player; an itinerant merchant. "An advantage itinerant preachers have over those who are stationary, the latter cannot well improve their delivery of a sermon by so many rehearsals" (Franklin). Peripatetic was first used in reference to the followers of Aristotle and the Aristotelian philosophy because Aristotle gave instruction to his disciples while walking in the Lyceum in Athens; it therefore usually is applied to activities carried on while walking or moving about; as, peripatetic teaching. "Peripatetic habits, favorable to Meditation" (Carlyle). When referred to persons, it is often used humorously to imply restlessness or a state of being constantly on the go; as, a very peripatetic young lady. Ambulatory and the less common ambulant sometimes, but not always, retain their etymological implication of walking: in such cases, they are close synonyms of pedestrian; as, ambulatory exercise; an ambulatory journey. More often, however, they imply, as pedestrian does not, ability to move about (thus, an ambulatory, or ambulant, patient is one not confined to bed or to his home) or, when applied to things, a lack of fixity not only in station (as, an ambulatory school or church) but in terms (as, the provisions of a will are ambulatory until a testator's death). Nomadic, though applicable to individuals, is more often used to designate groups or tribes of men who have no fixed place of residence but wander, according to season or food supply or the needs of their means of livelihood, from one place or region to another; thus, the Bedouins are a nomadic tribe found in the deserts of Arabia, Syria, and North Africa. Vagrant, though it stresses lack of a fixed residence, is applicable rather to individuals such as tramps or hobos than to races or tribes; it also carries implications of shiftlessness, aimlessness, and unsteadiness, not usually found in nomadic; as, the great increase in numbers of vagrant boys during the depression. "The adventure... of listening to Gallaher's stories and of sharing for a brief space Gallaher's vagrant... life" (Joyce).

Ana. Wandering, roving, rambling, straying, roaming, ranging (see WANDER): moving, shifting (see MOVE, v.).

Con. Security, safety (see corresponding adjectives at SAFE): immunity, *exemption.

jest, n. 1 Jest, joke, jape, quip, witticism, wisecrack, crack, gag come into comparison when they mean a remark, a comment, a story, or sometimes an act, intended to evoke laughter. Jest now seldom retains its older implication of taunting, jeering, or other ill-natured raillery (as, "Might he but set the rabble in a roar. He cared not with what jest!"—Couper). Although it still may imply raillery, it carries a stronger connotation of lightness or sportiveness and suggests banter, persiflage, or the like; as, "genial table-talk, Or deep dispute, and graceful jest" (Tennyson). Joke applies not only to something that is said but quite as often to an act or incident that is intended to excite uproarious laughter; as, to play a joke (usually a practical joke) upon a friend. When applied to a remark, comment, or story, it usually suggests a sportive sally designed to promote good humor without wounding the feelings of its object; as, "He takes his chirping pint, and cracks his joke" (Pope); "We shall have our little jokes, like other people" (Gray). Jape, a word that had become obsolete before Spenser's and Shakespeare's time, was revived by Lamb and others early in the nineteenth century and still occurs occasionally. In earliest use, it denoted a diverting or amusing story or anecdote (as, "Thomas, that jape is not worth a mite"—Chaucer); in its more modern use it comes nearer to jest or joke; as, "the coy giggle of the young lady to whom he has imparted his latest merry jape" (Besant). Quip applies especially to a quick, neatly turned jest flung off in banter, raillery, or sarcasm; as, "Quips and Cranks and wanton Wiles . . . And Laughter holding both his sides" (Milton); "The whole conversation is . . . a hailstorm of short stories, quips, and retorts" (Lever). Witticism is the polite or bookish term, wisecrack or crack the slang term, for an especially clever or witty retort to a question, comment on a situation, or the like. "There was a current witticism. . . that you called her [a frequently divorced and remarried woman] Eudora because it was the only one of her names of the continuity of which you felt at all certain!" (M. Austin). "He has a merry tongue which articulates scientific problems with what the contemporaries of his younger days called witticisms. His present contemporaries call them cracks" (Time). "Wise-crack dialogue of the wonderful American variety. 'That guy's so crooked the tears run down his back,' was one remark" (Daily Express). Gag (literally, something thrust into the mouth to prevent an outcry) was originally theatrical slang for an interpolated joke or witticism, or sometimes trick, or other amusing piece of business (as, the performance was lengthened by the numerous gags of the comedian); in current use, however, it applies also to any joke, witticism, or the like, forming a part of the script or text (as, to hire an author to write the gags for the radio program) or to any amusing remark, anecdote, trick, or the like, intended to make its subject appear ridiculous or ludicrous.

Ana. *Badinage, persiflage, raillery: bantering or banter, chaffing or chaff, rallying or rally, jollying or jolly (see corresponding verbs at BANTER): twitting or twit, ridiculing or ridicule, deriding or derision (see corresponding verbs at RIDICULE).

Con. Gloomy, morose, glum, *sullen, saturnine, dour: sedate, grave, solemn, staid, *serious.

join. Join, combine, unite, connect, link, associate, relate agree in meaning to attach or fasten one thing to another or several things to each other or to become so attached or fastened. Join presupposes prior separation or detachment and, therefore, implies a bringing or a coming together into contact or conjunction or, sometimes, an adding of one thing to another; as, to join two pieces of wood by dovetailing them; to join skirt lengths by seams; to join hands; to join a man and woman in matrimony; to join battle (that is, to come together in conflict); where the Mohawk River joins the Hudson; the opponents of the proposal decided to join forces. Join is the specific term when one becomes a member of a group or enters into the company of others as an equal; as, to join a society; to join a church; to join a group at a reception; to join one's ship; to join the army. Combine adds to join the implications of a mingling or blending of and of a common purpose or end; it is therefore used of two or more things (often immaterial things) that may lose or seem to lose their identities and become merged in each other; thus, one combines (not joins) the ingredients for a cake; to combine breakfast and lunch in one meal called "brunch"; to combine the training of the mind with the training of the body; "a gift for combining, for fusing into a single phrase, two or more diverse impressions" (T. S. Eliot); "With this quality of temperance was combined in Socrates a rare measure of independence and moral courage" (G. L. Dickinson). Unite may carry the basic implications of either join or combine, but it differs from each in stressing the oneness of that which results and the loss of signs of separation or division; thus, to unite two pieces of wood suggests not so much the way in which they are brought together as the fact that they comprise a new unit; one may combine the dry ingredients of a cake, but they will not become united until some liquid is added. "Our peace will, like a broken limb united, Grow stronger for the breaking" (Shak.). "When the ripe colours soften and unite, And sweetly melt into just shade and light" (Pope). "In France the whole people saw at once what was upon them; the single word patrie was enough to unite them in a common enthusiasm and stern determination" (Inge). Connect implies a loose or, at least, an obvious attachment of things to each other and the preservation not only of each thing's identity but also of the evidence of its physical or logical separateness; in this way it is distinguishable from join when physical attachment is implied; thus, a wall is built up of bricks joined (not connected) together by cement; a chain is made by connecting a succession of steel links. Often, but not necessarily, connect implies an intervening medium which permits joint movement, intercommunication, or the like; as, to connect two railway coaches by means of a coupler; to connect two islands with a bridge; ligaments serve to connect bones at a joint; to break a telephone connection; a connecting road (that is, a minor road which connects two routes or highways). When the idea of logical attachment is uppermost, connect usually implies that the ideas, events, or things (sometimes material as well as immaterial) have a bearing on each other, such as of cause and effect or effect and cause, generic likeness, or reference to the same person or thing; as, to see that the two incidents were connected; an unclassified flower is one that no botanist has yet been able to connect with any known species or genus; the police have now sufficient evidence to connect the suspect with the bombing; there is no logical connection between the paragraphs of this essay; anything connected with Napoleon is of interest to them. Connect (especially with a reflexive pronoun or in the passive), when used in reference to organizations or groups, is preferable to join when looseness of attachment, impermanence, or subordination is suggested; thus, one who joins a firm of brokers becomes, by implication, a partner; one who becomes, or is, connected with a firm of brokers is, by implication, an employee. Link, with its literal reference to one of the parts of a chain, is usually more emphatic than connect in implying firmness of attachment; it is therefore the preferred word when one wishes to preserve the basic implications of connect (preservation of each thing's identity and evidence of their separateness) and yet to avoid its common connotations of a weak or severable attachment; thus, to link a person with a crime is, by implication, to have ample evidence of his being its agent, or an accomplice, or the like. "Augustus set himself to revive the state religion... as part of his policy of linking up past and present, and as an instrument in securing the restoration of the old morality" (Buchan). Associate primarily implies a joining with another or others in companionship or in effort, usually on terms of equality; as, a group of men associated in business. "When bad men combine, good men must associate" (Burke). "My father's conviction that they were too lowly to associate with me, when it was so clear that I was too poor to associate with them, may have had some sort of imaginary validity for him; but for me it was snobbish nonsense" (Shaw). In its extended use as referred to things, the implication of companionship on equal terms gives way to the implication of a connection in logic or in thought which comes naturally or involuntarily to the mind of the observer because the things traditionally or, in one's experience, commonly, go together, or naturally or rightfully belong together, or for some reason or other have come to be linked together in one's thoughts, one suggesting the other. "For the artist life is always a discipline, and no discipline can be without pain. That is so even of dancing, which of all the arts is most associated in the popular mind with pleasure" (H. Ellis). "Every gesture and inflection of voice associated by tradition with the part" (Shaw). "A fir-tree is not a flower, and yet it is associated in my mind with prim-roses" (Jefferies). Relate implies a connection, or an attempt to show a connection, between two or more persons or things. In reference to persons it implies a connection through a common ancestor or through marriage (see KINSHIP); as, John and James are remotely related to each other. In reference to things, or to persons objectively regarded, it implies a logical connection or an attempt to demonstrate a logical connection, such as that of subordination or co-ordination, of cause and effect or vice versa, or the like; as, to relate one's misfortunes to events which preceded them; the two circumstances are not related; it is the dramatist's business to see the incidents of his play in their true relations to each other. "He suffers from an... incapacity to relate them [his poetic ideas] with any scheme of values" (Day Lewis). Ana. Conjoin, *unite, combine, co-operate, concur; articulate, concatenate, *integrate: attach, affix, *fasten: knit, *weave: *tie, bind.

Ant. Disjoin: part. — Con. *Separate, sever, sunder: *detach, disengage: disentangle, untangle, disembarass (see EXTRICATE).

joiner. *Carpenter, cabinetmaker, framer.

joint, n. Joint, articulation, suture are comprehensive terms denoting a place or part where two things are united or the mechanism by which they are united. Joint is the most inclusive of these terms and is commonly used in reference both to anatomical and mechanical structures. Specifically, it applies to any junction of two bones or cartilages in a vertebrate's body or to the part of the body at which there is such a junction; as, the knee joint; the joint at the elbow is flexible; he aches in every joint. In mechanical structures, it often names a connection made by shaping the ends of two pieces so that they come together at the proper angle, or fit closely into each other, sometimes forming a rigid union (as, a miter joint, a dovetail joint), at other times forming a union that permits movement (as, a universal joint). The term is also applied to a connective device, such as a bent piece joining pipes that meet at right angles (an elbow joint) or a layer of some plastic substance which unites bricks, stones, pieces of crockery, etc. (as, a mortar joint, a cement joint). Articulation is chiefly an anatomical term, though it has some extended and figurative use (see ARTICULATE, v. 1). In technical anatomical use, articulation is applicable to the same parts of the skeleton or body as joint; thus, one speaks of rigid or flexible joints (or articulations); the joint (or the articulation) at the knee. However, articulation in very precise use implies, as joint does not, a fitting together or adjustment of the two parts or bones with relation not only to each other but to the entire structure and its function. It is the preferable, but not always the required, word when the mechanism of a joint or the elements entering into its formation are under consideration; as, ball-and-socket structure of a movable articulation; various articulations are supported by ligaments; the synovial membrane reduces friction at an articulation. The word may also denote the process of joining or the adjustment in joining; as, "in the flat bones the articulations usually take place at the edges" (H. Gray); imperfect articulation of the jaw bones. It is used in dentistry chiefly with reference to the adjustment of the teeth and to the way in which their surfaces come together when the jaws are closed normally (as, an orthodontist corrects faults in the articulation of the teeth) or to the process by which artificial teeth are shaped and arranged so that they move upon each other properly and naturally; as, badly constructed dentures without proper articulation. Suture etymologically denotes a seam; it is used therefore of any joint or articulation that suggests a seam or that has been brought about by sewing; thus, the joints of the two parts of a pea pod are called respectively the ventral and dorsal sutures; the form of articulation observable in the skull where two flat bones meet in a line is called a suture. Suture is used in surgery of a seam, especially of one whereby two edges of an incision are brought together so that they may ultimately unite.

joke, n. *Jest, jape, quip, witticism, wisecrack, crack, gag.

Ana. *Prank, caper, antic, monkeyshine, dido: *trick, ruse, wile: travesty, parody, burlesque, *caricature: raillery, *badinage, persiflage: jocoseness, jocularly, facetiousness, wittiness, humorousness (see corresponding adjectives at WITTY): *wit, humor, repartee, sarcasm.

jollity. Hilarity, glee, *mirth.

Ana. Merriment, joviality, jocundity, blitheness (see corresponding adjectives at MERRY): sport, disport, play, frolic, rollick, gambol, romp (see under PLAY, v.): diversion, amusement, recreation, entertainment (see under AMUSE): *fun, jest, sport, game, play.

Con. Gloom, dejection, depression, melancholy, *sadness: solemnity, gravity, seriousness, earnestness, staidness, sedateness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

jolly, adj. Jovial, jocund, *merry, blithe.

Ana. Bantering, chaffing, rallying, jollying, joshing (see BANTER, v.): jocular, jocose, *witty, humorous, facetious: sportive, *playful, mischievous, wanton, roguish, wag-gish, frolicsome: gay, *lively, vivacious, animated, sprightly.

Con. Solemn, grave, sedate, staid, *serious, earnest: lugubrious, doleful, dolorous, *melancholy, rueful: morose, gloomy, glum, *sullen, dour, saturnine.

jolly, v. *Banter, chaff, rally, quiz, kid, rag, guy, rib, josh.

Ana. Blandish, cajole (see COAX): deride, *ridicule, twit, rally, mock, taunt.

josh, v. *Banter, chaff, rally, quiz, kid, rag, guy, rib, jolly.

jot, n. Tittle, iota, *particle, bit, mite, smitch, smidgen, whit, atom.

journal. Journal, periodical, newspaper, magazine, review, organ come into comparison as denoting a publication which appears regularly at stated times. Strictly, a journal is a publication which is issued daily and gives an account of the events, transactions, etc., of the preceding twenty-four hours. Continued use, however, has made it an acceptable designation of a publication that appears less often, such as a weekly, a monthly, or a quarterly; as, "[The Hibbert Journal] appeared every three months and called itself a journal" (C. Mackenzie).

Periodical is the strictly correct term for any publication appearing at regular intervals: it applies chiefly to weeklies, biweeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies; as, the periodicals are assembled in a special room of the library.

Newspaper is the usual term for a sheet or group of sheets providing the news of the day and issued, usually, six or seven days of the week: it is called a journal only in formal speech or writing, although those whose profession is writing for newspapers are often termed journalists and although the language and style believed to be typical of the newspaper is commonly called journalese. Magazine (etymologically, storehouse) applies chiefly to a periodical, often an illustrated periodical, which offers a number of miscellaneous articles, fiction, poetry, discussions of live questions, descriptive sketches, and the like. Review applies to a periodical that specializes in critical writings or in articles commenting on the important events and the significant questions of the day. Organ, which specifically means a medium of communication, usually applies to any journal or periodical that serves as a mouthpiece of a political party, a church, a business, an institution, or any organization that desires to give the news concerning it for the benefit of its members or adherents or to present its particular principles, doctrines, accomplishments, aspirations, or the like, authoritatively: as, "Science" is the official organ of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

journey, n. Journey, voyage, tour, trip, jaunt, excursion, cruise, expedition, pilgrimage come into comparison as meaning travel or a passage from one place to another. Journey is the most comprehensive term in literary or more formal colloquial use: it now carries no specific implications of length or shortness, of farness or nearness of destination, of a specific object or purpose, or of the mode of transportation; as, to plan a journey to California; to wish one a happy journey home; the journey to Italy will not take more than two months. "For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants" (Mark xiii. 34). Voyage was once almost as comprehensive a term as journey but in current use it always implies a journey of some length over water (especially a sea or ocean), or in more recent usage, through the air; as, "With a fair sea voyage, and a fair land journey, you will be soon at his dear side" (Dickens); "Packets which ply along the coast, as well as those which make voyages between Europe and America" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Tour applies only to a journey which follows a circuitous course from place to place; usually, the term implies that the journey ends when one reaches one's starting point; as, to set out on a walking tour; to make a tour of Western Europe; a lecture tour; penologists made a tour of all the prisons in the state; "My next design was to make a tour round the island" (Defoe). Trip, in strict use, applies to a relatively short journey, especially one for business or pleasure; as, his new position requires frequent trips to New York; weekend trips by automobile. In looser and colloquial use, the term is often used in place of journey; as, to plan a trip to Europe. Until approximately the middle of the eighteenth century, jaunt applied chiefly, if not exclusively, to a journey or trip that was found fatiguing. "I am a-weary, give me leave awhile: Fie, how my bones achen! What a jaunt have I had!" (Shak.). In current use, the term carries a stronger implication of casualness and of informality than any of the others, and is therefore often applied to any short trip away from one's home or one's business, especially in pursuit of recreation; as, they are off for a day's jaunt to the beach; "glad to see again its...welcoming façade when he returns home from any jaunt" (Lucas). Excursion (etymologically, a setting out or forth), as here compared, applies to a short trip, especially one taken for recreation or as a relief from the routine of daily life; as, "The rural neighbourhood of Sneyd, where they had been making an afternoon excursion" (Bennett). Excursion is the preferred term, especially in railroad and steamship use, for a round trip at reduced rates to any point of interest, such as a resort, or an exposition, or a metropolis. When the excursion involves a voyage of some days or weeks and, often, a sight-seeing tour with frequent stops during which the participants use the ship as their living quarters, cruise is the preferred term; as, a Mediterranean cruise; the steamship lines are featuring winter cruises through the Caribbean Sea; their yacht is off with a party on a cruise. Expedition, in current use especially, applies only to a journey intended to further a definite purpose; as, "He called this trip frankly a begging expedition" (Cather); he made a special expedition to the city to try to straighten out the difficulty; a group of ships under the command of Admiral Byrd sailed on an exploring expedition. In military use, expedition either implies the movement of troops especially into a foreign country to wage war (as, Caesar wrote a history of his expedition into Gaul) or applies to the body of troops so moved, also called expeditionary force (as, the young diplomat accompanied the expedition into France as an observer for his country). Pilgrimage applies strictly to an expedition to a place hallowed by religious or similar associations; often, but far from invariably, it implies an arduous journey or slow and difficult passage; as, the palmer had just returned from a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" is a collection of stories told by men and women on a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury; "Rydal Mount [Wordsworth's home] became an object of pilgrimage" (Arnold).

Of all these words, only pilgrimage, journey, and voyage are used figuratively denoting the passage through life; as, "Here is my journey's end, here is my butt, And very sea-mark of my utmost sail" (Shak.); "The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years" (Genesis xlvii. 9); "throes That nature's fragile vessel doth sustain In life's uncertain voyage" (Shak.).

jovial. Jolly, jocund, *merry, blithe.

Ana. Jocular, jocose, facetious, humorous, *witty: genial, sociable, affable (see GRACIOUS): good-natured, *amiable: bantering, chaffing, jolly, joshing, rallying (see BANTER, v.).

Con. Saturnine, dour, morose, gloomy, glum, *sullen: sedate, staid, grave, solemn, *serious.

joy. Delight, *pleasure, enjoyment, delectation, fruition. Ana. Bliss, beatitude, *happiness, felicity: *ecstasy, rapture, transport: elation, exultation (see corresponding adjectives at ELATED).

Ant. Sorrow (as emotion): misery (as a state of mind): abomination (in concrete sense).

joyful. Joyous, cheerful, happy, *glad, lighthearted.

Ana. Blithe, jocund, *merry, jolly: *elated, elate, exultant: buoyant, effervescent, expansive (see ELASTIC).

Ant. Joyless. — Con. *Despondent, despairing, desperate, forlorn, hopeless: depressed, weighed (down), oppressed (see OPPRESS).

joyous. Joyful, happy, *glad, cheerful, lighthearted.

Ana. Blithe, jocund, *merry: exultant, *elated, elate: rapturous, ecstatic, transported (see corresponding nouns at ECSTASY).

Ant. Lugubrious. — Con. Dolorous, doleful, *melancholy: *miserable, wretched.

judge, n. Judge, arbiter, arbitrator, referee, umpire are here compared as denoting a person who makes decisions in questions of justice, merit, taste, skill, performance, or the like. Judge implies the assumption or the possession both of superior knowledge, experience, or wisdom, and of the power to determine the truth by weighing critically and impartially the merits of the case. "It doth appear you are a worthy judge: You know the law, your exposition Hath been most sound" (Shak.). "A man who is no judge of law may be a good judge of poetry, or eloquence, or of the merits of a painting" (Dryden).

Arbiter stresses authoritativeness of decision and is applied to one, whether or not a professed judge, whose word or example is accepted as final and indisputable. "[Horace] had become the arbiter of taste...the persuasive exponent of a reasonable life, the clear, sad thinker who led no man astray" (A. Repplier). "They were the arbiters of fashion, the Court of last Appeal, and they knew it" (E. Wharton). "That 'common consent of mankind' which certain moralists make the arbiter in ethics" (Brownell). Arbiter, referee, and umpire are applied to persons to whom a dispute is referred for decision. Arbitrator specifically implies an aim to conciliate disputants by reaching a decision just to all concerned; it is commonly applied, therefore, to each member of a group (usually an odd number) whose selection has been approved by both parties; as, the Governor appointed as arbitrators two persons recommended by the striking miners, two recommended by the mineowners, and one person selected by both sides. Referee and umpire are employed chiefly in courts of law and in sports, but they have some literary use. In American legal use, referee is applied to an attorney at law appointed either to determine a case or to report on it to the court which he serves as an officer. It is therefore clearly distinguished from arbitrator in the United States. This distinction is not commonly observed in England. Umpire, on the other hand, is applied to the person selected to make a final decision when arbitrators have disagreed or are tied. Often, the one who serves actually, but not nominally, as umpire in a group of three, five, or seven arbitrators is the odd member who casts the deciding vote. In literary use, referee usually is applied to one to whom disputants have recourse when agreement seems impossible, umpire to one who enters in and arbitrarily ends the struggle or dispute. "Clear-sighted, unprejudiced, sagacious...he was the universal referee" (Disraeli). "Just death, kind umpire of men's miseries" (Shak.). In sports and games, both umpire (much the earlier term in this use) and referee are technical terms applied to the official or officials charged with the regulation of a contest, enforcement of rules of the game, making decisions on plays, and the like. In most sports today, either one term or the other is used; thus, these officials in baseball, cricket, tennis are designated umpires, the officials in boxing, basketball, ice hockey are designated referees. In American football, however, both terms are used, the term referee being applied to the official whose decision is final but who is especially judge of matters connected with the progress of the ball, as distinguished from the umpire, who is, in general, judge of the acts of the players.

judge, v. 1 Judge, adjudge, adjudicate, arbitrate agree in meaning to pass a decision upon something in dispute or controversy. All of these words imply the existence of a competent legal tribunal or of its equivalent. Judge is now more often used intransitively in the sense in which it is here considered; it implies mainly the investigation of evidence on both sides, a comparison of the merits of each case, and a decision as to where the truth lies; as, the court must judge between the claimants. Adjudge stresses decision by a court either at the end of a trial or during a legal process; as, the evidence was adjudged inadmissible; the court adjudged the will void; to be adjudged bankrupt; the prize was adjudged to the captor. Adjudicate, on the other hand, stresses formal deliberate determination of an issue by or as by a court; as, the court proceeded to adjudicate the rights and interests of the parties. "To obtain an adjudication of the supreme court of the United States on the validity of any such rights" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "It is useless to reargue a seemingly adjudicated case" (Lowes). Arbitrate implies deliberate determination of a matter in dispute by one or more persons who constitute an extrajudicial tribunal that may or may not be legally recognized and who are chosen by both sides to the controversy; as, the strikers and the employers finally agreed on a group of three men to arbitrate their differences. The decision reached through arbitration is not binding unless it is assented to by both parties, or is confirmed by a competent court. On the other hand, the decision reached by an adjudication is binding, unless it is reversed by a higher court.

Ana. Determine, *decide, settle, rule.

2 Conclude, deduce, *infer, gather.

Ana. *Prove, demonstrate, try, test.

judgment. 1 Conclusion, deduction, inference. See under INFER.

Ana. Decision, determination, ruling (see corresponding verbs at DECIDE): *opinion, conviction, persuasion, view, belief.

2 *Sense, wisdom, gumption.

Ana. Intelligence, wit, wits, brains, brain, *mind: sagaciousness or sagacity, perspicaciousness or perspicacity, shrewdness, astuteness (see corresponding adjectives at SHREWD): acumen, *discernment, insight, penetration: *prudence, discretion.

judicial. Judicial, judiciary, juridical (or juristic), juristic (or juristical) come into comparison because of verbal confusion and because all imply some connection with courts of law. Judicial, by far the most common of these adjectives both in legal and in general use, often implies a direct reference to the courts of justice, the judge who presides over a court of justice, or the judges who form such a court; as, a judicial decision; a judicial duty; a judicial proceeding. The term is also used in distinction from executive, legislative, etc., when applied to that one of the powers, departments, or functions of the government which is associated with that court (in the United States, the Supreme Court) which gives definitive decisions on questions of law or interprets the constitution or basic law; as, the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the government. When used in an extended sense, as applied especially to a type of mind, of mental activity, of manner, etc., the term suggests likeness to that of a judge, as in detachment or fair-mindedness, or appropriateness to a judge or court of justice, as in orderliness and seriousness of procedure; as, "To a strictly judicial mind... the quality of age or of novelty would carry no necessary implication of value" (Grandgent). Judiciary is sometimes used in place of judicial, especially when applied to a department or function of the government. "I like the organization of the government into Legislative, Judiciary and Executive" (Jefferson). In most use, however, it suggests reference to the courts in general and to the administration of justice as a whole; thus, a judicial act is an act involving the exercise of the power vested in a judge or court to hear and determine controversies or to determine a question of right or obligation; a judiciary act is a legislative act respecting the establishment or reform of the courts; a judicial question is one that requires settlement by a judge or court; a judiciary question is one that concerns the jurisdiction or powers of a court or the courts or the administration of justice by the courts. Judiciary is the only one of these terms now used as a substantive: so used it is a collective noun for judges as a class or for courts of justice. It may also be used in opposition to legislature and executive (as a noun). The last two words, juridical and juristic, imply a connection with the law, especially as it is administered in the courts, rather than with the judges, or those who settle questions of law. Often these terms come close to legal in meaning, but in learned use (they seldom occur elsewhere) they are more restricted in significance. Both terms, but especially juridical, imply a reference to the law as it appears to learned lawyers and judges—that is, as a highly complex and involved body of principles, statutes, decisions, precedents, and the like, requiring vast knowledge, skill in interpretation, and a keen logical mind in those who put it to use: therefore, the term often means characteristic of, determinable by, or useful to a person with such knowledge and skill; as, juridical reasoning; juridical evidence; "not Peace to depend on the juridical determination of perplexing questions" (Burke); "Foreigners in Turkey; Their Juridical Status" (title of a book by Philip Marshall Brown). Juristic implies rather a reference to the science of law (as, "[Justice] Holmes had struck in 1905 in his dissent in Lochner v. N.Y. the high pitch of American juristic thought"—The New Republic). It is, however, more often used in another sense in describing a legal person (a juristic—less often, a juridical—person), that is, a corporation, body, or state which is recognized by the law as a subject of rights and duties in the same manner as a human being.

Do not confuse judicial with judicious.

judiciary. *Judicial, juridical, juristic.

judicious. *Wise, sage, sapient, prudent, sensible, sane.

Ana. *Rational, reasonable: just, *fair, equitable, dispassionate, objective: sagacious, perspicacious, astute, *shrewd: discreet, prudent (see under PRUDENCE).

Ant. Injudicious: *asinine. — Con. *Foolish, silly, absurd, preposterous: *stupid, dull, dumb, crass, dense: rash, reckless, foolhardy (see ADVENTUROUS).

jumble, n. *Confusion, disorder, chaos, disarray, clutter, pie, snarl, muddle.

jumpy. Jittery, nervous, restless, uneasy, fidgety, *impatient, unquiet, restive, skittish, feverish, hectic.

Ant. Steady.

junction. Juncture, pass, exigency, emergency, contingency, pinch, strait, straits, crisis agree in denoting a critical or crucial time or state of affairs in the life of a person or institution, the history of a country, or the like. Juncture emphasizes the concurrence or convergence of events, especially of events that, when combined, convey a threat of danger or disaster, an intimation of one's duty, or the like; as, "It happened that just at that juncture was published a ridiculous book against him" (Warburton); "the Church of England is at the present juncture the one church upon which the duty of working towards reunion most devolves" (T. S. Eliot). Pass carries a stronger implication of the state of affairs brought about by a combination of causes than of the time at which their effect is noted; whether qualified or unqualified, the term usually connotes an evil or distressing condition; as, "Have his daughters brought him to this pass?" (Shak.); matters had come to such a pass that security seemed to him more desirable than independence. "Constance, after . . . reflection on the frightful pass to which destiny had brought her, had said that she supposed she would have to manage with a charwoman until Rose's advent" (Bennett). Exigency (see also NEED) strongly emphasizes the pressure or restrictions of necessity, or the urgency of the demands created by a juncture or pass; as, "[He] had conjured the king . . . not to insist too nicely upon terms in the present exigency of his affairs" (Ludlow). "It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Emergency stresses the suddenness or the unforeseen character of the juncture; the term may or may not imply that what constitutes an emergency has also the quality of an exigency, for the latter term is far stronger in its suggestion of extreme difficulty; as, "Of all the public services, that of the navy is the one . . . which can worst be supplied upon an emergency" (Burke); "It was a special provision . . . to meet a present emergency, and nothing more" (Ch. Just. Taney). "A presence of mind which no emergency can perturb" (C. W. Eliot). Contingency is occasionally used in place of exigency or emergency as here considered where the occurrence of that which is highly uncertain or no more than remotely possible is stressed; as, "Advantage might be taken of some political contingency for a private arrangement" (Froude). Pinch suggests the quality of exigency, but not the same intensity of strain; it is often used when the juncture occurs in personal affairs or is not as severe or as exorbitant in its demands on one's powers of resistance or endurance; as, "men who can do better than their best at a pinch" (T. Hughes); "This—the great pinch of his life" (N. Hawthorne). Strait, or now more commonly straits, applies to a situation from which the person involved finds it difficult to escape, so hampered or fettered is he by some given or implied set of circumstances; as, he was in great straits for lack of money; "Take me; I'll serve you better in a strail" (Tennyson); "This disagreeable companion had, of his own free will, assisted him in the strail of the day" (Dickens); "He was at a loss what to invent to detain him . . . He rendered homage to the genius of woman in these straits. 'My Aunt,' he thought, 'would have the lie ready'" (Meredith). Crisis applies to any juncture or pass the outcome of which has or will have a decisive effect and which, therefore, serves as a turning point in a life or a history, or, in medical use, of a disease. The term usually connotes suspense, but it may or may not suggest inherent evil in the situation; as, the pneumonia patient has passed the crisis safely; "Tiberius gave one million pounds out of his own pocket to relieve the agrarian crisis of A.D. 33" (Buchan); "Father finally . . . brought the matter to a crisis. He said, after all, the boy had a right to choose" (M. Austin); "this crisis will be surmounted if the Church has the faith and courage, and, above all, the common honesty, to face it candidly" (Inge).

Ana. *State, posture, situation, condition, status: *predicament, plight, quandary.

junk, v. Scrap, *discard, cast, shed, molt, exuviate, slough.

junto. Faction, ring, cabal, bloc, *combination, combine, party.

Ana. Clique, coterie, *set.

juridical or juridic. Juristic, *judicial, judiciary.

jurisdiction. *Power, authority, control, command, sway, dominion.

Ana. Limits, bounds, confines (see singular nouns at LIMIT): *range, scope, compass, reach: circuit, ambit, periphery (see CIRCUMFERENCE): province, office, *function, duty: domain, territory, province, *field, sphere, bailiwick.

juristic or juridical. Juridical, *judicial, judiciary.

just, adj. 1 *Upright, honorable, conscientious, scrupulous, honest.

Ana. Strict, *rigid: virtuous, righteous, *moral, ethical, noble: *reliable, dependable, tried, trustworthy.

Con. *Crooked, devious, oblique: corrupt, perverted, debauched, depraved (see under DEBASE): *base, low, vile: ignoble, *mean.

2 Equitable, *fair, impartial, unbiased, dispassionate, uncolored, objective.

Ana. Detached, disinterested, aloof (see INDIFFERENT): *due, rightful, condign: *rational, reasonable.

Ant. Unjust.

justice. Justice, equity are comparable terms largely because of their legal uses and chiefly because they agree in denoting the act, practice, or obligation of giving or rendering to a person or thing that which is his (or its) due, as in conformity with right, truth, or the dictates of reason. Justice is by far the wider-ranging term, for it may apply to an abstraction which represents an ideal (as, "He [Galsworthy] flamed out against injustice because he was a lover of justice"—Bliss Perry), or to a quality of mind which exhibits adherence to this ideal (as, "Nothing escaped the kind eyes, the far-seeing love, that punished and praised with that calm justice which children so keenly appreciate"—Deland), or to a quality in a thing which never departs from the truth in the slightest degree (as, "[Pepys] painted a psychological portrait of himself which for its serenely impartial justice, its subtle gradations . . . has all the qualities of the finest Velasquez"—H. Ellis), or to the treatment accorded one who has transgressed a law—divine law, natural law, the law of a state, etc.—or who seeks relief when wronged or protection when his rights are threatened (as, "At the present time . . . there is more danger that criminals will escape justice than that they will be subjected to tyranny"—Justice Holmes), or to the system of courts of law whereby the rights of an individual or his innocence or guilt are determined in accordance with the laws of the state (as, "In the modern state . . . Justice and administration are directly connected with whatever governs"—Belloc). Equity differs from justice chiefly in being more restricted in its denotation, for it usually implies a justice that transcends the strict letter of the law and is in keeping with what is reasonable rather than with what is merely legal. It is in this sense that a court of equity is, theoretically at least, distinguished from a court of law. To the former go for adjudication and settlement the unusual cases where abstract justice might not be dealt out according to the limitations of the written law: to the latter go the vast majority of cases where the determination of facts is of first importance and where the law, once the facts are established, provides the treatment to be accorded the person or parties involved. But equity in nonlegal use implies a justice based upon a strictly impartial meting out of rewards and punishments, of praise and blame, or the like, all conditions of fair play being respected; as, "The plain confidence of an honest servant in the equity of a discerning master" (Burke); the union claimed that the lower wages paid to aliens were not in keeping with any principle of equity.

justify. 1 Vindicate, defend, *maintain, assert.

Ana. *Prove, demonstrate: *support, uphold, back.

Con. *Disprove, refute, confute.

2 Account for, rationalize, *explain.

Ana. *Excuse, condone: *exculpate, exonerate, absolve, acquit, vindicate: extenuate, gloze, gloss, whitewash, *palliate.

Con. Incriminate, indict, arraign, *accuse: condemn, denounce, blame (see CRITICIZE).

3 Justify, warrant are here compared as meaning to afford, as evidence, a circumstance, a situation, a state of affairs, or the like, good grounds for doing, saying, using, or believing something. Justify implies the provision of grounds so good that they satisfy one's reason and, often, one's conscience, especially if there is a conflict between what seems necessary and what is morally right; as, "He says that more men are killed by overwork than the importance of this world justifies" (Kipling); "no consideration on earth justifies a parent in telling lies to his child" (B. Russell). "I remember a very tender-hearted judge being of opinion that closing a hatch to stop a fire and the destruction of a cargo was justified even if it was known that doing so would stifle a man below" (Justice Holmes). Warrant implies support by authority, precedent, experience, logic, and the like: the term rarely suggests moral grounds; as, "So bred, no wonder if I took the bent that seemed even warranted by thy consent" (Dryden); "the dimensions are not great, though greater than safe construction warranted" (H. Adams); "Public danger warrants the substitution of the executive process for the judicial process" (Justice Holmes); "[The experiment] warranted the deduction that a diet which included vitamin B was a preventive for beri-beri" (V. Heiser).

Ana. Allow, permit (see LET): sanction (see APPROVE): *authorize.

juvenile. *Youthful, puerile, boyish, virgin, virginal, maiden.

Ana. *Immature, unmaturing, unfledged: callow, green, crude (see RUDE).

Ant. Adult: senile. — Con. *Mature, matured, grown-up, full-fledged.

juxtaposed. *Adjacent, adjoining, contiguous, abutting, tangent, conterminous.

Ana. *Close, near, nigh.

K

keen, adj. 1 *Sharp, acute.

Ana. Piercing, penetrating, probing (see ENTER): *pungent, poignant, piquant: cutting, biting, *incisive, trenchant.

Ant. Blunt. — Con. *Dull, obtuse.

2 *Eager, avid, agog, a-tiptoe, athirst, anxious.

Ana. Ardent, fervent, fervid, perfervid (see IMPASIONED): *intense, vehement: fired, inflamed, enkindled (see LIGHT, v.).

Con. Apathetic, *impassive, stolid, phlegmatic: uninterested, *disinterested: listless, *languid: unconcerned, incurious, *indifferent.

keen, v. Weep, weep, *cry, whimper, blubber.

Ana. Lament, bewail, bemoan (see DEPLORE): mourn, sorrow, *grieve.

keep, v. 1 Keep, observe, celebrate, solemnize, commemorate come into comparison only when they mean to pay proper attention or honor to something prescribed, obligatory, or demanded by one's nationality, religion, rank, or the like. They are, however, not close synonyms except in smaller groups because they vary widely in their range of reference or application. Keep and observe are closely synonymous terms, especially when they imply heed of that which is prescribed or obligatory, but they differ fundamentally in their connotations. Keep implies opposition to break, and emphasizes the idea of not neglecting or violating; as, to keep (not observe) a promise; to keep (not observe) the peace; to keep (not observe) the commandments. Observe carries positive implications, such as punctiliousness in performance of the required acts, rites, and the like, and usually, a spirit of respect or reverence for that which one heeds or honors; when these ideas are definitely to be suggested, observe is the precise term, even though keep would otherwise be possible; as, few persons observe (better than keep) the Sabbath in the manner of the early Puritans; they observe (better than keep) Passover (or Lent) with the utmost strictness; he observes (not keeps) the letter of the law; the veterans of the World War observe Memorial Day. Celebrate and solemnize are also close synonyms because they may take as their objects not only a day, a season, or an occasion which for religious, political, or other significant reasons is observed with pomp and ceremony, but also a ceremony or rite (usually a religious ceremony or rite) that is marked with unusual dignity and splendor. Celebrate, however, except in certain idiomatic phrases (such as, to celebrate the Eucharist; to celebrate Mass), now suggests demonstrations, often public demonstrations of joy or festivity, such as by singing, shouting, speechmaking, feasting, and the like; as, to celebrate Independence Day; to celebrate New Year's Eve; to celebrate their golden wedding; the family decided to celebrate the occasion by a large dinner party. Solemnize, on the other hand, now tends to be restricted in its reference to religious ceremonies, especially the ceremonies attending the marriage of a couple; thus, in the Roman Catholic Church, to solemnize a marriage is not merely to unite a couple in marriage according to the rite of the church but to follow this ceremony by a nuptial Mass and a special blessing; in the Anglican Communion, the same phrase implies the following in detail of the Form of Solemnization of Marriage in the Book of Common Prayer. In the past, and still on occasion, the term, when used in reference to a time or occasion, suggests greater formality and gravity in observance and greater dignity and splendor of ceremony than celebrate. "This blessed day Ever in France shall be kept festival: To solemnize this day the glorious sun Stays in his course" (Shak.). "We solemnize this sorrowing natal day To prove our loyal truth" (Burns). Commemorate in strict use always implies remembrance; as here compared, it also suggests observances that tend to call to mind what the day, the season, the ceremony, or whatever is celebrated, stands for; thus, one celebrates Christmas by religious ceremonies that commemorate the birth of Christ; the people of the United States commemorate the birth of their independence on the 4th of July; the French people commemorate the fall of the Bastille on the 14th of July.

Ana. Regard, respect (see under REGARD, n.).

Ant. Break. — Con. *Neglect, ignore, forget, disregard, overlook, omit, alight: violate, transgress, contravene, infringe (see corresponding nouns at BREACH).

2 Sometimes keep back. Keep, keep back, retain, detain, withhold, reserve, hold back, as here compared, agree in meaning not to let go from one's possession, custody, or control. Keep is the most general of these terms, often carrying no further implications; as, keep this until I ask for it. When, however, it positively denotes a holding securely in one's possession, custody, or control, keep or, often, keep back, is synonymous with one or another of the last five words, all of which convey, in general, the same idea but vary in some of their implications. Each one, because of its narrower meaning and greater explicitness, is in some collocations preferable to keep. Retain implies continued keeping, especially as against threatened seizure or forced loss; as, Germany was unable to retain [not keep] her colonies after the first World War. "The conception of one who... poor, sickly, and a slave perhaps, or even in prison or on the rack, should nevertheless retain unimpaired the dignity of manhood and the freedom of his own soul" (G. L. Dickinson). Detain (see also ARREST, 2), as well as keep back, implies a delay in letting go from one's possession or control, as money when due, or a train or messenger when ready to depart; as, to detain a ship in quarantine; to detain a suspect for examination. Withhold, in some contexts, may be used in place of detain; as, to detain (or withhold) a part of a preferred dividend. In general, however, withhold implies restraint in letting go or a refusal to let go. Sometimes it is interchangeable with keep, or keep back, especially when hindrance is also implied; as, timidity caused him to withhold (or keep back) the advice he longed to give. Sometimes, keep and withhold are widely different in meaning; thus, to withhold one's promise is to refuse to give one's promise; to keep (see KEEP, 1) one's promise is to fulfill that which has been promised. Reserve implies either a keeping in store for other or for future use (as, the runner reserved some of his energy for the final sprint; to reserve some of the milk for the next day's breakfast) or a withholding from present or from others' use, enjoyment, or the like (as, "the force of will which had enabled her to reserve the fund intact"—Bennett; to reserve one's judgment). This term, also, is not invariably interchangeable with keep; as, please reserve (or keep) a room for me; to reserve (not keep) a part of each month's income. Hold back is often used in place of withhold or keep back and sometimes in place of detain and reserve when restraint (either self-imposed, or originating in oneself, or imposed by others) in letting go is implied; as, to hold back a portion of each week's wages for group insurance; to hold back the truth in giving testimony.

Ana. *Save, preserve, conserve: hold, *have.

enjoy, possess, own: control, direct, manage, *conduct. Ant. Relinquish. — Con. *Discard, cast, junk: refuse, reject, repudiate, spurn (see DECLINE, v.): surrender, abandon, resign, yield (see RELINQUISH).

keep, n. *Living, livelihood, subsistence, sustenance, maintenance, support, bread.

ken, n. Purview, *range, reach, scope, compass, sweep, gamut, radius, horizon, orbit.

Ana. *Field, sphere, province, domain: view, sight (see LOOK, n., 1).

kibitzer. Onlooker, looker-on, bystander, *spectator, observer, beholder, witness, eyewitness.

kick, v. *Object, protest, remonstrate, expostulate.

Ana. *Oppose, combat, resist, withstand: *criticize, denounce, condemn: objurgate, *execrate, curse, damn, anathematize.

kid, v. Rally, chaff, *banter, rag, guy, rib, josh, jolly, quiz.

Ana. Tease, plague, pester, harry, *worry.

kidnap. *Abduct.

kidney. Kind, sort, *type, nature, description, character, stripe, ilk.

kill, v. Kill, slay, murder, assassinate, dispatch (or despatch), execute agree in meaning to deprive of life or to put to death. Kill is so general that it merely states the fact and does not, except in special phrases (such as "Thou shalt not kill"), suggest human agency and the means of death or the conditions attending the putting to death. Also, the object of the action may be not only a person or a living thing but also an inanimate thing that has qualities suggestive of life; as, the rebels killed the king; cancer killed the king; grief over the loss of his son killed the king; the president killed the project when he vetoed the bill making an appropriation for it; to kill a friend's love by indifference; the city editor killed the story (that is, prevented its publication). "He believed at that time that the League of Nations was going to kill war, that the Labour Party were going to kill industrial inequity" (R. Macaulay). Slay implies killing by force or in wantonness; it is rare in spoken English, but it often occurs in written English, sometimes in poetic or elevated writing, at other times in journalese; as, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him" (Job xiii. 15); "He could not slay a thing so fair" (Byron); "Slay not him who gave you life" (Tennyson); the gangsters slew the man in cold blood; the slain man has not yet been identified. In its extended uses, slay usually suggests wanton or deliberate destruction or annihilation. "To slay The reverence living in the minds of men" (Shelley). "Never had she greatly loved before; never would she greatly love again; and the great love she now had she was slaying" (R. Macaulay). Murder definitely implies a motive and, often, premeditation, and imputes to the act a criminal character; it is the exact word to use in reference to one person killing another either in passion or in cold blood; as, Macbeth murdered Duncan; Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, was murdered in his own cathedral. It is sometimes used in place of kill as more expressive, or in place of slay as more brutally direct and condemnatory, both in literal and extended use. "Glamis hath murder'd sleep, and therefore Cawdor Shall sleep no more; Macbeth shall sleep no more" (Shak.). "The language of strategy and politics is designed... to make it appear as though wars were not fought by individuals drilled to murder one another in cold blood" (A. Huxley). Assassinate implies murder (especially of an important person) by stealth or treachery, and often by an agent (sometimes a self-appointed agent) or hiring of an opposition. It usually suggests an attempt to get rid of a person who is believed (often fanatically) to be an obstacle to the safety of a tyrant, the welfare of a people, the liberty of a nation, or the success of a design; as, Marat was assassinated by Charlotte Corday; at least two attempts were made to assassinate William of Orange; the assassination of President Lincoln. Dispatch also suggests an attempt to get rid of a person by killing him, but it is far more colorless than assassinate. It nearly always implies taking direct means of killing, as by shooting or stabbing, and so sometimes connotes expedition or speed in killing, or in ending suffering. "Edmund, I think, is gone. In pity of his misery, to dispatch His [Gloucester's] nighted life" (Shak.). "And the company shall stone them with stones, and dispatch them with their swords" (Ezekiel xlii. 47). Oftentimes, however, it is merely a euphemism for any of the terms of this group when quick killing or a sudden end is implied. "Meanwhile, Hercules has (contrary to the usual belief that Seneca [the dramatist] murders all his victims in full view of the audience) despatched Lycus off-stage" (T. S. Eliot). Execute is the term for putting to death one who has been condemned to such a fate by a legal or military process, or sometimes by summary action of a group; as, to execute the convicted assassin by hanging.

kind, n. *Type, sort, nature, description, character, stripe, kidney.

kind, adj. Kind, kindly, benign, benignant agree in meaning having or exhibiting a nature that is gentle, considerate, and inclined to benevolent or beneficent actions. As here compared they are chiefly, but not exclusively, applied to persons and to their acts and utterances. Kind and kindly both imply possession of qualities appropriate to man as a rational, sensitive, and social being, such as interest in others' welfare, sympathy, humaneness, and the like. The two words are often used interchangeably without loss; as, a kind (or kindly) person. Nevertheless, especially in current usage, they tend to be distinguished, kind implying reference to a disposition to be sympathetic and helpful, and kindly to the expression of a benevolent, sympathetic, or helpful nature, mood, or impulse; thus, he has a kind (better than kindly) heart; he takes a kindly (not kind) interest in ambitious boys; be kind (not kindly) to animals; the kindly (better than kind) ministrations of a nurse; a severe but kind (or kindly, if the emphasis is on his acts rather than his nature) teacher; kindly words of advice. "The kindest man, The best-condition'd and unwearied spirit In doing courtesies" (Shak.). "Ring in the valiant man and free, The larger heart, the kindlier hand!" (Tennyson). Benign (see also FAVORABLE) and benignant stress mildness, serenity, and mercifulness more than do kind and kindly; they also often imply graciousness and therefore are more frequently applied to superiors than to equals, when they are used to describe persons, their acts, utterances, policies, or the like; as, a benign master; "The meek, benign, and lacerated face [of the crucified Jesus]" (Wordsworth); the benign rule of a benevolent despot; a benignant influence; "Strange peace and rest fell on me from the presence Of a benignant Spirit standing near" (E. R. Sill).

Ana. Benevolent, *charitable, humane, altruistic, philanthropic, humanitarian: sympathetic, warm, warmhearted, responsive, *tender, compassionate: clement, lenient, indulgent, merciful, *forbearing, tolerant: *amiable, good-natured, complaisant, obliging.

Ant. Unkind. — Con. Cruel, inhuman, *fierce, savage, fell: harsh, *rough: *grim, implacable, unrelenting, merciless.

kindle. Enkindle, ignite, fire, inflame, *light.

kindly. Benign, benignant, *kind.

Ana. *Gracious, cordial, genial, affable, sociable: *amiable, good-natured, complaisant, obliging: friendly, neighborly (see AMICABLE): considerate, *thoughtful, attentive.

Ant. Unkindly: acrid (of temper, attitudes, comments, etc.).

— Con. Malevolent, malign, *malicious, spiteful.

kindred. *Related, cognate, allied, affiliated.

Ant. Alien.

kingly. Kingly, regal, royal, queenly, imperial, princely come into comparison as meaning of, relating to, or befitting one who occupies a throne. Kingly (derived from Old English), regal (derived from Latin), and royal (derived from Old French) are often interchanged, especially when used in reference to a monarch who is called king (as, the kingly, regal, or royal power), but usage shows a preference for kingly when the reference is to the personal or ideal character of a king, to his feelings, disposition, aims, actions, or the like (as, kingly courtesy; kingly condescension; "Leave kingly backs to cope with kingly cares"—Cowper), for regal when the reference is to the king's office, or the state or pomp which accompanies the exercise of his powers (as, regal ceremonies; regal interchanges of courtesies; regal functions), and for royal when the reference is to persons or things associated with the king either as a person or as a monarch, but not necessarily involving magnificence or display (as, the royal family; royal rank; the royal residences; royal domains; a royal society is one under the patronage of the king or members of his family). Figuratively, kingly carries the strongest implication of dignity and nobility (as, kingly pride; kingly qualities); regal, of magnificence or majestic character (as, a regal feast; "regal trees"—Lytton); royal, of superlative excellence (as, a royal welcome; to have had a royal time; royal entertainment). Queenly is used in place of kingly when the reference is directly to a person who is the female sovereign (in place of a king) or is the consort of a king; as, queenly courtesy; queenly prerogatives. But when the reference is to the office, the family of the queen, or to anything to which regal and royal are normally applied, the latter adjectives are used without reference to the sex of the sovereign. Imperial suggests reference to a monarch who is called emperor or empress; as, His Imperial Majesty; an imperial court; the imperial power. In extended use, the term commonly implies a more awe-inspiring quality than kingly (as, imperial pride; imperial condescension), and more pomp and grandeur than regal or royal (as, imperial banquets; imperial palaces). Princely implies reference to one who is called a prince in any sense but especially to one who is so called as the monarch of a principality, or as the heir to a royal throne, or as a male member of the immediate royal family; as, "the representative of the princely power" (S. Austin); "Among the princely houses of Western Europe" (Freeman). In its extended use, princely often carries a strong implication of sumptuousness (as, "two princely temples, rich with painting and many-colored marble"—Macaulay), or of opulence or munificence (as, "he had been told to spend his princely allowance in a princely manner, and to return home with a gallery of masterpieces"—E. Wharton).

kinship. Kinship, affinity, consanguinity, cognation, agnation, enation are here compared only in their technical senses. All designate family relationship. Kinship is the most general, denoting relationship either by blood or by marriage; it also is the richest in connotations, usually suggesting closeness in feeling and in interests. Affinity refers to connection by marriage; consanguinity, to connection by blood. Cognition is equivalent to consanguinity, but is rarely used today; agnation implies relationship, either, as in Civil law, exclusively through males, or as in English and Scots law, through one's father; enation implies relationship on one's mother's side.

knack. Bent, turn, *gift, faculty, aptitude, genius, talent.

Ana. *Ability, capacity, capability: aptness, readiness, quickness (see corresponding adjectives at quick): facility, dexterity, ease, *readiness.

Ant. Ineptitude.

knit, v. *Weave, crochet, braid, plait, tat.

Ana. *Join, connect, link, unite.

knotty. Intricate, involved, complicated, *complex.

knowing. Alert, bright, smart, *intelligent, clever, quick-witted, brilliant.

Ana. *Shrewd, astute, perspicacious, sagacious: *watchful, vigilant, alert: discerning, observing or observant, perceiving or perceptive (see corresponding verbs at SEE).

Con. Obtuse, *dull, blunt: dense, crass, *stupid.

knowledge. Knowledge, science, learning, erudition, scholarship, information, lore, as here compared, agree in meaning that which is known or which can be known, usually by an individual but sometimes by human beings in general. Knowledge applies not only to any body of facts gathered by study, investigation, observation, or the like, but also to any body of ideas acquired by inference from such facts or accepted on good grounds as truths; as, his knowledge is both extensive and accurate; he has no special knowledge of conditions abroad. "Strength and bustle build up a firm. But judgment and knowledge are what keep it established" (Hardy). "The inventor of the radio... had the advantage of accumulated knowledge" (J. W. Krutch). Science (see also ART, 3) was often in the past and is still occasionally employed as a close synonym of knowledge; as, "All this new science that men here [teach]" (Chaucer). In current use it commonly applies only to the (or a) body of systematized knowledge dealing with facts gathered over a long period and by numerous persons as a result of observation and experiment, and with the general truths, or laws, derived by inference from such facts. The term usually connotes more exactness and more rigorous testing of conclusions than knowledge does, and therefore is often used to denote knowledge the certainty of which cannot be questioned. "An osteopath undertakes to be something more than a nurse or masseur, and the difference rests precisely in a claim to greater science" (Justice Holmes). "Perhaps all the science that is not at bottom physical science is only pretentious nescience" (Shaw). Learning specifically applies to knowledge gained by long and close study, not only in the schools or universities, but by individual research and investigation; it may be used of those who are engaged in the study of science, but it is more often employed in reference to those who devote themselves to the study of languages, literature, history, philosophy, or the like; as, "he is a man... of deep learning" (Burney); "Learning is the knowledge of that which is not generally known to others" (Haskitt); "Jonson failed as a tragic dramatist... because his genius was for satiric comedy and because of the weight of pedantic learning with which he burdened his two tragic failures" (T. S. Eliot). Erudition carries a stronger implication of the possession of profound or recondite or bookish knowledge than does learning, but often the terms are employed as if they were equivalent in meaning; as, "I arrived at Oxford with a stock of erudition, that might have puzzled a doctor" (Gibbon); "it does not seem to me fitting... that one layman, with no special erudition in that subject, should publicly express his views" (T. S. Eliot). Scholarship implies the possession of the learning characteristic of the trained scholar; the term usually suggests mastery in detail of a given field of study or investigation, the exhibition of such qualities as accuracy and skill in carrying on research intended to extend knowledge in that field, and the display of powers of critical analysis in the interpretation of the material that is gathered; as, scholarship is essential to any person who proposes to write a history of any nation, period, or movement; "that this conception [of the relation between art and nature] is Aristotelian, even the essential Greek conception, is no testimony to Shakespeare's scholarship" (H. Ellis). Information may or may not apply to knowledge gained by haphazard methods, for the term carries no specific implication regarding the extent, character, or soundness of that knowledge. The word usually denotes a kind of knowledge that is gathered from other persons or from books and is accepted as truth; often, but not necessarily, with the implication that it has neither been confirmed nor verified; as, useless information; his sources of information are not always reliable. "I look with sorrow on the habit... of making a considerable part of the education of the place to turn on the art of serving up gobbets of prepared information in essays... It is the business of a university to... impart solid knowledge" (F. Harrison). "The theme-writing high-school student could scarcely be sent there [to Hawthorne's 'Scarlet Letter'] for information regarding the manners and dress and interiors of Puritan society" (Cather). "What we need [in understanding Dante's mind] is not information but knowledge: the first step to knowledge is to recognize the differences between his form of thought and feeling and ours" (T. S. Eliot). Lore is sometimes used in poetry in place of learning, but more often in current English it applies to a body of special or out-of-the-way knowledge pertaining to a particular subject (such as plant life, the fables, the habits of birds, etc.) possessed by an individual or by a group, and traditional and anecdotal rather than scientific in its character; as, "the lore of bards and sages old" (Shelley); "Skill'd in legendary lore" (Goldsmith); sacred lore; folklore; plant lore.

Ant. Ignorance.

labor or labour, n. 1 *Work, toil, travail, swink, drudgery, grind.

Ana. *Effort, exertion, pains, trouble: endeavor, striving, struggle (see under ATTEMPT, v.).

Con. *Rest, repose, relaxation, leisure, ease: recreation, diversion, amusement, entertainment (see under AMUSE): inactivity, idleness, inertness or inertia, passiveness (see corresponding adjectives at INACTIVE).

2 Travail, *childbirth, parturition, delivery, accouchement.

laborer. Workingman, workman, *worker, craftsman, handicraftsman, mechanic, artisan, operative, hand, roustabout.

labyrinth. Labyrinth, maze come into comparison when they mean an exceedingly tortuous path or course or a highly complicated arrangement of paths or courses (literal or figurative) which it is difficult or impossible to follow without a means of guidance. Labyrinth was originally applied to an enclosure of intricate design constructed by Daedalus for Minos, King of Crete, for confining the Minotaur, from which Theseus was able to escape because he was guided by a clew, or ball of thread, provided by Ariadne, the king's daughter. In its extended use, the term implies structural intricacy, the result of many divergences from a straight course or of many convolutions. It is therefore applied to the bony and membranous part of the internal ear, to portions of the cortex of the kidney, and to other anatomical structures manifesting a similar complexity, as well as to any highly complicated arrangement or design in which involved paths, lines, grooves, and the like, are resorted to for an artistic or utilitarian end; as, "arranged plantations, with . . . dry and pleasant walks and labyrinths, and artificial echoes" (L. P. Smith); by means of a labyrinth of channels, it was found possible to avoid the flooding of the lowlands. In purely figurative use, labyrinth often suggests almost hopeless involvement or extreme difficulty in escaping; as, "he was trying . . . to find his way through the . . . labyrinth of passion through which he was wandering" (Wilde). Maze suggests not confusing convolutions but a confusing and bewildering network: it implies so many possibilities or so many false leads that one is bewildered or constantly baffled or frustrated by finding oneself in a blind alley or at a dead end; as, the maze at Hampton Court; the older section of the city was a maze of streets; lost in the mazes of philosophy; "the maze of educative forces that have made the child what it is" (H. Suzzallo).

lack, n. Lack, absence, privation, defect, want. All of these words except absence often imply deficiency or a falling short, but in their abstract senses, in which they are here compared, they denote the fact or the state of being without something expressed or implied. Because of this dual and confusing use, lack usually requires qualification to express totality; as, he shows an entire lack of courtesy; complete lack of rest for three days. Absence, however, is unequivocal; it is therefore usually preferred in careful discourse. "Mark's inward discontent . . . not so much discontent as absence of content, for it was rather a spiritual emptiness" (C. Mackenzie). "Absolute liberty is absence of restraint" (H. Adams). Privation (as here compared: see also POVERTY) is chiefly in philosophical use; it is there employed in defining a word, a concept, or an idea expressing a negative state or quality in terms of its opposite, or positive, word, concept, or idea. Privation therefore suggests the absence of all the marks, attributes, or characters implied in the positive; as, cold is the privation of heat; darkness is the privation of light. Defect, like lack, sometimes connotes inadequacy: as here compared it (and, often, its derivative defective) implies the absence in something either of characters alien to its nature or of a quality or an element necessary to its completeness or perfection. "Either sex alone is half itself, and in true marriage . . . each fulfills Defect in each" (Tennyson). "Be mine the privilege to supplement defect Give dumbness voice" (Browning). Want implies either the absence of something essential or indispensable or a deficiency in the supply; as, "For want of a nail the shoe is lost, for want of a shoe the horse is lost, for want of a horse the rider is lost" (Herbert); "The battle was over, and, but for want of fresh troops, the Afghans would have been wiped off the earth" (Kipling); "this want of foresight and care" (Ch. Just. Taney); "the poet's want of taste" (Quiller-Couch). Want also is applicable to a need that is felt or apprehended by the person or persons concerned and so often comes closer to desire or wish than to need; as, it is difficult to satisfy all his wants; he has few wants.

Ana. *Need, necessity, exigency: deficiency (see corresponding adjective DEFICIENT): exhaustion, impoverishment, draining, depletion (see corresponding verbs at DEplete).

Con. Sufficiency, adequacy, competence (see corresponding adjectives at SUFFICIENT): abundance, ampleness, copiousness, plentifulness, plenteousness or plenty (see corresponding adjectives at PLENTIFUL): *excess, superfluity, surplus.

lack, v. Lack, want, need, require are here compared as meaning to be without something, especially something essential or greatly to be desired. Lack may imply either an absence of that something or a shortage in the supply or amount; as, to lack a knowledge of French; the house lacks a back stairway; the army lacked tanks and airplanes as well as rifles; they are not lacking in food or comforts; "Good counsellors lack no clients" (Shak.); "Several establishments lacked tenants" (Bennett). Want frequently but not invariably adds to lack the implication of pressing desire or of urgent necessity. The sense here considered is not always clearly distinguishable from the sense (of want) as discriminated at DESIRE. For this reason, need is often preferred when a clear connotation of urgent necessity is desirable; thus, he cannot get the rest he needs [rather than wants]; "like an angry hive of bees That want their leader" (Shak.); the house wants painting; those children want manners. Need usually throws the emphasis on urgent necessity rather than on absence or shortage, though both implications are commonly found; as, that family needs food and clothing; the country needs the services and support of every citizen; the letter needs no reply, but it would be courteous to acknowledge it; "That woman needs a lesson, Gideon. She's a public nuisance" (R. Macaulay). Require (as here compared: see also DEMAND) differs from need usually in heightening the implication of urgent necessity (as, "Great acts require great means of enterprise"—Millon; "the Doctor . . . required a few days of complete rest"—Dickens), and sometimes, in suggesting the importunity of urgent desire or craving (as, "Surely it does not require a palace to be happy with Mary"—Irving).

Con. *Have, hold, possess, own, enjoy.

lackadaisical. Listless, spiritless, enervated, *languid, languishing, languorous.

Ana. *Indifferent, unconcerned, incurious: indolent, slothful, fainéant, *lazy: inert, *inactive, passive, supine, idle: *sentimental, romantic: enervated, emasculated (see UNNERVE).

Con. Energetic, strenuous, *vigorous, lusty: dynamic, live, *active.

laconic. Succinct, terse, *concise, summary, pithy, compendious.

Ana. Curt, brusque (see BLUFF): *brief, short.

Ant. Verbose. — Con. *Wordy, prolix, diffuse: loquacious, *talkative, voluble, garrulous.

lacuscular. Lacustrine, *aquatic, fluvial, fluviatile, marine, oceanic, thalassic, neritic, pelagic, abyssal, bathysmal, bathybic.

lacustrine, lacustrian. Lacuscular, *aquatic, fluvial, fluviatile, marine, oceanic, thalassic, neritic, pelagic, abyssal, bathysmal, bathybic.

lane. Byway, alley, alleyway, roadway, *road, street, highway, highroad, avenue, boulevard, terrace, drive, parkway, thoroughfare.

language. 1 Language, dialect, tongue, speech, idiom are here compared only as denoting a body or system of words and phrases used by a people, a nation or group of nations, or other considerable community. Among philologists, the distinctions in meaning of some of these terms are still a matter of controversy; it is not the purpose of this article to enter into those debates, but to indicate the meanings that these terms have acquired through usage. Language may be employed as a general term for any medium of communication whether it utilizes a body of words, or sounds, gestures, facial expressions, and the like; as, the inarticulate language of a baby. However, in the specific sense here considered, the term refers to a body of words that by long use (commonly over a widespread territory) has become the means whereby the ideas or feelings of the individual members of that community are communicated or expressed; specifically, the term suggests more or less fixity in meaning, in pronunciation, in methods of combining words or of making compounds, and the like; it usually, but not invariably, connotes the existence of a standard determined by the usage of the best writers and speakers; as, German is the language of Prussians, Bavarians, Saxons, Austrians, some Swiss, and various other peoples; dead languages such as Latin and ancient Greek. But language is also applied to a body of words and phrases that is peculiar to an art, a science, a profession, a class, and that, however well understood by others of the community, is not generally adopted by them; as, "in economic language the 'marginal saver' determines the price" (J. A. Hobson). Dialect, as here compared (see also DIALECT, 1), is purely a technical term used by philologists in place of language to denote specifically one of a number of languages which retain obvious signs of their origin from a common, or root, language, yet each of which is clearly distinguishable not only from the root language but from the other branches by marked differences and an identity of its own; as, Welsh, Irish, and Gaelic are Celtic dialects; the perennial controversy as to whether Scottish is a language or a dialect. Tongue and speech, in the sense here considered, both go back for their first use to the early Middle Ages, when by the vast majority of persons languages were recognized through hearing rather than through reading. Tongue, however, has not continuously denoted the spoken language. In fact, tongue differs from language chiefly in its being applicable to a dialect, a patois, an argot (for these terms, see DIALECT, 1) as well as to the fixed or standard form; as, "The language her [Sarah O. Jewett's] people speak to each other is a native tongue. No writer can invent it" (Cather); "There is no poet in any tongue—not even in Latin or Greek—who stands so firmly [as Dante] as a model for all poets" (T. S. Eliot); "They [immigrants to the United States] came to us speaking many tongues—but a single language, the universal language of human aspiration" (F. D. Roosevelt). On the other hand speech, with rare exceptions, always means spoken language, or tongue, or, as in modern technical use, the language (under consideration) as it is spoken; as, "People of a strange speech" (Ezekiel iii. 6); "There are at least two sounds in the Anglo-Saxon which are unknown in our present speech" (W. D. Whitney). Idiom, though a much later addition to the English language than tongue or speech, also suggests reference to a condition prevalent at the time of its origin (the Renaissance) when every country, sometimes every province or section of a country, had its own peculiar and distinctive tongue; as, "The histories of all our former wars are transmitted to us in our vernacular idiom" (Addison); "On the spot I read...the classics of the Tuscan idiom" (Gibbon). In current use, idiom applies to the private or peculiar language of a particular writer, class, literary school, or the like; as, "the eminently personal idiom of Swinburne" (T. S. Eliot); "The mediaeval poetic idiom came after a while to seem a jargon" (Loves).

Ana. *Dialect, vernacular, patois, lingo, jargon, cant, argot, patter, slang.

2 Language, vocabulary, phraseology, phrasing, diction, style are associated rather than synonymous terms when they are used as meaning oral or written expression or a quality of such expression that is dependent on the variety, or arrangement, or expressiveness of words. Language, as here considered, may apply to any form of verbal expression with reference to the words employed. It may call attention to correctness or lack of correctness in the use of words, to their dignity or their vulgarity, to their fitness or lack of fitness, to their sonority or their stridency, or to any of the qualities which speech or writing may derive from the choice and arrangement of words; as, the "plain language" of Quakers; he avoided harsh language in dealing with his children; "Language, grave and majestic, but of vague and uncertain import" (Macaulay). "When I read Shakespeare I am struck with wonder That such trivial people should muse and thunder In such lovely language" (D. H. Lawrence). Vocabulary, when used in reference to verbal expression, calls attention only to the extent or variety of the writer's or speaker's stock of words or to the sources from which such a stock is derived; as, the range of his vocabulary of vituperation was unsurpassed; "Little has changed [in modern as distinguished from medieval discussion of fundamental problems] except the vocabulary and the method" (H. Adams); "In the vocabulary of the English Bible sixty per cent [of the words] are native" (G. P. Marsh); "people with a dignity of port, an amplitude of back, an emphasis of vocabulary" (L. P. Smith). Phraseology or phrasing is sometimes used in place of vocabulary when the reader's attention is called especially to its idiomatic or peculiar character (as, eccentricities of phraseology [or phrasing]), but in very precise use, phraseology in particular stresses the grouping (often the conventional grouping) of words as much as their choice; as, one can say in the phraseology of the sentimentalist that "one loves nature"; the phraseology, rather than the vocabulary, of Donne offers difficulty to the inexperienced reader; "Men, according to their habits and professions, have a phraseology of their own" (Burke); "the gaudiness and inane phraseology of many modern writers" (Wordsworth). Diction calls attention to the choice and arrangement of words with reference to their expression of ideas or emotions. The term is used commonly of the considered language of poetry, literary prose, oratory, or the like, and it usually, therefore, implies selection or arrangement with reference to such ends as impressiveness, elegance, and beauty of sound; as, "In the sure and flawless perfection of his [Milton's] rhythm and diction he is as admirable as Vergil or Dante" (Arnold); "He was in a high fever while he was writing, and the blood-and-thunder magazine diction he adopted did not calm him" (Kipling); "The Romantic movement in England destroyed the convention of a specialized poetic diction" (Day Lewis). In current use, diction often applies not only to this quality as shown in orations or public addresses, but to a vocal quality evident in delivery, as in acting, singing, or speaking, which implies effectiveness in elocution, correct pronunciation of words, and pleasant enunciation. Though this sense is often questioned, it is used by some good writers; as, "Notice . . . the diction of French acting. It is the sense and not the sentiment of the verse or prose that is savored by the actor and the audience" (Brownell). Style (especially, but not exclusively, literary style) is a more complex term than any of the preceding words: it is less fixed, not only in its meaning but also in its implications, owing to the fact that the nature and essence of style (in this sense) have long been disputed. Always, however, it denotes a mode or manner of expressing one's thoughts or emotions or imaginative conceptions in words, as distinct from or as distinguishable from the thoughts, emotions, etc., expressed. It is sometimes thought of as a structure and diction peculiar to an age or a literary type and found in each representative work of that time and type; as, the Renaissance epic style is based upon that of Vergil; a poem written in the style of the ode. It is now more often thought of as a manner of expression which in structure and diction involves artistry but is individual and characteristic of its author; as, "Style . . . is a peculiar recasting and heightening, under a certain condition of spiritual excitement, of what a man has to say, in such a manner as to add dignity and distinction to it" (Arnold); "What he believed in was style: that is to say, a certain absolute and unique manner of expressing a thing, in all its intensity and color" (Pater); "His [Addison's] style, with its free unaffected movement, its clear distinctness, its graceful transitions, its delicate harmonies, its appropriateness of tone . . . what [is this] but the literary reflection of Addison himself?" (J. R. Green); "This then is Style. As technically manifested in literature it is the power to touch with ease, grace, precision, any note in the gamut of human thought or emotion" (Quiller-Couch).

languid. Languid, languishing, languorous, lackadaisical, listless, spiritless, enervated agree in meaning lacking in vim or energy or, when applied to things, the appearance of it. Languid usually implies an unwillingness or an inability to exert oneself owing to fatigue, exhaustion, or physical weakness; as, the long illness had left her languid and in drooping spirits; the intense heat made everyone too languid for play; "Archer was struck by something languid and inelastic in her attitude, and wondered if the deadly monotony of their lives had laid its weight on her also" (E. Wharton). Languishing has been much affected in its meaning, especially in its connotations, by its frequent application to ladies, to lovers, or to expressions and acts of love, and the like, in sentimental novels and poems, particularly of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. For this reason, the term now seldom suggests its once common implication of actual physical weakness, such as that which results from a long or severe illness; as, "He was now in so languishing a state . . . that . . . his death . . . seemed to be very near" (Bp. Burnet). Rather, it connotes either the appearance of delicacy or of indolence, especially of delicacy or indolence once associated with high breeding, or the appearance of faintness, as though one were swooning under the stress of emotion or longing; as, languishing Spanish beauties; a languishing gaze; a languishing embrace. Languorous, like languishing, now seldom implies debility arising from illness or disease (as, "To wile the length from languorous hours, and draw The sting from pain"—Tennyson), for it far more often carries a suggestion of languidness and delicacy acquired through soft living, through shrinking from exertion, or through sentimentalism or overindulgence in tender or amorous emotions; as, a languorous gait; languorous black eyes. "Miss Mitchell [in "Gone with the Wind"] sought out rich words with which to re-create the languorous, stilling beauty of the Old South" (Springfield [Mass.] Republican). Lackadaisical, on the other hand, has followed the reverse order in its change of meaning. Once the term carried the present meaning of languishing but with a stronger connotation of insipid sentimentality (as, "His [Byron's] utter contempt of all the affectations of literature, from the school-magisterial style to the lackadaisical"—Scott); it now far more often implies a carefree or indifferent attitude that either forbids exertion or makes for futile, piddling, or halfhearted and indolent efforts; as, "The sheep on the dike were half asleep and chewed lackadaisically" (Atlantic Monthly); "Our radio propaganda should also be working at full pressure, but there must be a great improvement upon the present lackadaisical outlook" (Springfield [Mass.] Republican). Listless may or may not imply physical weakness, but it almost invariably implies either a lack of interest in what is going on around one or in what one is doing, or a languid appearance that may be the result either of boredom or ennui or of fatigue or disease; as, a dull speech makes a listless audience; the child has grown thin, white, and listless within the past two months. "He was struck by her listless attitude: she sat there as if she had nothing else to do" (E. Wharton). Spiritless implies the loss or the absence of the animation or fire that gives life or dash to a person or to his words, acts, or the like; as, a spiritless performance of a play; "rendered spiritless by the ill-success of all their endeavours" (Austen). Enervated implies a destruction of qualities or powers essential to the vigorous exercise of the will and the intellect. Often, but not necessarily, it suggests the influence of luxury or of sloth, but it may imply the operation of other causes, even of those that in themselves are not evil but may have deleterious effects; as, "enervated lords...softly lolling in their chariots" (Arbutnot & Pope); a race enervated by living so long under a line of benevolent despots; "The enervated and sickly habits of the literary class" (Emerson).

Ana. *Lethargic, sluggish, comatose, stuporous, torpid: phlegmatic, apathetic, *impassive: inert, *inactive, supine.

Ant. Vivacious: chipper.

languishing. *Languid, languorous, listless, lackadaisical, spiritless, enervated.

Ana. Weakened, enfeebled, debilitated (see WEAKEN): indolent, fainéant (see LAZY): inert, *inactive, supine: *sentimental, romantic: pining, longing, yearning (see LONG, v.).

Ant. Thriving, flourishing: unaffected. — Con. Robust, *healthy, sound, hale: *vigorous, energetic, lusty: *natural, artless, unsophisticated, naive.

languor. *Lethargy, lassitude, stupor, torpor, torpidity. Ana. Exhaustion, fatigue, weariness (see corresponding verbs at TIRE): ennui, doldrums, *tedium: depression, blues, dumps, vapors (see SADNESS).

Ant. Alacrity. — Con. *Celerity, legerity: quickness, promptness, readiness (see corresponding adjectives at QUICK): zest, gusto (see TASTE).

languorous. Languishing, *languid, listless, lackadaisical, spiritless, enervated.

Ana. Leisurely, laggard, *slow, dilatory: indolent, slothful, fainéant (see LAZY): passive, inert, *inactive, supine: relaxed, slack, lax, *loose: pampered, indulged (see INDULGE).

Ant. Vigorous (of persons, moods, etc.): strenuous (of times, seasons, etc.).

lank, lanky. Gaunt, rawboned, *lean, spare, angular, scrawny, skinny.

Ana. *Thin, slim, slender, slight: attenuated, extenuated (see THIN, v.).

Ant. Burly. — Con. Husky, brawny, *muscular, sinewy: plump, portly, rotund, chubby, *fleshy, stout.

lapse, n. 1 Slip, *error, mistake, blunder, faux pas, bull, howler, boner, bloomer, floater.

Ana. *Offense, sin, vice, crime: *fault, failing, frailty, foible: transgression, *breach, violation, trespass.

2 Relapse, backsliding, recidivation, recidivism. See under LAPSE, v.

Ana. *Deterioration, decline, declension, decadence, degeneration, devolution: retrograding or retrogradation, receding or recession (see corresponding verbs at RECEDE): regressiveness or retrogression, regressiveness or regression (see corresponding adjectives at BACKWARD).

Con. Advance, progress (see under ADVANCE, v.): *development, evolution.

lapse, v. Lapse, relapse, backslide, recidivate and their corresponding nouns, lapse, relapse, backsliding, recidivation and recidivism are comparable when they mean to fall back into a state or condition from which one has raised oneself or has been raised, or the act or state of one who has so fallen back. As distinguished from decline, degenerate, deteriorate, and the like, these verbs do not necessarily imply the reversion of a process or development, or the gradual losing and the inevitable loss of strength, power, influence, and the like, but they do distinctively imply a failure to continue without break a course of improvement and a return, often a quickly effected but not irreparable return, to the earlier bad or lower state or condition. Both lapse and relapse etymologically imply a sliding or slipping, but they are increasingly divergent in their applications and connotations. Lapse usually presupposes reformation in manners, morals, or habits, or the acceptance of a high standard of rectitude, accuracy, accomplishment, or the like. It may or may not imply culpability or weakness, for it often suggests merely a sudden failure of the memory, or the influence of habit or tradition, or the pressure of an overwhelming emotion; as, it is easy for the person who has acquired good manners by effort to lapse into old ways when he is not on guard; only when she was strongly moved did she lapse into the dialect she spoke in her youth; a lapse in accuracy; "he had been on the watch for a lapse from the straight path" (Conrad). When culpability is strongly implied, the word still, in comparison to the other terms in the group, often connotes extenuating circumstances; it is therefore the fitting choice when the context indicates such circumstances; as, he constantly fought his tendency to lapse into easy-going ways; the speaker argued that the democratic ideal is too high for men and that democracies ultimately lapse into oligarchies or autocracies. "In estimating a man's place in the scale of perfection...the moral judgment, not withholding condemnation of a particular lapse, may not condemn the man wholly for it" (S. Alexander). Relapse presupposes definite improvement or an advance, as toward health or toward a higher physical, moral, or intellectual state, and it implies a complete and often dangerous reversal of direction; thus, one whose improvement in a serious illness has been marked may be said to relapse, or suffer a relapse, when his condition becomes definitely worse; a reformed thief is said to relapse when he returns to his old life. "Augustus... saved the world from disintegration. Without him Rome must have lost her conquests one by one, and seen them relapse into barbarism" (Buchan). "The Arabs were once the continuators of the Greek tradition; they produced men of science. They have relapsed...into pre-scientific fatalism, with its attendant incuriosity and apathy" (A. Huxley). Backslide and backsliding also imply a reversal in direction of one who has been going forward but unlike relapse, which is in many ways their close synonym, they are restricted in their reference to moral and religious lapses. They therefore often suggest recreancy or apostasy and the abandonment of a faith or of principles once professed. "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord" (Jeremiah iii. 14). "Did not I...backslide into intemperance and folly" (Marryat). Recidivate and recidivation are now rarely, if ever, used for relapse and backslide and backsliding, although in this use they were once common terms, especially in the seventeenth century. Recidivism occurs very frequently today, especially in the social sciences, but it implies a relapse or tendency to relapse, or the habit of relapsing, into criminal practices. It is used more often of former convicts than of reformed criminals, and therefore stresses reversion to a former state rather than a failure to continue in the direction of reformation; as, the statistics of recidivism among discharged prisoners are a matter of much concern to penologists.

larcener. Thief, robber, burglar. See under THEFT.

larceny. *Theft, robbery, burglary.

lard. Suet, tallow, *adipose, marrow.

large. Large, big, great agree in meaning above the average of its kind in magnitude, especially physical magnitude. Large, however, is preferred when the dimensions, or extent, or capacity, or quantity, or amount is being considered; as, a large lot; a large hall; a large basket; a large meal; a large allowance. Big, on the other hand, is preferred when the emphasis is on bulk, or mass, or weight, or volume; as, a big book; a big pile; the box is too big to carry; a big voice. A large man is by implication a man who is tall and broad; a big man (physically), one who is bulky and heavy. As applied to material objects, great has been practically displaced by large or big. Where great is used to denote physical magnitude, it now regularly connotes some impression (as of wonder, surprise, amusement, annoyance) associated with the size; as, a large (or big) dog; cf. a great dog (i.e., a dog whose size is imposing, terrifying, disconcerting, etc.); a large (or big) head; cf. "the great head that seemed so weighted down with thought and study" (The Nation); "their classical profiles... their large black eyes" (Byron); "[She] on the trembling man with great eyes gazed" (W. Morris). Great alone, in literary or good colloquial English, expresses degree; as, great kindness, haste; great heat. Figuratively, great suggests eminence, distinction, or supremacy; large suggests breadth, comprehensiveness, generosity; big carries over the implication of mass or bulk but often suggests impressiveness or importance rather than solidity or great worth; as, a great cathedral, symphony; a great general; large tolerance, discretion; "that large utterance of the early gods" (Keats); "I don't know any paper which takes a larger and more reasonable view of the war" (H. Ellis); the big men of the city; big talk. "There is something in [Daniel] Webster that reminds me of Victor Hugo. There is the same confusion of what is big with what is great" (J. R. Lowell).

Ana. Vast, immense, *enormous, huge, mammoth, colossal, gigantic: tremendous, prodigious, monumental, stupendous, *monstrous: inordinate, *excessive, exorbitant, extreme, immoderate, extravagant.

Ant. Small. — Con. Little, diminutive, tiny, wee, minute (see SMALL): slight, slender, slim, *thin.

largess or largesse. Boon, *gift, present, gratuity, favor, fairing.

Ana. Benefaction, *donation, contribution: grant, subvention (see APPROPRIATION).

lascivious. Lewd, *licentious, libertine, lustful, libidinous, lecherous, wanton.

Ana. *Immoral, unmoral, amoral: sensual, *carnal, fleshly, animal, animalistic: obscene, gross, *coarse.

Con. *Chaste, pure, modest, decent: virtuous, *moral.

lassitude. Languor, *lethargy, stupor, torpor, torpidity.

Ana. Exhaustion, weariness, fatigue (see corresponding verbs at TIRE): ennui, doldrums, *tedium: dumps, vapors, blues, depression (see SADNESS): impotence, powerlessness (see corresponding adjectives at POWERLESS).

Ant. Vigor. — Con. Energy, strength, might, force, *power.

last, adj. Last, latest, final, terminal, concluding, eventual, ultimate, extreme come into comparison when they mean following all the others, usually in time or order, but sometimes in importance. That is last which comes at the end of a series, especially of things of the same kind or class; the term usually implies that no more will follow or have followed (as, the last page of a book; their last child is now ten years of age; the last leaf on a tree), but it may imply that the thing so qualified is or was the most recent or is the closest or nearest with respect to the present or a given time or period (as, his last book; their last visit to us was in December). In this latter sense latest is usually preferred as less ambiguous; thus, "his latest book" is clearer than "his last book," since the latter wording might suggest the author's ensuing death; the latest (or last) train on Sunday leaves at 11.45; so, the latest (better than last) number of a current magazine; the latest (better than last) news is that all is well. That is final which definitely closes a series or process not only because it is the last in order of individuals or details (as, the final day of school; the final float in the procession; the final event on a program) but because it is decisive, conclusive, or the like (as, the judges' decision on all questions in this contest is final; the final answer to a question; a final decree of divorce; "I think he settles many questions... on which a final verdict is what we now want"—FitzGerald), or has the power of deciding or settling absolutely (as, "this court [the Supreme Court of the United States] is not the final authority concerning the laws of New York"—Justice Holmes). That is terminal which comes at the end of something and marks the limit of its extension, its growth, or its completion as a series or process; as, the terminal point of a railroad; the terminal bud of a plant; the terminal syllable of a word. That is concluding which brings something (such as a speech, a book, a program, a celebration) to an end or which marks its finish; as, the concluding address was delivered by the chairman; "As the concluding words... were uttered" (Macaulay). That is eventual which is bound to follow as the final effect of causes already in operation or of causes that will be operative if a given or understood contingency occurs; as, "The silent decay and eventual overthrow of her natural defences" (Gladstone); "It is his object to point out the necessity... for a deliberate and purposive art of eugenics, if we would prevent the eventual shipwreck of civilisation" (H. Ellis). That is ultimate, as here compared (see also ULTIMATE, 2), which is the last, final, or terminal event, element, or the like, in a series or process (as, "the ultimate extinction of Herculaneum in August, 79 A.D., was the work of Vesuvius"—Lucas; "the ultimate stage in a process of descent"—H. Ellis), or is the final outcome or end to which a person or thing is moving or working (as, the ultimate effect of a drug; "When I think of the earth's refrigeration, and the ultimate collapse of our Solar System"—L. P. Smith), or is the most remote as in time (either past or future time), or most important in scale of values (as, the ultimate effect of a war; that word comes into English from French, but its ultimate source is Sanskrit; "ultimate issues, primal springs"—Kipling). Extreme is now rarely synonymous with last except in the phrase Extreme Unction (i.e., the Sacrament administered to the dying): it comes close to ultimate in such phrases as "he has reached the extreme limit of his strength."

Ant. First.

last, v. Endure, *continue, abide, persist.

Ana. Survive, outlast, *outlive: remain, *stay.

Ant. Fleet.

lasting. Lasting, permanent, perdurable, durable, stable, perpetual come into comparison as meaning enduring for so long as to seem fixed or established. Lasting usually implies long continuance with no end in sight: in this sense, it may be equivalent to everlasting (as, "Who . . . sings His soul and body to their lasting rest"—Shak.; "to the great and lasting injury of the spiritual life"—Inge). More often, however, it does not imply endlessness, but rather a surprising capacity to continue indefinitely (as, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear"—Pope; "The anger of slow, mild, loving people has a lasting quality that mere bad-tempered folk cannot understand"—Deland). Permanent applies chiefly to things which are not temporary, tentative, transitory, fluctuating, or the like (as other things of the same class may be), but which continue or are likely to continue indefinitely; as, a permanent position; a permanent arrangement; "the armed force of government was not permanent but occasional" (Belloc); "the stimulation of violent emotions may leave permanent traces on the mind" (Inge). Perdurable carries even a stronger implication than lasting often carries, of endlessness of existence, but the term is so rarely applied to anything thought of as eternal that it suggests endless or apparently endless existence from the point of view of human remembrance or human history; as, "Leaving a name perdurable on earth" (Southey); "Our literature is going to be our most perdurable claim on man's remembrance" (Quiller-Couch). Durable commonly implies power of resistance to destructive agencies; it usually suggests a capacity for lasting that exceeds that of other things of the same kind or sort; as, a durable pavement; durable color; "more durable than brass" (Philip Francis); "many writers have longed for durable renown" (L. P. Smith). Stable literally applies to that which is so firmly or solidly established that it cannot be moved or changed; the term therefore is applicable to things that are lasting or durable because they are deeply rooted, or infixed and not subject or likely to be subject to fluctuations; as, a stable foundation; a stable form of government; stable institutions; stable pronunciations; stable habits; "the stable earth and the changing day" (G. Eliot). Perpetual (as here compared: see also CONTINUAL) often suggests an approach to eternal in implying endlessness or a going on forever. However, it always clearly suggests a beginning in time and is, therefore, never applied to God, the Absolute, or the like. It differs from permanent chiefly in stressing an uninterrupted course and in being applied to anything thought of as consecutive or continuous rather than as being limited to a term; thus, one says a permanent (not perpetual) position; a permanent (not perpetual) settlement of a problem; perpetual (not permanent) motion; a perpetual (not permanent) calendar: so, "a perpetual embargo was the annihilation, and not the regulation of commerce" (Ch. Just. Marshall).

Ana. Enduring, abiding, persisting or persistent, continuing (see corresponding verbs at CONTINUE): *everlasting, endless, unceasing, never-ending: *continual, continuous, incessant, perennial: eternal, sempiternal (see INFINITE).

Ant. Fleeting. — Con. Fugitive, passing, evanescent, transitory, *transient, short-lived.

late. 1 *Tardy, behindhand, overdue.

Ana. Delayed, retarded, detained (see DELAY).

Ant. Early: punctual, prompt. — Con. Timely, *seasonable, opportune, well-timed.

2 Departed, deceased, defunct, *dead, lifeless, inanimate.

latent. Latent, dormant, quiescent, potential, abeyant (or in abeyance) agree in meaning not now manifesting its existence. Latent implies concealment and is applied to that which is present without showing itself; dormant usually suggests sleeping and is applied to that which is alive without manifesting activity; as, a latent talent; latent energy; a dormant plant or volcano. "The poet's gift of seeing the latent possibilities in everything he touched" (Lowes). "Which power can never be exercised by the people themselves, but must be placed in the hands of agents, or lie dormant" (Ch. Just. Marshall). Quiescent emphasizes the cessation of action rather than the presence of energy. "With the increase of their wealth . . . they sank into quiescent Tories" (Meredith). Sometimes it connotes immobility. "If only we could persuade ourselves to remain quiescent when we are happy" (Jefferies). Potential is applied to that which does not now exist but which is bound to exist if the present process of coming into being is not arrested. "It [an infant] must from the very first be viewed seriously, as a potential adult" (B. Russell). Abeyant (more often, predicatively, in abeyance) always implies a suspension of activity or active existence. "In Mr. Brooke the hereditary strain of Puritan energy was clearly in abeyance" (G. Eliot). It usually connotes expectancy of revival. "Nothing seemed left . . . of . . . the former Lewis Raycie, save a lurking and abeyant fear of Mr. Raycie senior" (E. Wharton).

Ana. Hidden, concealed (see HIDE, v.): *inactive, inert, idle: unripe, unmaturing, unfledged, *immature.

Ant. Patent. — Con. *Active, operative, live, dynamic: activated, vitalized, energized (see VITALIZE).

latest. Final, *last, terminal, concluding, eventual, ultimate, extreme.

Ant. Earliest.

Ant. Revile. — Con. *Decry, depreciate, disparage, belittle: censure, condemn, denounce, blame, *criticize, reprobate, reprehend: *execrate, curse, damn, anathematize, objugate.

laughable. Laughable, ludicrous, ridiculous, comic, comical, farical, risible, droll, funny come into comparison as meaning provoking or evoking laughter or mirth. Laughable is the general term for whatever is fit to provoke laughter; as, modern audiences do not find Shylock a laughable character; a laughable incident; "[Mrs. Kemble] would have contributed magnificent laughable touches . . . to any picture of her peculiarities" (H. James). Ludicrous applies to that which is laughable because of its absurdity, incongruity, or preposterousness; as, the ludicrous mistakes called schoolboy howlers; "[Louis XIII] had friendships, one after another, so violent as to be often ludicrous" (Belloc); "Some of the best public school teachers in the last century were hot-tempered men whose disciplinary performances were ludicrous" (Inge). Ridiculous applies to that which excites derision because of extreme absurdity, foolishness, contemptibility, or the like; as, "Good manners at the court are as ridiculous in the country as the behaviour of the country is most mockable at the court" (Shak.; "'Curates, mothers-in-law, British workmen, shop-walkers [are] all recognized as fair sport for the facetious . . . But it's only the curate that bothers about trying not to be ridiculous'" (C. Mackenzie). In current English, comic and comical are becoming distinct in implications and in applications, although they are still to a certain extent interchangeable. Comic is usually the more dignified word applicable to anything that partakes of the spirit of comedy, especially of the literary form which aims to present life in a way that does not leave a painful impression and that does evoke smiles or laughter, especially thoughtful laughter, or amused reflection; as, "With minds easy, detached... a great deal of their theology—the amateness of Zeus for example—must needs seem... comic" (Quiller-Couch); "I quite agree with Juke that it is comic to see poor little nonentities like Frank Potter caught in it [Christianity], tangled up in it, and trying to get free and carry on as though it wasn't there" (R. Macaulay). Comical applies not so much to the character of that which induces laughter as to the impression it produces upon the observer; commonly, the term suggests unrestrained laughter as its effect. "The abrupt transition of her features from assured pride to ludicrous astonishment and alarm was comical enough to have sent into wild uncharitable laughter any creature less humane than Constance" (Bennett). Farical is often used interchangeably with comical, but it is ordinarily the preferred term when that which creates amusement is, like farce (the dramatic form), dependent upon extravagance, nonsense, practical jokes, burlesque, or the like, for the effect it produces; as, "Boys are like monkeys... the gravest actors of farical nonsense that the world possesses" (Meredith). Risible, which is increasingly rare in this sense, applies only to that which evokes amusement of any sort or degree; as, risible manners; risible blunders in speech. Droll and funny usually impute oddity or strangeness to that which makes a thing risible or laughable, but droll ordinarily carries a stronger implication of unfamiliarity, quaintness, absurdity, or intentional (though often sly) humorousness (as, "Thackeray's names, though often ludicrous, are always happy, and often inimitably droll" —Athenaeum) and funny of queerness or curiousness (as, "the night mail set me down at Marwar Junction, where a funny little happy-go-lucky native-managed railway runs to Jodhpore"—Kipling). Funny is, however, the ordinary colloquial term interchangeable with any other word of the group. "The strangest of all was a portrait of Samuel Povey as an infant in arms. Sophia checked an impulse to laugh at it. But when Constance said: 'Isn't it funny?' she did allow herself to laugh" (Bennett).

Ana. Amusing, diverting, entertaining (see AMUSE): humorous, *witty, facetious, jocular, jocose.

Con. Solemn, *serious, grave: tedious, tiresome, wearisome, humdrum, *irksome: pathetic, poignant, touching, affecting, *moving, impressive.

lavish. *Profuse, prodigal, luxuriant, lush, exuberant.

Ana. *Liberal, bountiful, generous, munificent, handsome: sumptuous, opulent, *luxurious: *excessive, inordinate, extravagant.

Ant. Sparing. — Con. *Meager, scanty, scant: economical, frugal, thrifty (see SPARING): provident, prudent, discreet (see under PRUDENCE): *stingy, niggardly, parsimonious, penurious, miserly.

law. 1 Law, rule, regulation, precept, statute, ordinance, canon are often used interchangeably but with loss of precision. They all designate a principle laid down or accepted as governing conduct, action, or procedure. Law, rule, and precept are also used as collective nouns to denote a body of laws, rules, or precepts; as, to obey the law; to work by rule; to teach by precept. Law and precept are often used abstractly. "The world demanded peace and law, not liberties and privileges" (Buchan). "The poet's business is not with precept" (Lowes). Law primarily implies imposition by a sovereign authority and the obligation of obedience on the part of those governed. "There was no law save that of the strongest" (Kipling). In more restricted use, however, it implies a will to maintain peace and justice in the community or group governed and the expression of that will in concrete injunctions or prohibitions. Laws may be written or unwritten: when the latter, they indicate derivation from established custom; when the former, they commonly indicate enactment by a legislative body or power; as, the laws of New York State. "The Ten Commandments... were politically useless until an elaborate set of laws... had been provided to give effect to them" (Shaw). In extended use, law may be applied to any principle of guidance that forms part of a code accepted as binding; as, respect for the confidences of patients is a law in medical practice. Rule, in contrast with law, suggests closer relation to individual conduct and method, or a desire for order and discipline in the group. Sometimes it implies restriction, whether prescribed or self-imposed, for the sake of an immediate end, such as unity in action, uniformity in procedure, or conformity to a standard of practice; as, the rules of a game; the rules of a school; the rules of good writing. Sometimes rule does not imply prohibition, but suggests a positive way of thinking or acting in order to get desired or concrete results; as, the rule of three; a rule of thumb. Regulation often equals rule, but in discriminating use it connotes prescription by authority for the control or management of an organization or system; as, military regulations; regulations respecting interstate commerce; factory regulations. Precept, like law, usually implies generality and lack of detail in the statement and an authoritative origin; like rule, however, it implies closer reference to individual conduct than to government. "He really was the one child to whom the 'spare-the-rod' precept did not apply" (Deland). In modern use, precept is applied to that which is enjoined by teaching: it often suggests counsel or advice, and is commonly opposed in its abstract use to practice or example. "By precept and by practice he proclaimed the lofty solitude of the individual soul" (H. Ellis). Statute, ordinance, and canon all come under the description of law. A statute is a written law, formally enacted by a legislative body. An ordinance, in American usage, is a local law, especially one enacted by a municipal government. In strict British usage, it is a law that is not an act of Parliament. Historically, ordinance has been applied to laws promulgated without the assent of one of the three powers (the Crown, the House of Lords, the House of Commons) whose assent is necessary to such an act; at present it is applied to any law or regulation enacted by a lesser body than Parliament. A canon, in strict use, is a law of a church, binding upon all of its members. In extended use, canon is applied to such laws of ethics, of society, of criticism, and the like, as have the sanction of accepted authority and are enforced by one's moral, social, or artistic conscience. "Are we witnessing a violent reaction against accepted canons of decency in life?" (Grandgent).

lawful. Lawful, legal, legitimate, licit are synonyms only when they mean permitted, sanctioned, or recognized by law or the law. Lawful differs from all the others in implying a reference to law of any sort, such as divine law, natural law, or the law of the land, or such as civil law, common law, or canon law. Consequently, the term often comes close in meaning to allowable or permissible (as, "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient"—1 Corinthians vi. 12) or (now less often) to justifiable (as, "Tell me, which knave is lawful game, which not? Must great offenders, once escap'd the Crown, Like royal harts, be never more run down?"—Pope; "a lawful military operation"—Macaulay), or rightful (as, the lawful heir; a lawful prize; the lawful sovereign). Legal implies a reference to the law as it appears on the statute books or is administered in the courts; thus, the lawful heir is also the legal heir; the lawful owner of a piece of property is one whose legal right to it is certain; a money-lender is entitled only to legal interest (better than lawful, for legal suggests rates fixed by law for the state or nation) on his loans. Legal is used more often in the sense of sanctioned by law, or in conformity with the law, or not contrary to the law, than in the sense of allowable by the terms of the law; as, a legal marriage; the legal period for the payment of a debt; the capture of the neutral ship carrying contraband was held to be legal; the secretary of labor declared that sit-down strikes were not lawful (better than legal, which implies express recognition of this type of strike). Legitimate was originally applied to a child born of legally married parents: it was later also used to describe the person who had legal title to a throne, an inheritance, a property, or the like, especially when a dispute arose; as, the legitimate monarch; the legitimate heir; the legitimate owner. In current use these meanings prevail, but the adjective implies not merely recognition by law but recognition or acceptance by custom, tradition, or the proper authorities, logical admissibility, or the like; thus, a lie may be considered legitimate (not legal or lawful) if a patient's restoration to health depends on it; "Jane's mother was making indirect but perfectly legitimate inquiries into his prospects" (M. Austin); a legitimate conclusion from one's premises; the legitimate drama (that is, the historic and long-accepted form of drama in contrast especially with vaudeville and motion pictures). Licit usually implies strict conformity to the provisions of the law respecting the way in which something should be performed, carried on, executed, or the like: the term therefore is used especially of that which is regulated by law; thus, a licit marriage, from the point of view of canon law, is one in which all prerequisites and all conditions attached to the performance of the ceremony have been attended to; licit liquor traffic is such traffic as obeys strictly the terms of the law; since dealings in the stock market have come under the control of the government, many deals once regarded as lawful are no longer licit.

Ana. Rightful, *due, condign: allowed or allowable, permitted or permissible (see corresponding verbs at LET): justified or justifiable, warranted or warrantable (see corresponding verbs at JUSTIFY).

Ant. Unlawful. — Con. Iniquitous, nefarious, flagitious (see VICIOUS).

lawlessness. *Anarchy, chaos.

lawyer. Lawyer, counselor, barrister, counsel, advocate, attorney, solicitor, proctor, procurator. Lawyer is the general term designating any person versed in the principles of law and authorized to practice law in the courts or to serve clients in the capacity of legal agent or adviser. Counselor, barrister, counsel, and advocate name a lawyer who has acquired the right to plead causes in open court or whose specialty is conducting and arguing court cases. Counselor (more fully, counselor at law) is the usual designation in the United States for a lawyer who accepts court cases and gives advice on legal problems. The corresponding British term is barrister, with, however, special emphasis on court pleading. Counsel is used in the United States as the equivalent of counselor; it (but not counselor) is also used collectively; as, a brilliant array of counsel. The term is now used in England chiefly in "King's Counsel" (abbr. K.C.), formerly the title of a barrister appointed as counsel to the crown on nomination of the lord chancellor, but now the title of a barrister called to the rank of leader. Advocate is in its implications the equivalent of barrister and counselor, but it is used as a designation only in admiralty and in countries in which the legal system is based on Roman law, such as Scotland and France (Fr. avocat). Attorney, solicitor, proctor, procurator are applied chiefly to a lawyer who serves as a legal agent for clients, transacting their business in specific courts such as probate court. Other powers vary with the law of the state or country. Attorney (more fully, attorney at law) is now often used in the United States as equivalent to lawyer. Strictly, however, it names a legal agent who acts for a client, as in conveying property, settling wills, or defending or prosecuting a case in court; as, the attorney for the executors of the will; the State's attorney. In England, the term attorney has been supplanted by solicitor, with, however, emphasis on the transaction of legal business for a client and the preparation of cases for trial. A solicitor may conduct cases only in a few minor courts. Proctor, once restricted in application to an attorney practicing in ecclesiastical and admiralty courts, is now in England technically the equivalent of solicitor. Actually, however, it is limited as a designation to practitioners in probate and, sometimes in America as well as England, to practitioners in admiralty courts. Procurator is to advocate, in countries whose legal system is based on Roman law (Fr. procureur), as solicitor is to barrister in England. It is also used of an attorney authorized to practice in courts of canon law.

lax. 1 Relaxed, *loose, slack.

Ana. *Limp, lopy, flabby, flaccid.

Ant. Rigid (sense 2). — Con. *Firm, solid, hard: tense, taut, *tight: *elastic, resilient, springy.

2 Slack, remiss, *negligent, neglectful.

Ana. *Careless, heedless, thoughtless: *indifferent, unconcerned: *forgetful, unmindful, oblivious.

Ant. Strict, stringent. — Con. *Severe, stern, austere: *rigid, rigorous: strait, *narrow: conscientious, scrupulous, honest, *upright.

laxative. *Physic, aperient, purgative, cathartic, purge.

lay, adj. Secular, temporal, *profane.

Con. Ecclesiastical, clerical (see corresponding nouns at CLERIC): professional (see corresponding noun at TRADE): spiritual, religious, sacred (see HOLY).

lay, v. *Direct, aim, point, level, train.

lazy. Lazy, indolent, slothful, fainéant are here compared chiefly as applied to persons, their powers, movements, and the like, but also in some degree to things. All agree in meaning not easily aroused to action or activity. Lazy (opposed to industrious), especially when applied to persons, suggests a disinclination or aversion to effort or work and usually connotes idleness or dawdling, even when one is supposedly at work; the term is commonly derogatory; as, "Rubbing their sleepy eyes with lazy wrists" (Keats); "A lazy slouching boy, with... big feet trailing lazily one after the other, and large lazy hands, dawdling from out the tight sleeves" (Thackeray); "Una, now twenty-three, grandly beautiful, alternately lazy and amazingly energetic" (R. Macaulay). Indolent (opposed to energetic) implies a habitual love of ease and a settled dislike of movement or activity; as,

"The stretching, indolent ease that the flesh and the spirit of this creature invariably seemed to move with" (Wister); "We were too lazy, we were too negligent. We passed our indolent days leaving everything to somebody else" (H. G. Wells). Slothful (opposed to diligent) suggests the temper or indolence of one who is inactive when he knows he should be active or who moves or acts with excessive slowness when speed is essential; as, "As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed" (Proverbs xxvi. 14); "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (Hebrews vi. 12); "You shall not find Patrick Charteris slothful in a matter of this importance" (Scott). Fainéant (the earliest English use of which was in allusion to the Merovingian kings, from the French phrase rois fainéants) was a popular term among good writers in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries but now occurs infrequently except in the original use: it implies both a slothful temper and a disposition to remain idle in spite of pressure or urgency; as, "the faineant aristocrat and apathetic dullard" (M. Pattison).

Ana. Inert, idle, *inactive, supine, passive: torpid, comatose, sluggish, *lethargic: *languid, languorous, lackadaisical, listless: slack, remiss, lax, *negligent, neglectful.

lead, v. *Guide, pilot, engineer, steer.

Ana. *Conduct, direct, manage, control: *set, fix, establish: *command, order, direct: *induce, persuade, prevail on or upon.

Ant. Follow. — Con. Mislead, delude, *deceive: drive, impel (see MOVE, v.): *force, compel, coerce, constrain, oblige.

leader. Head, *chief, chieftain, commander, captain, master.

Ant. Follower. — Con. Disciple, adherent, henchman, satellite, partisan (see FOLLOWER).

leading, adj. *Chief, principal, main, foremost, capital.

Ana. Governing, ruling (see GOVERN): conducting, directing, managing, controlling (see CONDUCT, v.): prominent, outstanding (see NOTICEABLE): eminent, distinguished (see FAMOUS): pre-eminent, *supreme, superlative.

Ant. Subordinate.

league. *Alliance, coalition, fusion, confederacy, confederation, federation.

leal. Loyal, true, *faithful, constant, stanch, steadfast, resolute.

Ant. False.

lean, v. *Slant, slope, incline.

Ana. Bend, *curve: *turn, deflect, divert, sheer: *tip, tilt, cant, careen, list, heel.

lean, adj. Lean, spare, lank, lanky, gaunt, rawboned, angular, scrawny (or scranny), skinny agree in meaning thin because of absence of superfluous flesh. Lean stresses the lack of fat and therefore of curving contours; as, "lean as a greyhound" (Thackeray); "a small, lean, wiry man With sunk cheeks weathered to a tan" (Masefield). Spare often suggests abstemiousness or sinewy strength; as, "He had the spare form... which became a student" (G. Eliot); "he had the spare, alert, and jaunty figure that one often finds in army men" (T. Wolfe). Lank suggests tallness or length as well as leanness; oftentimes also, it implies wasting; as, "Thou art long, and lank, and brown" (Coleridge); "Meager and lank with fasting grown, and nothing left but skin and bone" (Swift). Lanky adds the suggestions of awkwardness and loose-jointedness; as, a lanky youth, all arms and legs. Gaunt stresses want of sufficient flesh to conceal the bones; it often connotes overwork or undernourishment. "Her bony visage—gaunt and deadly wan" (Wordsworth). Rawboned often equals gaunt, but it is applied particularly to persons of large, ungainly frame and it seldom implies undernourishment; as, "a long, gawky, rawboned Yorkshireman" (Kipling). Angular implies not only absence of curves, but jerkiness or stiffness in movement; as, "Sudden retirement of the angular female in oxydated bombazine" (Holmes). Scrawny (or scranny) and skinny imply extreme thinness without any suggestion of awkwardness, but with a connotation of deficiency of vitality. Scrawny is common in the United States, but scranny is dialectal in England and in Scotland; as, a scrawny dog; skinny children.

Ana. Slender, slim, *thin, slight: cadaverous, wasted, pinched, *haggard.

Ant. Fleshy. — Con. Brawny, *muscular, sinewy, burly, husky: stout, *strong, sturdy, stalwart: plump, portly, rotund, fat, obese, corpulent (see FLESHY).

leaning, n. Leaning, propensity, proclivity, penchant, flair come into comparison when they mean a strong instinct or liking for something (sometimes someone) that drives or leads one to it. One has a leaning to or toward something when one definitely inclines to attachment to it (as a church, a party, a school of philosophy, etc.) or to follow it as a pursuit, a profession, a course, or the like. Leaning, however, indicates only the direction in which one is going or is pulled by the force of attraction; it carries no implication of one's final choice; as, "the king was suspected by many of a leaning towards Rome" (Macaulay); he had a leaning toward the law, but his father urged him to study medicine; he found himself at 21 without a leaning toward any particular political party. One has a propensity to, toward or for something when one has an innate or inherent, and often, uncontrollable, longing for it or is driven to it by a natural appetite; as, to study the propensities of a group of children; a propensity to drink; "such vehement propensities as drove Romeo, Antony, Coriolanus, to their doom" (Bradley); "the normal romanticism of the human spirit, its propensity for fiction, for wonder, adventure" (Babbitt). "That propensity to caricature which tempts clever writers... to transform into objects of derision the venerated Great" (L. P. Smith). One has a proclivity to or towards something or to do something when one is prone to it not only by natural inclination but also by habitual indulgence in it or by the peculiarities of one's constitution or temperament; as, kleptomania is a proclivity to steal; to curb a proclivity to lying. Proclivity often implies a tendency toward evil; when it is used without this implication, it still implies a stronger and less controllable urge than any other of the words here considered. "It [the American national genius] is nourished and sustained by ancient traditions and strong racial proclivities" (S. P. Sherman). One has a penchant for (occasionally to or to do) something (or someone), when the latter possesses an irresistible attraction for one or when one has a decided taste for it. "I own I have too strong a penchant to the building of hypotheses" (Franklin). "She could manage him as she pleased, provided she never let him see her penchant for Count Altenberg" (Edgeworth). "Never was there so grand a penchant for the triste" (Lytton). One has a flair for something when one has an instinct for it comparable to that of a hound on the scent and is drawn or led to it even when it is not easily discoverable or is actually out of sight; as, reporters with a flair for news. "That marvellous flair [of Leonardo Da Vinci] for detecting vital mechanism in every field" (H. Ellis). Often, especially in extended use, flair implies acumen or an innate power of discernment and the ability to distinguish the genuine from the counterfeit, the valuable from the valueless, and the like; as, a collector with a flair for the genuine antique. "As an editor he had superlative courage, and a flair for new writers" (A. Repplier). The use of flair in the sense of bent or aptitude or talent is now common, but is widely regarded as a misuse of the word; as, she hasn't a flair for writing.

Ana. Bias, *predilection, partiality, prepossession, prejudice: inclining or inclination, predisposition (see corresponding verbs at INCLINE): bent, turn, aptitude, faculty, *gift.

Ant. Distaste. — Con. *Antipathy, aversion: repugnance, abhorrence, repellency or repulsion (see corresponding adjectives at REPUGNANT).

learn. Ascertain, *discover, determine, unearth.

learned. Learned, scholarly, erudite, polymathic come into comparison as meaning possessing or manifesting unusually wide and deep knowledge. Learned implies the possession of knowledge gained by study and research: in current use, it implies far wider and deeper knowledge than do educated, cultivated, cultured, and the like, and is usually applied to those who are the most conspicuous in their class or profession for learning, to associations composed of such men, to books or articles written by them, to periodicals edited by them or publishing articles by them, and the like; as, the learned professions; learned societies; a learned clergyman; learned journals. Scholarly also implies great learning, but it is applied particularly to persons or to the utterances, ideas, etc., of persons who have attained mastery in a field of study or investigation, who have to a greater or lesser extent advanced knowledge in that field, and who have exhibited consistently high standards in the appraisal of their own and others' discoveries: often, more narrowly, the term implies great care for accuracy or exactness; as, a scholarly study of the causes of the war; scholarly pursuits. Erudite, though often employed as an equivalent of learned or scholarly, usually implies, in very precise use, a love of learning for its own sake, a taste for that which is out-of-the-way or remote from the interests of the average well-read man, and often, an inordinately wide range of knowledge; as, "the point of view of a profound and erudite student, with a deep belief in the efficacy of useless knowledge" (A. C. Benson); "That excellent critic, the late Mr. Walkley, was often spoken of as erudite, because his charming quotations gave so many readers a feeling of having to do with a man who had all literature at his command" (C. E. Montague). Polymathic, a rare word, implies wide-ranging encyclopedic knowledge rather than accurate and extensive knowledge within the limits of a given field. "It is sad to think that the day of the great polymathic student is at an end; that we may, perhaps, never again see a Scaliger, a Haller, or a Humboldt—men who took the whole field of knowledge for their domain and viewed it as from a pinnacle" (Osler). Ana. Cultivated, cultured (see corresponding nouns at CULTURE): *pedantic, academic, scholastic, bookish: *recondite, abstruse, esoteric. Con. Illiterate, unlettered, uneducated, unlearned, untutored, *ignorant.

leprechaun. *Fairy, faery, fay, elf, sprite, pixy, gnome, dwarf, goblin, brownie, puck, nix, shee, banshee.

less, adj. Less, lesser, smaller, fewer approach each other in meaning but are not synonyms and are rarely interchangeable. Less, the comparative of little, means not as much, especially in degree, value, or amount: its opposite is usually more; it applies chiefly to collective nouns or nouns denoting a mass or abstract whole; as, the moon yields less light than the sun; John has less money than James; please make less noise; humility has less appeal to men of today than other virtues; books whose value is less than half the value of this one. Lesser, a word formed by adding the comparative suffix -er to the comparative form less, means not as great, as important, or as significant as that with which the thing so qualified is compared and implies opposition to greater or major; as, "God made... the lesser light to rule the night" (Genesis i. 16); James is a lesser person than John in the public estimation; humility is not, in Christian ethics, regarded as a lesser virtue; "lesser breaches of the law" (Locke). In the biological sciences, especially in the names of species, lesser implies that the species so designated is distinguished from a very similar one carrying the same name only by its comparative smallness of size; as, the lesser calandine; the lesser snipe. Smaller, the comparative of small, means not as large as that with which the thing so qualified is compared in size, dimensions, quantity, or the like; as, the smaller of two rooms; give her the smaller table for it will take up less room; she likes less sugar (or a smaller quantity of sugar) for her tea than you are giving her. Fewer, the comparative of few, means not as many and implies a difference in number of individuals or units; the term therefore always modifies a plural noun; as, he has fewer pupils than he had last year; give her fewer lumps of sugar; no fewer [persons] than fifty were present.

Ant. More.

lessen. *Decrease, diminish, reduce, abate, dwindle.

Ana. *Shorten, curtail, retrench, abridge, abbreviate: shrink, *contract: lighten, mitigate, alleviate (see RELIEVE): *thin, dilute, attenuate.

lesser. Smaller, *less, fewer.

Ant. Major.

let. 1 Lease, rent, *hire, charter.

2 Let, allow, permit, suffer, leave agree in denoting to refrain from preventing, or to fail to prevent, or to indicate an intention not to prevent. Let, allow, permit, though frequently used with little distinction of meaning, are capable of careful discrimination. Let is the most informal; it is always followed by an expressed or elliptical complementary infinitive, whereas allow and permit may take an object noun of action; as, her mother wouldn't let her go; she didn't go because her mother wouldn't let her; we do not allow (or permit) gambling. Sometimes let implies failure to prevent through awkwardness, inadvertence, negligence, inaction, etc.; as, the third baseman let the ball roll between his feet; "this dismal sketch of the future of countries that let themselves become dependent on the labor of other countries" (Shaw); and sometimes it implies failure to prevent through lack of power or authority to do so; as, Are you going to let him insult you like that? Allow and permit imply power or authority to prohibit or prevent if that had been deemed the better alternative. But allow may imply little more than forbearance of prohibition, whereas permit implies express signification of willingness or acquiescence; as, nothing is permitted, everything is allowed; the sentinel allowed the strangers to advance several paces before he stopped them; the sentinel permitted the strangers to pass when they had given the countersign. To suffer (now somewhat bookish in this sense) is often a mere synonym for allow in the narrowest implication of that word; as, "Suffer little children to come unto me" (Luke xviii. 16); but it may imply indifference or reluctance; as, "The eagle suffers little birds to sing" (Shak.); "Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?" (1 Corinthians vi. 7). Leave (as here compared: see also GO, 1; RELINQUISH) may be used with the implication of letting, allowing, or permitting, only when the object as naming the person affected is followed by an infinitive in the active voice, or as naming the thing permitted is followed by an infinitive in the passive voice. In such use, leave always carries a comparatively stronger implication of noninterference: often, it also suggests the departure of the person who might interfere; as, to leave the young people to follow their own devices; to leave the choice of games to be settled by the guests; the defendant's attorney left him free to tell his story as he wished; "We must leave the children to settle their affairs for themselves" (R. Macaulay). When leave implies interference, and is followed by an infinitive without to, the use in this sense is regarded as questionable or even as illiterate; as, leave him be; leave him go.

Ana. Sanction, endorse, *approve, accredit, certify: *authorize, license, commission.

Con. *Forbid, prohibit, interdict, enjoin, ban, inhibit;

Ana. analogous words. Ant. antonyms. Con. contrasted words. See also explanatory notes facing page 1.

*hinder, impede, obstruct, block, bar: thwart, *frustrate, foil, circumvent.

lethal. *Deadly, fatal, mortal.

Ana. Destroying or destructive (see corresponding verb at DESTROY): killing, slaying (see KILL): *pernicious, baneful, noxious: *poisonous, virulent, venomous, toxic.

Con. Salutory, wholesome, hygienic, *healthful: renewing, restoring or restorative (see corresponding verbs at RENEW).

lethargic. Lethargic, sluggish, torpid, stuporous, comatose come into comparison when they mean being by constitution or condition physically, and often mentally, inert or inactive. Lethargic usually implies a constitutional, but sometimes a temporary or morbid (i.e., induced by disease), state of sleepiness or drowsiness that makes for slowness in reactions, responses, or movements, or for temperamental apathy; as, drugs that induce a lethargic condition; "[Nature] allows not such noble faculties to lie lethargic" (Hume); "Not all the industry of a Hercules will suffice to awaken the lethargic brain" (Mencken); "But it [a calm succeeding agitation] was no lethargic calm; my brain was more active than ever" (Hudson). Sluggish applies not only to persons, but to anything that by its nature moves, acts, or functions: the term implies conditions which create stagnation, inertia, indolence, or other signs of inability to proceed at a normal or usual pace; as, sluggish attention; a sluggish liver; a sluggish pond; a sluggish circulation; a sluggish market for securities. "Three years of intensive teaching have conquered the sluggish mind" (A. Replier). "England has become unenterprising and sluggish because England has been so prosperous and comfortable" (H. G. Wells). Torpid suggests the loss of power of feeling and of exertion: literally it implies the numb or benumbed state of a hibernating animal, but in its more common extended sense it implies a lack of the energy, vim, responsiveness, or the like, that one associates with healthy, vital, active beings; as, "Memory was not so utterly torpid in Silas that it could not be awakened by these words" (G. Eliot); "still Richard was torpid; could not think or move" (V. Woolf); "Consecrated custom may keep Chinese civilisation safe in a state of torpid immobility for five thousand years" (Inge). Stuporous also implies marked unresponsiveness but it suggests a mind and heart dulled by drugs, disease, or the like, rather than in a frozen or benumbed state. The term is chiefly used in reference to psychopathological conditions; as, melancholia that manifests itself in a stuporous condition; the stuporous state of mind of a drug addict. Comatose literally suggests a being in the state of profound insensibility called coma that results from a disease such as diabetes or uremia which spreads poisons through the system, or from severe injury, or the like. "The almost comatose condition which had first supervened never developed into a fatal diabetic coma" (H. Ellis). In extended use, comatose implies stupor, torpidity, or other manifestations of extreme lethargy; as, "Wailing, stupid, comatose creatures" (Emerson).

Ana. Inert, idle, *inactive, supine, passive: phlegmatic, stolid, *impassive, apathetic: *languid, languorous, lackadaisical, listless: *slow, dilatory, laggard.

Ant. Energetic, vigorous. — Con. Alert, quick-witted, *intelligent: *quick, ready, prompt, apt: responsive (see TENDER): *spirited, gingery, peppery.

lethargy. Lethargy, languor, lassitude, stupor, torpor, torpidity come into comparison as meaning physical and mental inertness. Lethargy implies a state, marked by an aversion to activity, which has been induced by disease, extreme fatigue or exhaustion, overeating or overdrinking, constant frustration, or the like, and which exhibits itself in drowsiness or apathy; as, "[Arabs] reduced... to the condition of static lethargy... in which they now find themselves" (A. Huxley). "What means this heaviness that hangs upon me? This lethargy that creeps through all my senses? Nature, oppress'd and harrass'd out with care, Sinks down to rest" (Addison). Languor (cf. LAGUID) in early English use applied chiefly to a condition of weakness, faintness, or delicacy of constitution induced by illness and serving as a bar to exertion or effort. "Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death" (Pope). Gradually, however, the term has come to imply an inertia resulting from soft living, from an enervating climate, from amorous emotion, or the like. "Radiant with ardour divine, Beacons of Hope ye appear! Languor is not in your heart, Weakness is not in your word, Weariness not on your brow" (Arnold). "From the winter's gray despair, From the summer's golden languor, Death, the lover of Life, Frees us for ever" (Henley). "That stick over which his tall person swayed with fashionable languor" (Mrs. Oliphant). Lassitude implies a physical condition resulting from strain, overwork, poor health, intense worry, or the like, and resulting in listlessness or seediness: it usually connotes an inertia of mind or body which one has not the strength to fight; as, "the results of overstrained energies are feebleness and lassitude" (Borrow); "She sat for twenty minutes or more ere she could summon resolution to go down to the door, her courage being lowered to zero by her physical lassitude" (Hardy). Stupor implies a state of heaviness when the mind is deadened as by extreme drowsiness, intoxication, narcotic poisoning, the coma of illness, or the like: the term may imply any state from a dreamy trancelike condition to almost complete unconsciousness; as, "there is... something almost narcotic in much mediaeval poetry; one is lulled into a pleasing stupor" (Lowes); "the sort of animal-like stupor in which his father [a confirmed drunkard and idler] had lived" (S. Anderson). Torpor and torpidity suggest a condition approaching that of a hibernating animal which has lost all power of exertion or of feeling: both terms, especially when employed in reference to persons, usually connote suspended animation or the extreme sluggishness and inertness of some forms of insanity: torpidity, however, probably more often applies to a physical condition (as, the torpidity of a person's liver; the torpidity induced by the extreme cold) and torpor, to a mental state. "Causes... now acting... to blunt the discriminating powers of the mind, and, unfitting it for all voluntary exertion, to reduce it to a state of almost savage torpor" (Wordsworth). "A death-like torpor has succeeded to her former intellectual activity" (Prescott).

Ana. Sluggishness, comatoseness (see corresponding adjectives at LETHARGIC): indolence, slothfulness or sloth, laziness (see corresponding adjectives at LAZY): inertness or inertia, inactivity, idleness, passiveness, supineness (see corresponding adjectives at INACTIVE): apathy, phlegm, impassivity (see under IMPASSIVE).

Ant. Vigor. — Con. Quickness, readiness, promptness, aptness (see corresponding adjectives at QUICK): alertness, quick-wittedness (see corresponding adjectives at INTELLIGENT).

letter, n. Letter, epistle, missive, note, message, dispatch (or despatch), report, memorandum come into comparison only when they mean a written or otherwise formulated communication sent by mail, telegraph, messenger, or the like. Letter is the ordinary term for any written, typed, or printed communication sent by any means of transmission, but especially by mail, to a person, a company, a body, or the like, regardless of whether it deals with personal or business matters or with affairs of public concern; as, she received a letter from her husband yesterday; all letters sent out from the belligerent countries are censored; he addressed an open letter (i.e., one given out for publication) to his constituents. Epistle is now seldom used in place of letter except historically in reference to the letters of advice and counsel such as those of the Apostles Peter, Paul, etc., in the New Testament (as, the Second Epistle to the Corinthians) and to certain open letters in poetry so called by their authors (as, Pope's "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot"), or humorously or sarcastically (as, "Samuel's letter... was merely the amiable epistle of a son-in-law anxious to be a little more than correct"—Bennett). Missive is now usually a high-flown term for a sealed personal letter, especially one containing private information or expressions of love; as, "Scarce had Ripton plunged his head into the missive, than he gave way to violent transports" (Meredith). Note applies to a very short letter or other communication that is brief and pointed: the term is applicable to any such communication whether it is formal or informal; as, to send a note of condolence; to write a note of acceptance or of thanks for a gift. In diplomatic usage, note is applied to a formal communication sent by one government to another; as, "The Porte... acknowledged the validity of the Latin claims in a formal note" (Kipling). Message differs from all the preceding terms in being applicable not only to a written, typed, or printed communication but to one that is orally transmitted as over the telephone or by a messenger or servant, or is telegraphed, cabled, radioed, or the like; as, to send a message to his mother that he had been called out of town; "But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke xix. 14). In official, especially governmental, use message applies to a formal communication from the head of the state, such as one sent by the president of the United States to Congress, or by a governor to the law-making body of the state; as, President Wilson broke tradition by delivering his messages to Congress personally. Dispatch applies to any message, especially any brief message, that is sent posthaste as by telegraph, cable, or radiotelegraph: the term is often used specifically for any message sent by such means of transmission; as, to send a dispatch asking a hotel to reserve a room. In more technical language, dispatch applies to the telegraphed messages sent by an authorized correspondent to a newspaper or news association: it also specifically applies to any important official message, often one in cipher, sent by (or to) the government to (or by) a diplomatic, military, or naval officer in its service. Report (for fuller discussion of this sense see ACCOUNT, 3) applies particularly to a communication sent by a diplomat or similar official to his own government, but the term is also applicable to any official communication giving a detailed statement of facts, proceedings, or recommendations; as, the committee on foreign affairs is ready to make a report to congress; the school sends a monthly report of each student's work to his parents. Memorandum, as here compared, is used chiefly in business for an informal communication sent to an executive or employee, conveying instructions, directions, or the like.

2 In plural form letters. *Literature, belles-lettres, the humanities.

level, adj. Level, flat, plat, plane, plain, even, smooth, flush come into comparison chiefly as applied to surfaces and as meaning having a surface such as that of a perfectly calm lake or sea with no part higher than another. That is level whose surface, from every point of view, lies on a line corresponding to or parallel with that of the horizon; as, the top of the table is not perfectly level; the prairies are vast stretches of nearly level land; a plot of ground made level by grading. But level is also applicable to an adjacent surface lying in exactly the same plane; as, in the spring, the river's surface is often level with its banks; to erect buildings whose roofs are level with one another. In extended use, level implies an equality of parts, or of one thing with another, so that there are no manifest fluctuations, irregularities, differences, or the like; thus, to speak in a level voice is to speak without the variations in pitch or voice volume that indicate imperfect self-control; to keep a level head is to keep free from distracting excitement; to attempt no work that is not level with one's capacities is to avoid work above one's powers or skill. That is flat (see also INSIPID) or, in limited dialectal use, plat, which is marked by the absence of noticeable curvatures, prominences, or depressions, whether it lies in a horizontal plane or not; as, there is no flat ground hereabouts; the flat face of a cliff; the sides of a pyramid are all flat. But flat may apply to anything that lies directly upon or against a flat surface; as, flat feet; lay the map flat on the table; the chairs have their backs flat against the wall; here he is, flat on the ground. In figurative use, flat applies sometimes to that which is so lacking in variation or variety as to be monotonous (as, a flat speech delivered by the new president; a flat entertainment) or to that which gives no ground for doubt or for difference in description because direct, pure, complete, or the like (as, a flat question; a belief that is flat heresy; a flat failure) or to that which is fixed or absolutely exact (as, to ask a flat price; he ran the race in a flat ten seconds). That is plane (the geometrical and scientific term) or plain (the original but now rare sense of this word) which is flat and, usually, level. Plain applies chiefly but not exclusively to the ground; as, "The crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain" (Isaiah xl. 4); "I recovered some strength, so as to be able to walk a little on plain ground" (J. Wesley). Plane, on the other hand, more often applies to angles, curves, figures (such as triangles, rectangles, pentagons, etc.) all points of which lie in the same real or imaginary surface (called a plane) so that if any two points be taken within the boundary lines of the angle, curve, or figure, the straight line joining them lies wholly within that surface; thus, plane geometry, which deals with plane angles, curves, and figures, is distinguished from solid geometry; the plane sides of a crystal or of a cut and polished emerald. Even (see also STEADY) implies a uniformity of all the points, not only of a plane surface but also of a line, so that the surface's flatness or levelness, or the line's straightness, is observable; as, he trimmed the top of the hedge to make it even; the hem of your skirt is not even; "the frigate was on an even keel" (Marryat). Smooth implies perfect evenness of surface, as though polished, rolled, planed, or otherwise freed even from the slightest traces of roughness or unevenness; as, the smooth surface of a rubbed and polished table; a smooth lawn; "The tall bamboo and the long moss threw farther shadows... over the smooth bayou" (Stark Young). Flush applies to a surface or to a line that is in the same horizontal or vertical plane, or forms a continuous surface or line, with another surface or line; as, the front of the house is flush with the front boundary line; the river's surface is now flush with that of its banks; a flush panel; in the ordinary printed page, all lines are flush except those in titles or headings or those that are indented for paragraphing.

Ana. Parallel, uniform, like, alike, akin, identical, *similar: *same, equivalent, equal.

Con. Undulating, fluctuating, swaying (see SWING, v.): varying, changing (see CHANGE, v.).

Antf. Chaste. — Con. Decent, pure, modest (see CHASTE): *moral, virtuous: continent, temperate (see SOBER).

lexicon. *Dictionary, wordbook, glossary, onomasticon, gazetteer, synonymicon.

liability. *Debt, indebtedness, obligation, debit, arrear, arrearage.

Antf. Asset (or plural assets).

liable. 1 Amenable, answerable, *responsible, accountable.

Ana. Obligated, constrained, compelled (see FORCE, v.): bound, tied (see TIE, v.).

Con. Exempt, immune (see corresponding nouns at EXEMPTION): *free, independent.

2 Liable, open, exposed, subject, prone, susceptible, sensitive, incident come into comparison when they are used with reference to persons or things, followed by to (sometimes of), and mean being by nature or situation in a position where something stated or implied may happen. Liable (as here considered: see also APT, 2; RESPONSIBLE) is used particularly when the thing one incurs or may incur is the result of one's obligation to authority, of one's state in life, or of submission to forces beyond one's control; as, "one of the most horrible diseases to which mankind is liable" (C. W. Eliot); "literature is liable to obsolescence, not only because language changes and gradually becomes less intelligible, but because the ideas, the interests, the conception of life it expresses, the very form of the thought, the experiences which arouse emotion, all become obsolete" (R. Aldington); "Ultimately 32 per cent. of those liable to military service joined the forces" (Inge). Open, literally not closed, covered, or obstructed, as here considered suggests lack of barriers or ease of access; as, "To-night, with his mind open to all impressions of romance" (Arch. Marshall); "another modern tendency in education... somewhat more open to question—I mean the tendency to make education useful rather than ornamental" (B. Russell). Exposed presupposes the same conditions as open, but it is more restricted in application because it implies a position or state of peril or a lack of protection or of resistance; as, the left flank was fully exposed to the attack of the enemy; the children were exposed to scarlet fever. Subject and prone (see also PRONE, 2) both suggest greater likelihood of incurring or suffering than liable and even less resistance than exposed. Etymologically, both connote the position of being under the sway or control of a superior power, but otherwise they differ in implications. Subject implies openness for any reason, such as a state in life, a social, economic, or political status, a temperament, a constitution, a nature, etc., to something which must be suffered, borne, undergone, or the like; as, "the French people would have stood permanently weak, open to invasion and subject to continual interference" (Belloc); "Both were subject to constant criticism from men and bodies of men whose minds were as acute and whose learning was as great as their own" (H. Adams); "Paul was rather a delicate boy, subject to bronchitis" (D. H. Lawrence); "the cycles to which all civilisations are subject" (H. Ellis); "The constitution was strictly an unwritten one, and was avowedly subject to revision in the light of new developments" (Buchan). Prone, on the other hand, usually implies that the person, or less often the thing, concerned is more or less governed by a propensity or predisposition to something pleasant or unpleasant which makes him or it almost certain to incur or to do something when conditions are favorable; as, "You may well warn me against such an evil. Human nature is so prone to fall into it" (Austen); "I think that girls are less prone than boys to punish oddity by serious physical cruelty" (B. Russell); "in those industries that are most prone to periods of depression and unemployment" (J. A. Hobson); "Our painters are prone to acquiesce in the colours of nature as they find them, rather than to use colours expressive of the mood evoked in themselves" (Binyon). Susceptible carries a stronger implication than any of the preceding terms, with the exception of prone, of something in the person's or thing's nature, character, constitution, or temperament that makes him or it unresistant to a thing (often a deleterious thing or a thing that exerts a deleterious influence) or liable to it; as, to be susceptible to infection; she was very susceptible to criticism: when used attributively, it often implies a readiness to fall in love; as, a very susceptible young man. "Wheat tends to be very susceptible to smut" (C. C. Furnas). "A mind enormously more susceptible to tragic impressions than your own" (C. E. Montague). "[Mark Twain] who seemed to his friends such a natural-born actor, who was, in childhood, susceptible not only to somnambulism but to mesmeric control" (Van W. Brooks). Sometimes, however, susceptible stresses openness by reason of one's nature, character, or constitution, rather than liability: it is then followed by of (the phrase susceptible of often being merely equivalent to admitting); as, a theory susceptible of proof; "That rhythm [of speech under the stress of emotion] is not the rhythm of verse; it is infinitely more varied, less susceptible of formulation" (Loues); "Today's pedagogical theory asserts that memory cannot be cultivated: it is inborn, full-grown at the start, and not susceptible of increase" (Grandgent). Sensitive differs from susceptible chiefly in implying a physical or emotional condition that predisposes one to certain impressions, certain reactions, or the like; as, "She was too sensitive to abuse and calumny" (Macaulay); "She discovered that with the clarification of her complexion and the birth of pink cheeks her skin had grown more sensitive to the sun's rays" (Hardy); "She was extremely sensitive to neglect, to disagreeable impressions, to want of intelligence in her surroundings" (H. Adams); "The eye is much more sensitive to light than the hand or the balance to weight" (Karl K. Darrow). Incident is not exactly a synonym of the preceding terms, for it applies not to the person or thing that is itself liable or open, but to the thing to which a person or another thing is liable or open. Often, the term means little more than belonging or pertaining to a person or thing as a subordinate feature or as a necessary or usual accompaniment; thus, old persons are subject to hardening of the arteries, but hardening of the arteries is incident to old age; life is subject to change, but change is incident to life; "a malady Most incident to maids" (Shak.); "For I have no doubt that the disease of self-consciousness is incident to intelligent youth" (A. C. Benson). "The fact that the statute... may bear hard upon some individuals... is no greater infirmity than is incident to all law" (Justice Holmes).

Ant. Exempt, immune.

3 Likely, *apt.

liaison. Intrigue, *amour, affair, affaire.

libel, n. Libel, skit, squib, lampoon, pasquinade (or, now rare, pasquin, pasquil) are here compared as meaning a public and often satirical presentation of faults or weaknesses, especially those of an individual. Libel is now the correct legal term for any statement or representation (such as a cartoon), published or circulated without just cause or excuse which tends to expose a person to public contempt, hatred, or ridicule; in earlier and now only historical use, the term applies specifically to a leaflet or handbill publicly circulated or posted in a public place and containing a scurrilous attack, especially on an individual; as, "cheap senseless libels were scattered about the city" (Clarendon). Skit applies to an amusing satire (originally a comment or remark, now often a dramatic sketch or story that may be more humorous or ironical than satirical) of no very great weight or seriousness: the term seldom connotes malice, bitterness, or abusiveness, but it often suggests the infliction of a sting; as, "He did not deserve your skit about his 'Finsbury Circus gentility'" (FitzGerald); the first of the one-act plays was a skit, more or less obviously dealing with the prime minister's attempt to forestall war. Squib (originally and still literally a kind of firecracker), as here compared, applies to any short and clever, often more or less malicious, piece of satirical writing that makes its point with a sharp thrust and evokes laughter or amusement; as, "No one was more faithful to his early friends... particularly if they could write a squib" (Disraeli). Lampoon (etymologically, a drinking song), suggests even more virulence and abusiveness than libel, and a coarser humor than skit or squib; as, "a lust to misapply. Make satire a lampoon, and fiction, lie" (Pope); "On his master at Twyford he had already exercised his poetry in a lampoon" (Johnson). Pasquinade was originally applied to one of the anonymous lampoons attached to a mutilated statue, called Pasquin or Pasquino, in Rome on St. Mark's day; the term now is preferred to lampoon when similar circumstances (such as anonymity, public posting, extreme scurrility) are implied; as, "The white walls of the barracks were covered with... pasquinades leveled at Cortez" (Prescott).

Ana. Scurrility, invective, vituperation, *abuse: burlesque, travesty (see CARICATURE, n.).

libel, v. Defame, slander, *malign, traduce, asperse, vilify, calumniate.

Ana. Revile, vituperate (see SCOLD): *decry, disparage, derogate from, detract from: caricature, travesty, burlesque (see under CARICATURE, n.).

liberal, adj. 1 Liberal, generous, bountiful, munificent, handsome come into comparison when they are applied to a person, or to his deeds, utterances, or the like, and mean showing or revealing a spirit of giving freely and without stint. Liberal suggests openhandedness or lack of closeness, meanness, or the like, in the giver, and largeness in the thing that is given; as, to make a liberal provision for a son at college; a liberal offer for a house; liberal in praise. "The magazines, like the newspapers, were liberal with their space, but again the results were terribly meagre" (V. Heiser). Generous usually emphasizes some positive quality of heart or mind that prompts the giver or the gift, such as warmhearted readiness to give, forgetfulness of self, or magnanimity, more than the size or importance of the gift; as, to make a generous provision for one's servants in one's will; to reject a friend's generous offer of assistance; "a generous view of humanity" (A. C. Benson). "Mark Twain's boys 'not manly enough nor brave enough' to do a generous action where there was a chance that it could get them into trouble?" (Van W. Brooks). Bountiful suggests lavish or unrelenting generosity in providing or giving. "He is a worthy gentleman... as bountiful. As mines of India" (Shak.). "Lady Bountiful" (Farquhar). "The Governor of all, Himself to all So bountiful" (Cowper). Munificent stresses splendid or princely liberality; as, a munificent endowment. "If riches increase, let thy mind hold pace with them; and think it not enough to be liberal but munificent" (Browne). Handsome, as here compared, is not applicable to a person (for this use see BEAUTIFUL), but it is often a close synonym of liberal (with a suggestion of astonishing largeness) when applied to a gift, an offer, a remuneration, or the like. "In the case of the King and other public dignitaries we have arranged that they shall have handsome incomes" (Shaw). "They figured on the boards of all the old-established charities, gave handsomely to thriving institutions" (E. Wharton). On the other hand, it is often a close synonym of generous, especially when applied to an act or deed that evokes admiration for its unexpected magnanimity or graciousness. "Through this handsome conduct of the dean the dispute was amicably settled" (J. H. Monk). "I should like you to think of our house as your home, Tony.... This was handsome, if it was meant, and there seemed no reason why it shouldn't be" (Arch. Marshall).

Ana. Lavish, prodigal, *profuse, exuberant: benevolent, philanthropic, *charitable.

Ant. Close (sense 5). — Con. *Stingy, niggardly, closefisted, tight, tightfisted, penurious, miserly, parsimonious: *meager, scanty.

2 Liberal, progressive, advanced, radical, left are used more or less loosely to mean the opposite of conservative in opinions, views, and policies. The secondary implications of all these words (with the possible exception of progressive) are often determined by the bias of the persons who use them; they may therefore carry connotations of extreme disparagement or of strong approval. Liberal implies emancipation from that which binds the mind or will and connotes either indifference to tradition, convention, dogmas, or laws, or the rejection of one or more of these. It therefore may suggest tolerance and broad-mindedness on the one hand, or unorthodoxy, laxness, or even lawlessness, on the other; as, a liberal Christian; a liberal Democrat; liberal liquor legislation. "Some people who themselves hold liberal views are willing that their children shall first acquire conventional morals" (B. Russell). Progressive is commonly a relative term, because it usually implies a comparison with those that are reactionary or backward. "Mentally so progressive that they were agitating for schools and the vote" (V. Heiser). It implies, therefore, a willingness to forsake past methods or beliefs, but it seldom suggests the espousal of extreme policies; as, a progressive business man; a progressive political party; progressive ideas in education. Advanced, on the other hand, is usually applied to men or ideas that are, or are believed to be, ahead of their time. It therefore often implies extreme liberalism or progressiveness and distinctively connotes mental daring. Sometimes, however, it strongly implies adventurousness or foolhardiness and impracticality. "Dr. Ashmore, the new Rector of St. Matthew's, had been chosen because he was very 'advanced': his sermons were considered bold in thought and novel in language" (E. Wharton). Radical often is employed in place of advanced, but in discriminating use it commonly implies a willingness to root up and destroy the institutions which conserve or propagate the ideas or policies condemned; it is often therefore applied to anarchists, bolsheviks, and the like. "Radical ideas let loose by the American Revolution, the French Revolution, the revolutionary movements of 1848, have slowly but profoundly affected men's desires and their demands upon government" (Frankfurter). Left is used chiefly in politics to designate a person, party, view, or policy that is liberal or radical. In current use, it commonly connotes extremeness, and often is preferred to radical since so many hitherto radical ideas have been generally accepted.

Ana. Tolerant, *forbearing, indulgent, lenient.

Ant. Authoritarian. — Con. Strait, *narrow: strict, stringent, *rigid, rigorous: dogmatic, doctrinaire, *dictatorial, oracular.

liberate. Release, *free, emancipate, manumit, deliver, discharge, enfranchise, enfranchise.

Ana. Disengage, *detach: *extricate, disentangle, untangle, disencumber, disembarass: *rescue, redeem, ransom, deliver.

Con. *Imprison, incarcerate, immure, intern: confine, circumscribe, restrict, *limit: *tie, bind: ensnare, snare, entrap, trap (see CATCH).

libertine. *Licentious, lewd, wanton, lustful, lascivious, libidinous, lecherous.

Ana. Debauched, corrupted or corrupt (see under DEBASE): *abandoned, dissolute, profligate, reprobate: *immoral, unmoral, amoral.

Ant. Strait-laced. — Con. *Moral, virtuous, ethical: continent, *sober, temperate: *chaste, decent.

liberty. *Freedom, license.

Ana. Independence, autonomy (see under FREE, adj.): *exemption, immunity: liberation, emancipation, enfranchisement, delivery (see corresponding verbs at FREE): scope, *range, compass, sweep libidinous. Lecherous, lustful, lascivious, lewd, wanton, libertine, *licentious.

Ant. Restraint. — Con. Constraint, compulsion, duress, coercion (see FORCE, n.): confinement, restriction, limitation, circumscription (see corresponding verbs at LIMIT).

Ana. Sensual, animalistic, animal, *carnal: *immoral: gross, obscene, *coarse: dissolute, *abandoned, profligate, reprobate.

library. *Museum, archives, treasury, thesaurus, gallery.

license or licence, n. Liberty, *freedom.

Ana. *Exemption, immunity: looseness, laxity, slackness, relaxedness or relaxation (see corresponding adjectives at LOOSE): privilege, prerogative (see RIGHT).

Ant. Decorum. — Con. *Obligation, duty: decency, propriety (see DECORUM): restraint, constraint, compulsion (see FORCE): continence, *temperance, sobriety.

license or licence, v. *Authorize, commission, accredit.

Ana. Permit, *let, allow, suffer: *approve, endorse, sanction, certify: empower, *enable.

Ant. Ban. — Con. Interdict, inhibit, enjoin, prohibit, *forbid: *restrain, curb, check.

licentious. Licentious, libertine, lewd, wanton, lustful, lascivious, libidinous, lecherous are here compared as meaning given to or indicative of immorality in sex relations, or unchaste habits. Licentious, literally given to license, or lack of restraint, is now chiefly used in a sense implying disregard of the restraints imposed by any law or custom enforcing chastity: the term stresses looseness of life and of habits rather than the imperiousness of one's desires; as, licentious living; licentious morals; "a spectre at their licentious feasts" (Dickens). Libertine suggests a more open and a more habitual disregard of moral laws, especially those pertaining to the sex relations of men and women; as, "The frank libertine wit of their old stage" (Gibbon); he castigated the libertine lives of many of his generation. Lewd so often retains from earlier and now obsolete senses (cf. "certain lewd fellows of the baser sort"—Acts xvii. 5) connotations of grossness, vileness, and vulgarity which color its other implications of sensuality, dissoluteness, and unconcern for chastity, that in contrast with the preceding terms it is less often applied to persons, or to the manners, thoughts, and acts of persons, who show breeding, refinement, or gentility in any measure than to those of low station, dull wits, coarse habits, and the like; as, to be seen in the company of lewd women; lewd songs; lewd actions in public. Wanton (see also PLAYFUL, SUPEREROGATORY) implies moral irresponsibility, or a disposition or a life manifesting an indifference to moral restraints: it often suggests freedom from restraint comparable to that of animals, thereby connoting lightness, incapacity for faithfulness or seriousness, or a generally unmoral attitude; as, "Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness" (Romans xiii. 13); "So wanton, light and false, my love, are you, I am most faithless when I most am true" (Millay). Lustful implies the influence or the frequent incitement of desires, especially of strong, and often unlawful, sexual desires; as, a lustful passion; a lustful man. Lascivious, like lewd, definitely suggests sensuality, but it carries a clearer implication of an inclination to lustfulness or of a capacity for inciting lust; as, lascivious desires; lascivious thoughts; lascivious glances; lascivious dress; "To the lascivious pipe and wanton song, That charm down fear, they frolic it along" (Cowper); arrested and charged with being lewd and lascivious in speech and behavior. Libidinous and lecherous are the strongest of all these terms in their implications of deeply ingrained lustfulness and of debauchery. Libidinous distinctively suggests a complete surrender to one's sexual desires (as, "A lewd youth . . . advances by degrees into a libidinous old man"—Addison); lecherous clearly implies habitual indulgence of one's lust, the term often being used when any of the others would seem too weak to express one's contempt (as, "Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless villain!"—Shak.).

Ana. Profligate, reprobate, dissolute, *abandoned: debauched, depraved, corrupted or corrupt (see under DEBASE): lax, *loose, relaxed: *immoral, unmoral, amoral.

Ant. Continent. — Con. *Chaste, decent, pure: *moral, virtuous: strict, *rigid: austere, ascetic, *severe.

licit. *Lawful, legitimate, legal.

Ana. Permitted, allowed (see LET): sanctioned, approved (see APPROVE): authorized, licensed (see AUTHORIZE): regulated (see ADJUST).

Ant. Illicit. — Con. Forbidden, prohibited, interdicted, inhibited, banned (see FORBID).

lick, v. Beat, defeat, *conquer, vanquish, subdue, subjugate, reduce, overcome, surmount, overthrow, rout.

lickspittle, lickspit. *Parasite, sycophant, toady, hanger-on, leech, sponge, favorite.

lie, n. Lie, falsehood, untruth, fib, misrepresentation, story come into comparison when they mean a statement or declaration that does not conform to the truth. Lie is usually felt to be a term of extreme opprobrium because it implies a flat and unquestioned contradiction of the truth, and an intent to deceive or mislead. Seldom, except in the expression "white lie" (that is, an untrue statement that is harmless or is insignificant in its content), does the term involve no implication of moral censures. "You told a lie; an odious, damned lie" (Shak.). "People . . . don't send for him [the minister] every time they make a slight moral slip,—tell a lie, for instance, or smuggle a silk dress through the custom-house" (Holmes). Falsehood is not only less censorious than lie, but it is also wider in its range of application. The term may or may not imply sinfulness or criminality, for it applies not only to lies of any degree, but to fictions, such as literary fictions, polite fictions, some legal fictions, and the like. Like lie, the term implies known nonconformity to the truth, but unlike lie, it does not invariably suggest a desire to pass off as true that which is known to be untrue; as, "'Tis not enough, your counsel still be true; Blunt truths more mischief than nice falsehoods do" (Pope); "Mr. Bulstrode shrank from the direct falsehood of denying true statements" (G. Eliot); "Falsehoods which we spurn to-day Were the truths of long ago" (Whittier). Untruth is often euphemistic for lie or falsehood and carries the same implications; as, "'How do those Signal people find out things?' . . . 'I don't know,' said Mr. Critchlow. This was an untruth. Mr. Critchlow had himself given the information" (Bennett). Sometimes, however, untruth may apply to an untrue statement made as a result of ignorance or a misconception of the truth; as, so far as he knew he had never told an untruth; little children with vivid imaginations seldom know the difference between a truth and an untruth. Fib is a colloquial, often childishly colloquial, term for an untruth or for a trivial falsehood: it is often applied to one told to save one's own or another's face. "Not that I couldn't tell a downright fib if I had to . . . but a lie is to me just as silly a performance when it is about marriage or work as about the law of gravitation" (M. Austin). Misrepresentation applies to a misleading (usually an intentionally or deliberately misleading) statement which gives an impression that is contrary to the truth: the term implies glossing over defects or weaknesses as in something offered for sale, or placing the emphasis upon details that high-light a character, an occurrence, or a train of events rather than on those that in reality marked it; as, he claimed that the advertisement was a misrepresentation; "our guides deceived us with misrepresentations" (Addison); the biography is full of misrepresentations. Story is a colloquialism, used chiefly by children or in conversation with children, in place of any of the preceding terms, especially falsehood, untruth, and fib.

Ana. Prevarication, equivocation, fibbing or fib (see corresponding verbs at LIE): mendaciousness or mendacity, untruthfulness, dishonesty, deceitfulness (see corresponding adjectives at DISHONEST).

Ant. Truth. — Con. Veracity, verity, verisimilitude (see TRUTH).

lie, v. Lie, prevaricate, equivocate, palter, fib agree in meaning to tell an untruth directly or indirectly. Lie is the straightforward word, imputing dishonesty to the speaker; as, I shall tell him to his face that he lies; "He lies, and he knows he lies" (Johnson). Prevaricate (etymologically, to walk crookedly or deviate from a straight course) is often used in place of lie as a more formal term; in strict use, however, it implies evasion of the truth, as by quibbling, dodging the real point, or confusing the issue; as, "Thou dost prevaricate . . . thou wouldst sophistically imply both are unlawful" (Butler, 1612-1680); "he could prevaricate no longer, and, confessing to the gambling, told her the truth" (Hardy); "'Even if it was so, which I don't say it is'—'Don't prevaricate,' said Mr. Lorry" (Dickens). Equivocate implies saying one thing and meaning another; it usually suggests the use of words that carry more than one sense in the hope that the sense which gives the incorrect impression may be the one accepted by the hearer; as, "You . . . equivocate; For 'real,' as you now the word expound, From solid substance dwindles to a sound" (Dryden); "By equivocating, hesitating, and giving ambiguous answers, she effected her purpose" (H. Martineau). Palter implies a playing fast and loose, not only in statements but in dealings; it often specifically implies prevarication, equivocation, or the making of promises one does not intend to keep; as, "And be these juggling fiends no more believ'd That palter with us in a double sense" (Shak.); "Caroline, don't go back—don't palter with us—abide by your own words" (Edgeworth); "If you palter or double in your answers, I will have thee hung alive in an iron chain" (Scott). Fib (see also LIE, n.) may be used as a euphemism for lie, but it more often implies the telling of an untruth that is trivial either in matter or in significance; as, she was given to fibbing about her admirers; the child fibs when he thinks he can gain his end.

Ana. *Deceive, delude, mislead, beguile.

lifeless. Inanimate, *dead, defunct, deceased, departed, late.

Ana. Inert, *inactive, passive: *stiff, rigid, stark, wooden, inflexible: torpid (see LETHARGIC).

Ant. Living. — Con. Alive, quick, animate, animated, vital (see LIVING): *active, operative, dynamic, live.

lift, v. 1 Lift, raise, rear, elevate, hoist, heave, boost are here compared as meaning (literally or figuratively) to move from a lower to a higher place or position. Lift often carries an implication of effort exerted to overcome the resistance of weight (as, to lift a large stone; to lift a pail of water from the ground; to lift a child to one's shoulders) but it may be used more or less figuratively of anything that rises high by natural or artificial means or processes (as, the mountains lift their peaks in the air; "High lifted up were many lofty towers"—Spenser) or of anything immaterial that rises or is made to rise as if in spirit, in feeling, in aspiration, or the like (as, "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul"—Psalms lxxxvi. 4; the news lifted a weight from his mind; "One memory of the green corn, fresh beneath the sun and wind, will lift up the heart from the clods"—Jefferies). Raise may or may not suggest less effort than lift, but it carries a stronger implication of bringing something to the vertical or other high position for which it is fitted by nature, by function, or the like; thus, "to raise a pole" is to set it on end but "to lift a pole" is to pick it up from the ground; "to raise a flag" is to cause it to rise to the top of a flagstaff, but "to lift a flag" is to hold it up high enough so that everyone can see it; so, in figurative use, one who gives the care and attention necessary to their production and growth is said to raise crops; one who collects the constituent elements and gathers them together is said to raise a fund or to raise an army. "The most whole-hearted attempt ever made to raise the individual to his highest power" (Day Lewis). Rear is often used in place of raise, especially in literary English (as, "the mast we rear"—Pope; "the May-pole was reared"—Irving), and it is the preferred term (except in certain sections, especially the southern United States) when reference is to the bringing up of children (as, to bear five children and to rear three of them; cf. born and raised in South Carolina). Also, as an intransitive verb it means to raise itself, or in the case of a horse, to raise its forelegs (as, "The . . . storm-clouds reared on high"—Millay; "horses, rearing and prancing"—S. Anderson). Elevate may be used in place of lift or raise in their literal senses but only in certain collocations where it does not seem unduly formal or pretentious (as, "Lord Henry elevated his eyebrows"—Wilde), but, in general, the word suggests exaltation, uplifting, enhancing, or the like; as, to elevate a priest to a bishopric; to elevate humanity; to elevate one's standards of literary taste. Hoist implies raising something heavy aloft, often but not invariably by mechanical means, such as a tackle; as, to hoist a cargo into a ship; to hoist a sail; hoist me up by my arms to the top of the wall. The term is sometimes preferred to lift in humorous use. "Mrs. Malins was helped down the front steps by her son and Mr. Browne and, after many manoeuvres, hoisted into the cab" (Joyce). Heave implies a lifting with strain or effort as by impulsion from below (as, a boat heaved high by a wave; to heave a sigh) or by means of continuous shoveling (as, to heave coal). "Nature's way of creating a mountain peak—first the heaving up of some blunt monstrous bulk of rumpled rock" (C. E. Montague). Boost, an American colloquialism verging on slang in its extended uses, implies lifting by means of a push or other help from below (or in extended use, by other than the natural or usual agencies); as, he had to be boosted by his companions when he tried to climb the tree; to boost prices; friendly critics boosted the sales of his books; no matter how depressed he might be, a few cocktails always boosted his spirits.

Ana. *Rise, arise, ascend, levitate, mount, soar, tower, rocket, surge: *exalt, magnify, aggrandize: heighten, enhance, *intensify.

Ant. Lower. — Con. Reduce, lessen, diminish, *decrease: *abase, debase, degrade, demean, humble, humiliate: *depress, weigh (down, on, or upon), oppress.

2 Purloin, filch, *steal, pilfer, pinch, snitch, swipe, cop.

light, v.¹ 1 Light, kindle, enkindle, ignite, fire, inflame come into comparison in both their literal and figurative senses because they agree in meaning to set something burning or on fire. Light (see also ILLUMINATE), when it takes as its subject the agent or agency, usually implies as the end of the action illumination (as, she lighted the lamps), or heating (as, he will light a fire in the fireplace), or smoking (as, he lit his cigar), or the like. Kindle, and now rarely enkindle, often, but by no means always, connote difficulty or slowness in setting combustible materials (wood, straw, vegetation, and the like) afire or aflame: it is therefore the preferred word when that which is to burn requires special preparation or does not at once burst into flame; as, using kerosene to kindle the damp wood; a carelessly thrown match kindled one of the worst forest fires in the state's history; bonfires were kindled on the top of every hill. Ignite is not only much more common in technical than in popular use, but it also (though to a lesser degree than formerly) manifests a difference in meaning. In technical use, ignite sometimes implies heating of a substance until it glows or becomes incandescent (as, when the electric current is turned on, it ignites the tungsten filaments in the bulbs) but it more often, especially in recent use, implies the placing of a small flame or spark (often an electric spark) in direct or indirect contact with a substance such as gasoline, fuel oil, or gunpowder so as to produce its combustion; as, to ignite the charge in the cylinder of an internal-combustion engine or the charge of powder in a gun. In more popular use, ignite varies little from kindle except in being more frequently employed in reference to explosives or highly inflammable substances; as, the gas flame ignited the gasoline she was using in cleansing a dress. Fire, the more colloquial term, and inflame, the more literary and, in its literal senses, now unusual, term, both imply blazing (sometimes with color rather than with light) and rapid combustion of that which is burning; as, a lighted match was sufficient to fire the haystack; "The turnkey fired the little pile, which blazed high and hot" (Dickens); "Fire will inflame straw" (F. W. Robertson).

All of these words are used figuratively as well as literally. Light, as here compared, is purely a figure of speech in such use (as, "Each morn my life I lighted at her eye"—Young); kindle and enkindle imply an exciting, arousing, or stimulating (as, poems that kindle indignation against social wrongs; "real intellectual interest . . . can be kindled . . . by a master who really loves and believes in his subject"—Inge; "In her heart new life was enkindled"—Kingsley); ignite implies a stirring up into activity (as, "flames That low desire ignites and feeds"—J. G. Holland); fire and inflame imply an inspiring with strong passion, ardent desire, intense zeal, fire usually being chosen when the agent or agency enables or induces energetic activity; inflame, when it merely arouses passion, often ignoble or dangerous passion (as, "The nations of Europe were fired with boundless expectation"—Johnson; "The subject . . . had fired her imagination"—Jan Struther; "inflamed with lust"—Millon; "nationalistic feeling was never so acutely inflamed as it is today"—A. Huxley).

2 *Lighten, illuminate, illumine, illumine, enlighten, illustrate.

light, v.² *Alight, land, perch, roost.

light, adj. *Easy, simple, facile, effortless, smooth.

Ana. Slight (see THIN): trivial, trifling, *petty, puny.

Ant. Heavy: arduous: burdensome. — Con. Difficult, *hard: *onerous, oppressive, exacting: rigorous, stringent (see RIGID).

lighten, v.¹ *Illuminate, illumine, illumine, light, enlighten, illustrate.

Ant. Darken.

lighten, v.² Alleviate, mitigate, *relieve, assuage, allay.

Ana. Lessen, reduce, diminish, *decrease, abate:

*moderate, temper, attempt, qualify: attenuate, extenuate, *thin, dilute.

Con. *Intensify, aggravate, heighten: *increase, augment: magnify, aggrandize (see EXALT): oppress, weigh (down, on, or upon), *depress.

lighthearted. Cheerful, happy, *glad, joyful, joyous.

Ana. Buoyant, resilient, volatile, effervescent, expansive (see ELASTIC): blithe, jocund, *merry, jolly: high-spirited, *spirited: gay, sprightly, vivacious, *lively.

Ant. Despondent. — Con. Sad, depressed, dejected, melancholy (see corresponding nouns at SADNESS): morose, glum, gloomy, *sullen.

lightness, light-mindedness. Lightness, light- lightness, levity, frivolity, flippancy, volatility, lightness are here compared only as denoting the quality, manner, or attitude of one who is irresponsibly gay or indifferent, especially when seriousness is expected. Lightness, as here compared, implies a general lack of weight or seriousness in character, mood, conduct, or speech; the term may further imply instability (as, "There is a lightness about the feminine mind—a touch and go"—G. Eliot) or freedom from care (as, "Archer looked at her perplexedly, wondering if it were lightness or dissimulation that enabled her to touch so easily on the past"—E. Wharton) or indifference to the seriousness of a situation (as, "treating with lightness what is matter of life and death"—Arnold). Light-mindedness, even more than lightness, suggests a temperamental lack of seriousness or stability; as, society women are often unjustly accused of light-mindedness. Levity usually suggests more specifically trifling or unseasonable gaiety; as, "her [Queen Elizabeth's] levity, her frivolous laughter, her unwomanly jests" (J. R. Green); "Molière and his audience were accustomed to regard conjugal infidelity with levity when it did not touch themselves" (S. Alexander). Frivolity adds to lightness the implication of empty or idle speech or conduct; the term often carries a strong connotation of triviality or of pettiness (as, "the extraordinary frivolity of much which passes for religious interest"—Inge) but its most frequent implication is that of such indulgence in meaningless gaieties that serious employments are disregarded (as, "gay without frivolity"—Arnold; "people...whose idleness and frivolity and extravagance set a most corrupting moral example"—Shaw). Flippancy is especially unbecoming levity or pertness in speaking of or in dealing with serious or sacred things; as, "[Tennyson] was always reverent—hating all levity or flippancy in thought or language about divine things" (Duke of Argyll); "One hardly knows which is the more appalling: the abjectness of the credulity [of those who believe in a First Cause] or the flippancy of the scepticism [of those who disbelieve in one]" (Shaw). Volatility implies such lightness or fickleness of disposition as precludes long or serious dwelling upon any one idea or plan; as, "Volatility of character evinces no capabilities for great affections" (Shelley). Flightiness may imply extreme volatility, often with a suggestion of loss of mental balance (as, his flightiness has been noticeable since his severe illness) but it often suggests extreme capriciousness or a gay whimsicality characteristic of one who is not long contented with what he has or does; as, every employer suspected her of flightiness after a few days' trial.

Ana. Buoyancy, resiliency, elasticity, effervescence, expansiveness (see corresponding adjectives at ELASTIC): gaiety, liveliness, vivaciousness or vivacity (see corresponding adjectives at LIVELY): lightheartedness, cheerfulness (see corresponding adjectives at GLAD).

Ant. Seriousness. — Con. Graveness or gravity, earnestness, soberness, sedateness, staidness (see corresponding adjectives at SERIOUS).

like, adj. *Similar, alike, identical, akin, analogous, comparable, parallel, homogeneous, uniform.

Ana. Equivalent, equal, *same, selfsame, identical, cognate, allied, *related.

Ant. Unlike. — Con. *Different, diverse, divergent, disparate, various: dissimilar, distinct (see corresponding nouns at DISSIMILARITY): discrepant, discordant, *inconsonant, inconsistent.

like, v. Like, love, enjoy, relish, fancy, dote (or doat) on or upon are here compared as meaning to be so attracted to a person or thing as to regard him or it with favor. Like (opposed to dislike), the most general and, especially when unqualified, the most colorless of these words, means merely to regard with distinct favor or without the slightest aversion. Therefore, it is chiefly used in reference to persons or things that are pleasing but evoke no great warmth of feeling or urgency of desire. Love (opposed to hate) implies not only strong liking but ardent attachment and is therefore used with reference to persons or things that arouse the deeper or higher emotions; as, to like one's neighbors; to love one's family; to like the country; to love one's country. "I like a church; I like a cow; I love a prophet of the soul" (Emerson). The habitual use of love for like, with reference to trivial objects (as, I love ice cream), is a vulgarity, but love is often used for like in humorous hyperbole; as, "old Sarah Battle...loved a good game of whist" (Lamb). Enjoy (opposed to loathe or abhor) implies a liking or loving that awakens keen delight (sometimes sensuous, sometimes intellectual, delight but often a mingling of the two) and deep satisfaction; as, "even if she had unconsciously liked it [life in Paris], she had never enjoyed it" (Bennett); "We had written our first stories together...and together enjoyed the first sweets of success" (R. Macaulay); "No one but Molny and the Bishop had ever seemed to enjoy the beautiful site of that building,—perhaps no one ever would. But these two had spent many an hour admiring it" (Cather). "It is this specific quality, the power of enjoying things without being reduced to the need of possessing them, which differentiates the aesthetic instinct from other instincts" (H. Ellis). Relish implies a liking, or sometimes, an enjoyment, that arises because the thing relished meets one's approval, satisfies one's taste, or gives one personal gratification: except in negative expressions, this verb is slightly archaic in its flavor; as, "his fine taste taught him to relish the beauties of Virgil and Cicero" (Hallam); "concerts of classical music, which she did not particularly relish" (Shaw). Fancy (see also THINK, 1) implies a liking for something that corresponds to one's imaginative conception (sometimes, one's ideal) of what it should be (as, "I never yet beheld that special face Which I could fancy more than any other"—Shak.; "He should have yachts, horses, whatever he fancied"—Meredith; "they did not fancy having their demands for a better wage scale confused by the talk of anarchists and socialists"—S. Anderson), or for something that appeals to one's taste, one's eye, or the like, especially at the moment (as, while she was ill, she fancied only the most delicate of foods). Dote on or upon implies an infatuation or a foolish excessive liking; as, "You dote on her that cares not for your love" (Shak.). It is, however, often used colloquially in hyperbole; as, she said she doted on vanilla caramels.

Ana. Prefer, *choose, select, elect: admire, esteem, respect, regard (see under REGARD, n.): *approve, endorse: appreciate, comprehend, *understand.

Ant. Dislike. — Con. *Hate, abhor, detest, abominate, loathe: *despise, condemn, scorn, disdain.

likely, 1 *Probable, possible.

Ana. Credible, believable, colorable, *plausible: reasonable, *rational.

Ant. Unlikely. — Con. *Doubtful, dubious, questionable, problematic: *certain, inevitable, necessary.

2 *Apt, liable.

likeness. Likeness, similarity, resemblance, similitude, analogy, affinity are synonymous terms when they denote agreement or correspondence (or an instance of agreement or correspondence) in details of appearance, in qualities, etc., brought out by a comparison of two or more things. Likeness commonly implies closer correspondence than similarity, which often applies to things which are merely somewhat alike. "Yes, I should have known you anywhere from your likeness to your father" (Arch. Marshall). "Certain insects escape danger by their similarity to plants" (J. Lubbock). Resemblance suggests especially similarity in appearance or in superficial or external qualities. "It would be as difficult to discover any resemblance between the two situations as between the appearance of the persons concerned" (E. Wharton). Similitude, which is now somewhat infrequent in this sense and widely regarded as bookish, is occasionally preferred to likeness or similarity when an abstract term is desired. "The law which reconciles similitude and dissimilitude, the harmony of contrast" (H. Reed). Analogy, in careful use, always implies comparison of things which are unlike, not only specifically or generically, but often even in substance or essence. In its strictest sense, analogy implies likeness or parallelism in relations rather than in appearances or qualities; it is based on assumptions such as that similar causes will produce similar effects or that what is true in one order of existence must be true in another. "Three principal types [of ants] offering a curious analogy to . . . the hunting, pastoral, and agricultural stages in the history of human development" (J. Lubbock). "Such senile efforts to penetrate . . . the mystery of religion . . . have a real analogy to that final effort of the emotionally starved to grasp at love which has been called 'old maid's insanity'" (H. Ellis). Affinity adds to resemblance the implications of a relationship, such as natural kinship, temperamental sympathy, similar experience, or historical influence, which is responsible for the likeness. "In Keats, there are . . . phrases and paradoxes that have surprising affinities with Taoist thought" (Binyon). "His face . . . had a curious affinity to the faces of old sailors or fishermen who have lived a simple, practical life in the light of an overmastering tradition" (Galsworthy).

Ana. Equivalence, equality, sameness, identicalness or identity (see corresponding adjectives at SAME): agreement, conformity, correspondence (see corresponding verbs at AGREE): analogousness, comparableness, homogeneity or homogeneity, uniformity, parallelism (see corresponding adjectives at SIMILAR).

Ant. Unlikeness. — Con. *Dissimilarity: difference, divergence, distinction.

likewise. *Also, too, besides, moreover, furthermore.

limb. Bough, branch, *shoot.

limber, adj. *Supple, lithe, lithesome, lissome.

Ana. Pliant, pliable, *plastic: flexible, *elastic, resilient, springy.

Con. *Stiff, inflexible, rigid, tense, stark, wooden.

limit, n. Limit, bound, confine, end, term, bourn (or bourn) are comparable when they mean an actual or imaginary line beyond which a thing does not or cannot extend. Limit is the most inclusive of these terms because it carries no necessary implication of number, that always being suggested by the context; thus, a thing, such as one's strength, the extent of one's authority, the reach of one's arm may be said to have a limit, implying one only; another thing, such as a race course, a lifetime, a period of time, and the like, may be said to have its limits, but since linear extent and duration are specifically implied, these limits are by implication two in number; so, the limits of a room are usually its four walls; the limits of a country are its boundaries, their number being dependent on the individual country's geographical location. Also, limit may be applied to any line which is fixed by nature or inner necessity, is established by authority, is determined by agreement, or the like; as, within the limits of human reason; the limit of the fisherman's catch is determined by the state game laws for each of the most desirable kinds of fish; to live within the limits of one's income; to determine the limits for the treatment of a topic. Bound and confine, on the other hand, are applicable to only one of the limits that comprise the boundaries (literally or figuratively) of a thing. Both terms are now rarely, if ever, used except in the plural, even when the boundary line is continuous and forms a circle or only one side; the same is true of a bounding surface that forms a sphere; as, within the bounds of the earth; to "beat the bounds" (an annual but now almost obsolete English ceremony of surveying the boundaries of a parish and marking them at certain points by beating with boughs); the western confines of China; within the confines of our subject. The distinctions between these two words are not always apparent. Not without exceptions, however, bounds usually indicates a point of view from within, and suggests restriction; confines, a point of view either from within or without, and suggests enclosure; as, the book passes beyond the bounds of decency; "as many as thirty bonfires could be counted within the whole bounds of the district" (Hardy); to approach, after a long absence, the confines (not the bounds) of one's own country; to remain within the confines of one's estate. End (as here compared: see also END, 2; INTENTION) applies usually to one of the two uttermost limits or extremes of a thing; this use is chiefly found in idiomatic phrases (as, to travel to the ends of the earth), but it occurs also in reference to either extreme in an ascending or descending scale, or in a series that progresses from one extreme to its diametrical opposite (as, at one end of the social scale there is the outcast or the pariah; at the other end, the elite). "To sweep away in art all that is . . . fundamentally ugly, whether by being, at the one end, distastefully pretty, or, at the other, hopelessly crude" (H. Ellis). Term (etymologically, an end or bound) applies to a limit in duration or, sometimes, in extent. "Neither history nor archaeology has yet put a term to Roman civilization in London" (Wm. Page). Bourn (archaic or literary) applies to a limit in space, such as a boundary line ("Oft as in their course They came to the field's bourn" —Cowper) or to a limit set as an end, goal, or destination ("a prescience of some bourn, incalculably distant perhaps, to which we are all moving" —Hudson).

Ana. Limitation, restriction, circumscription, confinement (see corresponding verbs at LIMIT): *border, margin, verge, edge, rim, brim, brink: *boundary, border, march, frontier.

limit, v. Limit, restrict, circumscribe, confine come into comparison when they mean to set or prescribe the bounds for a person or thing. Limit usually implies the predetermination of the point in time, in space, in quantity, in capacity, in production, or the like, beyond which the person or thing concerned cannot go or is not permitted to go without suffering a penalty or incurring undesirable consequences; as, to limit the speed of automobiles to 45 miles an hour outside of towns and cities; to limit the time allowed for the erection of a building to one year from the date of the signing of the contract; laws to limit the speed of automobiles on highways; to limit the acreage planted with potatoes; to limit a day's work to eight hours. "The great point . . . on these sacred occasions was for each man to strictly limit himself to half-a-pint of liquor" (Hardy). But limit may also be used with reference to a bound or bounds not predetermined but inherent in a situation or in the nature or constitution of a thing (as, he found that small-town life limited his opportunities; the poor soil limited their means of subsistence), or brought about as desirable by conscious effort or by full choice (as, "medical science knows how to limit these evils" —C. W. Eliot; to limit one's aspirations to the search for the attainable). Restrict, in contrast to limit, suggests a boundary that encircles and encloses rather than a point that ends; the term therefore often applies to that which can be thought of in the terms of the space, territory, or field that it covers: it often also connotes a narrowing or tightening;

thus, a restricted district in a city zoning law is a clearly outlined territory within which only buildings of a certain kind and often of a certain valuation can be erected; so, to restrict the powers of a court; to restrict the freedom of the press; to restrict one's diet on orders from one's physician. "The Bureau was dismembered, its staff dispersed, and its appropriations for research restricted almost to the vanishing point" (V. Heiser). Circumscribe differs from restrict in that its implication of an encircling or enclosing boundary is always clear: consequently, it is often preferred to restrict when the idea of being kept within too small an extent or range is to be stressed (as, "People... think that the emotional range, and the realistic truth, of drama is limited and circumscribed by verse"—T. S. Eliot), or when there is the intent to suggest a distinct, complete, but limited whole and its apartness from all that surrounds it (as, "to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department"—Ch. Just. Marshall; "The world to which they belonged and for which they worked was strictly circumscribed and complete within itself"—Binyon). Confine may imply limitation, restriction, or circumscription, but it usually emphasizes the bounds which must not or cannot be passed: consequently, it often suggests severe restraint or restraints and carries connotations such as those of cramping, fettering, hampering, bottling up, and the like, which are seldom even hinted at in the other words. "Now I am cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in To saucy doubts and fears" (Shak.). "The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed" (Ch. Just. Marshall). "It is not desirable to confine knowledge to whatever can be put into a useful shape for examinations, drawing-rooms, or the still more pretentious modes of publicity" (T. S. Eliot). "We are confined to our senses for perceiving the world" (Karl K. Darrow).

Ana. Define, *prescribe, assign: *restrain, curb, check.

Ant. Widen. Con. *Expand, swell, distend: enlarge, *increase: *extend, lengthen, prolong, protract.

limp. Limp, lippy, flaccid, flabby, flimsy, sleazy (or sleazy) agree in meaning wanting firmness in texture, substance, or structure, and therefore unable to keep its shape or in shape. Limp applies to that which is devoid of the necessary stiffness or firmness to keep it from drooping or losing its original sturdiness or freshness; as, collars limp with perspiration; orandy becomes limp when there is excessive humidity; the intense heat has made him limp; "[Punch's] body was dangling in a most uncomfortable position, all loose and limp, and shapeless" (Dickens). Lippy applies to that which sags, or hangs limply; as, a dog with lippy ears; a lippy veil falls from her hat. Flaccid implies a loss or want of elasticity or resilience and therefore an incapacity to return to its original shape or condition or to keep a desired shape: the term in literal use applies chiefly, but not exclusively, to flesh and other living tissues; as, flaccid muscles; a flaccid stem; "Now, in swift collapse, he was as flaccid as a sick hound and as disgusting as an aged drunkard" (Bennett). In figurative use, the term implies lack of force or energy or substance; as, "the style is... worthless, slipshod, flaccid" (Wilde); "our flaccid culture" (T. S. Eliot). Flabby applies to that which is so soft that it yields readily to the touch or is easily shaken; as, flabby flesh or muscles; flabby cheeks. In figurative use, the term implies the loss or lack of that which keeps a thing up or in good sound condition; it often carries suggestions of spinelessness, spiritlessness, lethargy, or the like; as, "the flabby pseudo-religions in which the modern world is so prolific" (J. W. Krutch); "a few subjects thoroughly taught are infinitely better than a large number of subjects flabbily taught" (A. C. Benson). Flimsy applies to that which by its looseness of structure or insubstantiality of texture cannot hold up under use or strain; as, cheesecloth is flimsy; flimsy paper, such as is often used for typewritten copies; "a wooden seat put together with nails—a flimsy contrivance" (Jeffries). In extended use, the term applies to anything that is so frail or slight as to be without value or endurance; as, a flimsy excuse; a flimsy moral code. Sleazy applies chiefly to flimsy fabrics, but it often differs from flimsy in carrying a suggestion of fraud or of carelessness in its manufacture; as, sleazy calicoes; sleazy silks. In its somewhat rare extended use, the term often emphasizes absence of proper care more than the quality of the work; as, "You shall not conceal the sleazy, fraudulent, rotten hours you have slipped into the piece" (Emerson).

Ana. *Loose, slack, relaxed, lax: limber, *supple.

Con. *Stiff, rigid, inflexible, stark, wooden, tense: *firm, hard, solid: brittle, crisp (see FRAGILE).

limpid. *Clear, transparent, translucent, lucid, pellucid, diaphanous.

Ana. *Pure, sheer: lucid, perspicuous, *clear.

Ant. Turbid. — Con. Muddy, roiled, roily (see TURBID): *obscure, vague, dark: opaque, murky, dusky (see DARK).

line, v. Line, align (or aline), range, array agree in meaning to arrange in a line or in lines. Line, or more often line up, implies setting in single file or in parallel rows; as, to line up prisoners for identification; to line up troops for inspection. Align stresses the bringing of points or parts that should be in a straight line into correct adjustment or into correspondence; as, to align the lenses of a telescope; to align the front and rear wheels of an automobile; to align type in printing. Range stresses orderly or correct disposition, sometimes merely in straight or parallel lines, but more often with the added implication of separation into groups or classes according to some plan or design. "Oaken benches ranged in seemly rows" (Wordsworth). "Thus useful arms in magazines we place, All rang'd in order, and dispos'd with grace" (Pope). Array implies actual formation in order, especially battle order, and therefore suggests full equipment and readiness for action. "There is a great Field-Marshal, my friend, who arrays our battalions; Let us to Providence trust, and abide and work in our stations" (Clough).

Figuratively, these words also come into comparison. Line up stresses organization for unity or singleness of effort; as, to line up the opponents of a measure to achieve its defeat; to line up public opinion in favor of a proposal. Align is commonly used reflexively in its figurative sense and implies falling into line or into a line-up; as, at the beginning of the World War, France, England, and Belgium aligned themselves with Serbia. "So long as the symptoms [of disease] failed to align themselves with any known disorder, they were supposed to be amenable to neighbourly advice" (M. Austin). Range, in precise use, implies putting or falling into a group, such as a class, a party, a rank, or a category: it may suggest alignment but more often it connotes partisanship or alliance, or, when used of things, susceptibility of classification. Consequently it is followed not only by with, but by under, against, around, and the like. "'Tis better to be lowly born, And range with humble livers in content" (Shak.). "The friends my enemies, All ranged against me" (Browning). Array in its figurative sense retains its implication of orderly formation; it sometimes also suggests arrangement in logical or chronological order, or as parts of a design. "These doubts will be arrayed before their minds" (F. W. Farrar). More often, however, it stresses the impressive or imposing character of an opposition and is followed by against; as, several of the best legal minds were arrayed against the prosecution.

Ana. Marshal, arrange, *order.

Con. Derange, disarrange, *disorder, disturb; disperse, dissipate, *scatter.

lineage. *Ancestry, pedigree.

linger. Tarry, wait, *stay, remain, abide.

Ana. *Delay, procrastinate, loiter, dawdle, dally, dilly-dally, lag.

Con. Hurry, hasten, precipitate, quicken, accelerate, *speed.

lingo. *Dialect, vernacular, patois, jargon, cant, argot, patter, slang.

link, v. Connect, relate, associate, *join, combine, unite.

Ana. Concatenate, articulate, *integrate; *tie, bind.

Ant. Sunder. — Con. *Separate, part, sever, divorce.

liquefy. Liquefy, deliquesce, melt, fuse, dissolve, thaw come into comparison as meaning to reduce or to become reduced to a liquid state. Liquefy, the general term, is applicable not only to solids but also to gases; as, to liquefy oxygen and nitrogen; to liquefy a solid mass of ice; jellies liquefy if exposed to the air in a warm room. Deliquesce (always an intransitive verb) implies a slow and gradual liquefying through exposure to the air and the absorption of moisture from it; as, humid heat causes the small quantities of magnesium chloride and calcium chloride in salt to deliquesce and to provide the liquid which compacts the mass. The term is also used in reference to fungi and similar vegetation which show liquefying in their decay; as, "a great display of specimens [of fungi] that presently dried up or deliquesced and stank" (H. G. Wells). Melt in its literal sense implies slow liquefaction, usually but not invariably through heat: the term commonly suggests a softening, a loss of shape, and a running consistency; as, butter melts when not stored in a cool place; to melt wax or maple sugar. In its frequent extended use, melt is applied to masses that are gradually dispersed or grow thinner or more tenuous and finally disappear (as, "the crowd gradually melted away"—Dickens; "mountains beyond mountains melting away into remote sky"—Binyon), or to persons, their emotions, or the like, that grow softer, gentler, or more tender (as, "one whose subdued eyes, Albeit unused to the melting mood, Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees Their medicinal gum"—Shak.; "in Romeo and Juliet the profounder dramatist shows his lovers melting into unconsciousness of their isolated selves"—T. S. Eliot; "I cannot look up to your face. You melt my strength"—A. Lowell), or to tones, colors, sounds, and the like, that have a liquid quality and merge imperceptibly with others (as, "A purer sapphire melts into the sea"—Tennyson; "snow-light cadences Melting to silence"—Keats). Fuse (see also MIX), in this sense once applied generally to metals liquefied by intense heat, is now less common in this application than melt, especially in its past participial form mollen; as, "a quantity of silver which had been fused in a ladle was allowed to solidify" (J. Tyndall). When, however, the union or separation of two things by melting is indicated, fuse, often followed by together or apart, is the preferred term; as, "the strata fused together by heat" (Livingstone); "as by fierce heat, the chains be fused apart" (B. Taylor). Dissolve carries, as the other terms do not, a strong implication of the disintegration of the solid into its smallest component parts: as here compared, it implies the reduction of a solid to a liquid state by immersing it in another liquid, called a solvent, which has the power to reduce it to particles so fine that the solvent and the particles unite and form or seem to form a homogeneous liquid; as, dissolve salt in warm water; alcohol is frequently used in pharmacy to dissolve drugs; silver that dissolves in nitric acid is called silver nitrate. In its extended use, dissolve differs little from melt, except in its occasional stronger implication of breaking up before disappearance (as, "The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces, The solemn temples, the great globe itself . . . shall dissolve And, like this insubstantial pageant faded, Leave not a rack behind"—Shak.) or in its suggestion of the use of something comparable to a solvent (as, "Her heart dissolved in pity for him"—Bennett; relief caused her to dissolve in tears). Thaw is used only in reference to something that is frozen, as ice or snow, or in extended use, to something equally stiff or rigid, such as a cold heart, a cold disposition, or extreme reserve; as, the midday sun has thawed the ice on the roads; "a lady . . . whose very looks would thaw a man more frozen than the Alps" (Shirley); "A native reserve being thawed by this genial consciousness" (N. Hawthorne).

Ant. Solidify; vaporize.

liquid, adj. Liquid, fluid come into comparison both as adjectives meaning composed of particles that move easily and flowingly and change their relative position without any perceptible break in their continuity, and as nouns denoting any substance composed of such particles. Both terms (of either part of speech) imply an opposition to solid, but liquid is the more restricted in its application, for the term implies the flow characteristic of water and refers only to substances which, like water, have a definite volume but no definite form except such as is given by their container and as is readily lost when there is an upset, an overflow, or the like; as, water, fresh milk, various wines, beers, and liquors, and all other drinkables are liquids; oils are found chiefly in a liquid state; blood does not remain liquid long after removal from the blood vessels. Fluid, on the other hand, stresses flowing of any sort, and is applicable not only to all liquids, but also to any gas or gaseous substance which, unlike liquids, has no independent volume or shape; as, fluid air; gas is an aeriform fluid; fluid blood; fluid oils. Fluid is often preferred to liquid when the substance is highly viscous (as, molasses is a fluid substance) or when it represents the form taken by something usually solid but liquefied by melting, dissolving, saturating with water, and the like; as, fluid rock; fluid wax; mud is fluid earth.

Figuratively, fluid is opposed to rigid, fixed, unchangeable; as, " 'open societies' of which the boundaries are fluid or indefinite, such as humanity or even the League of Nations" (S. Alexander); "Emotion, formless, chaotic, fluid in itself" (Loves); "In London all values and all meanings were fluid" (R. Macaulay). Liquid, on the other hand, often implies an opposition to harshness (as, liquid tones; "thy liquid notes that close the eye of day"—Milton) but it sometimes implies transparency or extreme softness or both (as, the air is liquid today; "his liquid glance"—E. Wharton; "with what liquid tenderness she turned and looked back"—Bennett). In financial circles, where both terms are used, fluid implies a floating, and therefore applies to money or funds that are not permanently invested or that are constantly in circulation (as, the fluid gold of international trade); liquid implies a quality or condition of assets that are in the form of money or are easily convertible into money, and applies not only to cash on hand but to securities, properties, and the like; as, liquid assets; liquid securities.

Ant. Solid: vaporous.

list, n. List, table, catalogue, schedule, register, roll, roster, rota, canon, inventory are comparable because they agree in denoting a series of names or of items written down or printed as a memorandum, a record, or a source of information, but, because of wide differences in their range of application, they are not always interchangeable. List is now the most comprehensive and the most widely applicable of these terms; it may or may not imply arrangement, such as in alphabetical, chronological, or other methodical order; it may itemize persons, or objects, or facts, or words, or figures, or the like; as, a grocery list; a list of invited guests; a price list; an engagement list. Table is also widely applicable, but it distinctively implies arrangement in an order that will assist the person who makes use of it in quickly finding the information he desires; consequently, it usually suggests presentation of these items in columns, often, when the items are related or associated with each other, in parallel columns; thus, a table of weights may give in the first column an alphabetical list of the weights of all countries and add in the following columns, directly on a line with each of these names, the place in which it is used, its equivalent in American or British weights, and its equivalent in metric weight; so, a table of contents of a book; a table of logarithms; annuity tables; a timetable of classes or of trains. Catalogue was originally, and is still, though now more rarely, applied to any complete list or enumeration of all instances of a kind; as, a catalogue of the popes; "In the catalogue of the slain the author has followed the example of the greatest ancient poets" (Addison). The term is now used more often of an informative descriptive list of all the books in a library, or of those issued by a publisher or sold by a bookseller, or of all the works of art in a museum, or of all the courses given in a university or college, or the like. Because business, educational, and art catalogues often contain other information of value, the term is gradually losing its etymological meaning of list, although these catalogues have usually for their main object the presentation of complete lists. Schedule was originally applied to a paper annexed to a larger document, such as a will, a lease, a statute, or the like, especially to one giving a list of particulars of a pertinent character which could not be included in the document. "Of which territories, etc. a detailed list is given in the accompanying schedule" (Wellington). Hence, the term is now applied to an itemized statement of particulars, whether it is appended to a bill, statute, or the like, and gives supplementary details (as, Schedule D of the tariff bill) or is separate (as, a schedule of a bankrupt's debts; a schedule of assets and liabilities). Especially in the United States, schedule (see also PROGRAM) is applied to a timetable, as of trains, steamships, classes, or, more particularly, of the various operations in a procedure or in the execution of a project; as, the contractor's schedule for the erection of the court house was carefully followed. Register, in strict use, is applicable only to the official book, parchments, or papers in which are entered from time to time names or items of a specific character, together with pertinent details, for the sake of maintaining a record; as, a register of births; a register of marriages; a register of seamen. Since, however, these entries constitute not only a record but also a list or catalogue, the term often more strongly suggests an official listing or enumeration than a series of entries; as, his name is not in the register of voters;

"Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, which is published yearly, is an alphabetical list of vessels ranked in different classes according to their qualifications" (Young's Naut. Dict.). "He had ascertained, through the registers on the table, that his son-in-law was among the living prisoners" (Dickens). Roll, originally a piece of parchment or paper which can be rolled up and on which something is inscribed, now is applicable to any list, especially official list, of the names of those who belong to a certain group or force; thus, the rolls, in England, designates the official list of solicitors; a muster roll includes the names of all the officers and men of a military body or of a ship's company present or accounted for on the day of muster; a class roll is a list of all students belonging to a class that is usually called each day in order to keep a record of attendance. Roster, which is chiefly but not exclusively a military term, applies strictly to a table containing a roll of officers and men, or sometimes of units, and specifying the order of their rotation in duties, their special assignments, and the like. "You may know the White Hussars by their 'side,' which is greater than that of all the Cavalry Regiments on the roster" (Kipling). Rota is much rarer than roster, its close synonym, but it occasionally occurs in Great Britain, especially in reference to schoolboys. "The senior fag who kept the rota" (T. Hughes). Canon (etymologically, a rule or model) applies only to a list or catalogue, now chiefly of writings, but occasionally of persons, that conform to certain requirements; thus, the sacred canon is a list of the books of the Bible which are accepted as genuine and inspired Holy Scriptures; the Shakespearean canon is a list of the plays and poems which scholars have accepted as written by Shakespeare himself; a canonized saint is one whose name is entered in a canon, or list of persons recognized as saints by the Roman Catholic Church. Inventory is a catalogue of the goods, chattels, and sometimes, real estate (usually with their estimated worth), found in a person's or a corporation's possession at a given time, such as at the person's death or at the time of a stocktaking; as, the merchant makes an inventory of his stock annually on January 15th. In extended use, the term often refers to a list similar in its details to those of a true inventory. "Nothing short of an authentic passion for concrete detail... can give the saving gusto and animation which carry off safely the long inventories of utensils and articles of food and attire in Scott and Defoe" (C. E. Montague).

lists. *Arena, circus, ring, cockpit, court, field, gridiron, diamond, rink.

literature, n. Literature, belles-lettres, the humanities, letters are not, strictly speaking, synonymous terms, for they are rarely interchangeable in idiomatic English. Nevertheless, they come into comparison both when they denote a branch of learning or culture concerned primarily with writings that endure or are likely to endure primarily because of their artistic, as distinguished from their informative, values, and when they designate these writings as an aggregate. Literature (except when it is used comprehensively of the body of writings on a particular subject; as, the literature of medicine) suggests reference to writings that are dominantly imaginative, that emphasize artistry or perfection of form or style, and that give aesthetic pleasure. "The thing that teases the mind over and over for years, and at last gets itself put down rightly on paper—whether little or great, it belongs to Literature" (Sarah O. Jewett). The term belles-lettres stresses absence of utilitarian or informational value more than literature does: it is usually restricted in its reference to literary productions that are read or studied (or are capable of being read or studied) as works of art or as sources of aesthetic delight, rather than because of their documentary or human values; thus, a course in literature may or may not imply consideration of historical values, but a course in belles-lettres implies an emphasis upon appreciation. In some use, belles-lettres (and still more the adjective belletristic) has acquired connotations of lack of solidity or seriousness, or lack of practical value, and is, as a result, applied to literary works which are more distinguished for their artistry than for their enduring emotional or imaginative appeal. For this reason, belles-lettres is preferred to literature when interest in artistic qualities is implied. "Why should a spokesman for belles-lettres...hesitate to go before a group of 'practical' men and talk to them, unashamed, of the 'utilities' of artistic expression?" (S. P. Sherman). The humanities is a term which has an inclusive and a restricted meaning. In the former it is referable to all the branches of learning, or the subject matter of such branches, that are concerned with the human, not merely as distinguished from the supernatural or the natural (that is, the world external to man), but especially as referring to the activities, interests, and progress of man, chiefly as they are recorded in the languages and literature of the past. In a somewhat narrower application, the term often designates Greek and Latin (in Scottish universities, Latin only) languages and literature because, during the Renaissance, interest in these subjects drove philosophy and theology from their position of eminence in the curricula of the universities. In present use, however, the term is often applied to those branches of learning or their subject matter which are not classed under the head of science (pure or applied) and are concerned primarily with human culture, especially as it is manifested in the literature or the classics of any people or age. In distinction from literature and belles-lettres, however, the humanities seldom stresses artistic values or appeal; often, in fact, it definitely implies a historical, as distinguished from an aesthetic, interest in literature. "There do arise three knowledges, Divine Philosophy, Natural Philosophy, and Humane Philosophy, or Humanitie" (Bacon). "Neither would I have you neglect the humanities. I could wish that every one of you...could enjoy in the originals Homer, and Virgil, and Dante, and Rabelais, and Goethe" (F. Pollock). Letters is chiefly, but not exclusively, found in certain idiomatic phrases where it denotes the pursuit or profession of those who produce literature or are learned in the humanities; as, a man of letters; in the republic of letters (that is, in the body composed of enlightened and highly cultured men) there should be no such thing as racial prejudice. "He [Ben Jonson] was a literary artist even more than he was a man of letters" (T. S. Eliot). "It was one of the deepest of his [Richelieu's] concerns...that the State should nourish letters" (Belloe).

lithe, lithesome. Lissome, *supple, limber.

Ana. Slender, slim, slight, *thin: *lean, spare: pliant, pliable, *plastic: nimble, *agile, brisk, spry: graceful, elegant (see corresponding nouns at ELEGANCE). Con. Clumsy, maladroit, *awkward, gauche, inept: *stiff, tense, wooden, inflexible.

litigious. Contentious, quarrelsome, *belligerent, bellicose, pugnacious.

Ana. *Aggressive, militant, assertive: fighting, contending, battling, warring (see CONTEND): suing, pleading, petitioning, praying (see under PRAYER).

little. *Small, diminutive, wee, tiny, minute, miniature.

Ana. *Petty, paltry, puny, trivial, trifling: slight, slim, slender, *thin: *meager, scanty, scrumpy, skimpy.

live, v. 1 Exist, *be, subsist.

Ana. Endure, abide, persist, *continue.

2 *Reside, dwell, sojourn, lodge, stay, put up, stop.

live, adj. *Active, operative, dynamic.

Ana. *Vigorous, energetic, lusty, strenuous: *powerful, potent, forcible, forceful: *effective, efficacious, effectual, efficient.

Ant. Inactive, inert: dormant (as a volcano): defunct (as an institution, journal, or the like).

livelihood. *Living, subsistence, sustenance, maintenance, support, keep, bread.

Ana. *Trade, craft, handicraft, art, profession: *wage or wages, salary, pay, stipend, fee, emolument.

lively, adj. Lively, animated, vivacious, sprightly, gay denote in common, keenly alive. Lively suggests especially briskness, alertness, or energy; as, they spent an hour in lively talk about their respective travels in England and France. "The mate, if lively, is soon aloft" (Scoresby). Animated applies especially to that which is also spirited or bright. "Even the hardest and coldest of his friends...became animated when he took her hand, tried to meet the gay challenge in her eyes and to reply cleverly to the droll word of greeting on her lips" (Cather). "Johnson was in high spirits...talked with great animation and success" (Boswell). Vivacious and (esp.) sprightly suggest greater lightness of spirits or quickness of wit; they are used most commonly of manner or language. "The stuff has sparkle; whatever he [Stevenson] means to convey at the time is being vivaciously put; the wordage is...always witty and winning" (C. E. Montague). "The sprightly Repartees fly about with the Glass" (T. Brown). Gay implies utter carefreeness and exuberant or overflowing spirits. "Wild with joyful expectation, she had there run backwards and forwards some ten times a-day, with an heart light, gay, and independent; looking forward to pleasures untasted and unalloyed, and as free from the apprehension of evil as from the knowledge of it" (Austen).

Ana. *Agile, nimble, brisk, spry: buoyant, effervescent, volatile, expansive, resilient, *elastic: *merry, blithe, jocund, jolly: mirthful, gleeful, hilarious (see corresponding nouns at MIRTH).

Ant. Dull. — Con. *Lethargic, sluggish, torpid: *languid, lackadaisical, listless, languorous: stolid, apathetic, phlegmatic, *impassive: tedious, *irksome, humdrum.

livid. Ashen, ashy, *pale, pallid, wan.

Ana. *Ghastly, grisly, lurid: murky, gloomy, dusky, opaque (see DARK).

Con. Brilliant, *bright, luminous, radiant, lustrous, effulgent, lucent: *intense, vehement.

living, n. Living, livelihood, subsistence, sustenance, maintenance, support, keep, bread, bread and butter are not, as here compared, close synonyms, but they come into comparison because they agree in denoting the means, especially the amount of money or goods, required to keep one fed, housed, clothed, and the like. Living is the general term for this sense, although it now occurs chiefly in specific idiomatic phrases; as, he works hard but he does not earn a living for himself and his family; "I am quite pleased to make my living by what I write, but the attempt to write for my living would be hopeless" (H. Ellis). Livelihood, once not clearly distinguishable from living, in current use often applies either to the trade, profession, craft, or other form of work by means of which one earns his living (as, "Let each man practise one art which is to be his livelihood"—Jowett; often the work one does as a diversion in one's youth turns out to be one's livelihood) or the wages, salary, or income derived from such work (as, to earn an honest livelihood; "Though I must slave for livelihood"—F. P. Adams). Subsistence was also once used as a close synonym of living, but in the course of time the term has acquired distinguishing implications so that it now, especially in sociological and economic language, specifically denotes means sufficient merely to maintain life or to enable one to subsist, and implies an amount of money or supply of goods that provides a person or his family with absolute necessities only, such as the simplest type of home and just enough to eat and wear; as, persons on relief are provided only with subsistence. This sense is found chiefly in two-word phrases such as subsistence wage, a term frequently contrasted with living wage, which implies means whereby adequate food, clothes, living quarters, etc., are provided (as, "it the owners will not pay subsistence wages the nation must"—Shaw), subsistence level (as, "a large proportion of British workers near subsistence level"—The Nation), subsistence rate (as, "beyond the bare subsistence rate"—J. A. Hobson), subsistence homestead, a small home with a plot of arable ground provided by the government of the United States at a very low rental to a destitute family that has no other means of support. Sustenance etymologically implies a sustaining of life. It is often used in place of living when the emphasis is upon the food that is necessary not only to one's existence but to one's well-being; as, he was able to wring only a bare sustenance from his farm. But it is also often used to imply all the necessities of life; as, "It was the fur trade... which gave early sustenance and vitality to the great Canadian provinces" (Irving). Maintenance, as here compared, is more variable in its meanings than the other terms, but most often it denotes either the amount necessary for one's board, lodgings, clothes, and the like, or, as in income tax reports, the amount equivalent to the cost of one's board, lodgings, laundry, and the like, when they form part of one's emolument for services; thus, a husband who has been divorced by his wife is usually required by the court to provide maintenance for her and their children; "Enough to give him books, and a moderate maintainance" (Cibber); how much of this income represents your maintenance? Support, which in general applies to anything or to anyone that provides a means by which a person or thing is kept up or kept from falling, in the sense here considered applies not only to the amount of money that provides maintenance for others, but to the person who provides the means by which others are maintained; as, his earnings are (or he is) the sole support of his family; they look for their support to him. Keep is a colloquial term often used in place of maintenance or sustenance (food) and applicable not only to men but to animals such as horses, dogs, and cows; as, the new hired man is not worth his keep; the keep of a horse is almost equal in cost to that of a man. Bread, or bread and butter, often takes the place of living or sustenance, partly as a result of the use of the former in the Lord's Prayer ("Give us this day our daily bread") but also because the terms denote the simplest necessities of life; as, to make one's bread by one's pen; to earn one's bread and butter by intense toil.

living, adj. Living, alive, quick, animate, animated, vital agree in meaning endowed with or manifesting life. In their primary senses, where life means that character or quality which is peculiar to things that are capable of growth, reproduction, and, often, motion, and which is lost by death, they come very close to each other. Living and alive are opposed to dead and, therefore, are applied to organic bodies which have life as distinguished from those from which life has departed; they are distinguishable chiefly by the fact that alive follows the noun it modifies either directly or as a predicative adjective; as, among living men; among men still alive; all living things; all things which are alive. Quick (now archaic in this sense) is sometimes opposed to inanimate and sometimes to dead; it is applied chiefly to things which have life because it is their nature, as distinguished from those incapable of life; thus, the old English phrase "quick goods" is practically equal to the modern livestock; a "quick fence" is the modern hedge, made up of living plants instead of stakes or stones; "quick wood" is the opposite of dead wood, and therefore signifies the parts of a shrub through which sap still circulates. Animate is opposed to inanimate and is applied to living organic bodies in contrast to dead organic bodies or, especially, to inorganic bodies having no capacity for life; as, the lowest orders of animate things. Animated is opposed to lifeless or inert, and is applied to that which, once devoid of life, becomes alive; as, it is difficult to find out when in the course of evolution inanimate matter became animated. Vital is opposed to mechanical, and is applied chiefly to power, force, energy, motion, or the like, which results naturally from life in distinction from that power, force, etc., which results from purely physical or chemical causes; as, vital functions; a vital, as opposed to a mechanistic, principle.

When these words are applied to things which have not life in the sense defined, they form other groupings. All, however, stress qualities suggestive of life. Living usually suggests continued or continuous existence with no diminution of activity, efficacy, or the like; as, a living language; a living principle; a living force. Alive and vital are very close in their emphasis on abundance of vigor, on capacity for development, or on powers of endurance; both are applicable to persons as well as to things. "His gigantic gusto, his delight in toil and struggle, his superb aliveness" (Mencken). "The provisions of the Constitution... are organic living institutions... Their significance is vital not formal; it is to be gathered... by considering their origin and the line of their growth" (Justice Holmes). Alive and animated often imply the presence of living things in great numbers; as, the stream is alive with trout; "as animated as water under a microscope" (Hardy). Animated, as here compared (see also LIVELY), usually stresses endowment with qualities suggestive of life, especially motion; as, animated pictures; an animated doll. "Perhaps no people has ever been stirred by a great idea till that idea was animated and made memorable by finding its right expression in rhythmical phrase" (Binyon). Quick often, and animate less rarely, imply newness, freshness, fluidity, or responsiveness. "The quick green Of every new leaf on the oldest tree" (J. Freeman). "Thine own heart, quick and enamoured of love and of light" (Binyon).

Ana. Existing, being, subsisting (see BE): *active, live, operative, dynamic.

Ant. Lifeless. — Con. *Dead, defunct, deceased, departed, inanimate.

load, n. Load, burden, freight, cargo, lading are comparable when they mean that which is carried, conveyed, or transported from one place to another, as in a cart, car, or vessel. Load is the most comprehensive of these terms, being referable also to that which is carried by man or horse, as on the back, or in bags; as, the peddler carries a heavy load; the truckman will deliver a load of wood tomorrow; a shipload of grain. Load is also applicable to the quantity or amount carried, as by a wagon, a truck, or by a freight car; thus, in England, a wagon-load (with some local exceptions) is forty bushels of wheat or eighty bushels of oats. Burden (etymologically, that which is borne) is now used in the sense here considered only in idiomatic phrases; as, a ship of 100 tons burden carries a load of 100 tons; a beast of burden is an animal used for carrying loads. In current use the term applies figuratively to something that weighs heavily on one's mind or spirit, such as a care or a responsibility; as, "Bear ye another's burdens" (Galatians vi. 2); he has become a burden to his family. Freight applies to goods or merchandise of any sort in transit, especially long-distance transit, as by ship, railway train, motor truck, or the like; as, the wrecked truck spilled its freight over the road; a freight train (that is, a train all of whose cars carry freight). Cargo applies specifically to the freight carried by a ship; in current use it frequently is preferred to freight when a vessel is the carrier, although often there is no reason why freight should not be used; as, a tramp ship carrying a cargo of grain (or grain as freight); the Italian vessel's cargo of wine. In law, cargo is inapplicable to a shipload of animals or of persons, but in general use the term is often used humorously of persons, whether carried by boat or by train. "Before a train could get to any villadom with a cargo of season-ticket holders it would have to circle about this... woodland" (H. G. Wells). Lading (now chiefly poetic, except in the commercial phrase "bill of lading") applies either to freight or to a cargo.

locality. Locality, district, vicinage, vicinity, neighborhood (or neighbourhood) come into comparison as denoting a more or less definitely circumscribed place or region, especially from the point of view of those who live in it. Locality applies to a region of undefined boundaries, but it usually suggests an area round a center, such as the place where the speaker or writer lives (as, he no longer resides in this locality) or a particular place remarkable for some event, some landmark, or the like (as, "the deliverer is to be sought in the locality nearest to the chief scene of the invasion"—Dean Stanley). District usually applies to a locality that has clearly defined boundaries determined by the nation, state, county, or town for administrative, electoral, or other purposes; as, the new representative of the Fifth Congressional District; federal judicial districts; a police district; a postal district. In a less specific, but in this instance more pertinent, sense district is often applied to a locality with reference to some of its most obvious or clearly defined characteristics rather than to the exact area it covers; as, the agricultural districts of the United States; the Lake District of England; the mining district of Pennsylvania; the business district, or the theater district, of a city. Vicinage, a once common but now increasingly rare word, applies particularly to a group of towns or villages which lie so close together that the entire locality is regarded by the inhabitants and others as a geographical unit; as, the regiment was recruited from this vicinage; there is no first-rate doctor in the vicinage. The term has come to apply somewhat more vaguely to the territory near to the speaker's or writer's home or to the inhabitants of that territory; as, "the French ladies in my vicinage" (Walpole); he gained the good will of this vicinage. Vicinity never loses its basic implication of nearness in this sense but, since it always suggests a distinct point of view, it applies only to the locality that is very near from that point of view; as, there are no ponds in this vicinity; the wealthy business men of New York usually have their homes in the vicinity of the metropolis. Neighborhood usually carries an implied reference to one's neighbors (etymologically, nigh dwellers): in very precise use; therefore, the term is preferred to vicinity, which it closely resembles in denotation, when the locality referred to is so near that one knows it and its inhabitants rather well; as, there is no one of that name in this neighborhood; neighborhood parties; she is on good terms with the entire neighborhood. However, with a growing tendency of the people of one country to think of those inhabiting near-by countries as neighbors, the term is often less restricted in its application than formerly; as, the country must be on guard against the establishment of hostile bases in its neighborhood.

logical. Logical, analytical (or analytic), subtle (or subtle) are here considered only as applied to persons, their minds, their mental habits or processes, and as meaning having or showing skill in thinking or reasoning. They are often used interchangeably or without clear distinction, but there are grounds in good usage for employing them with precision. Logical may imply the power to think according to the rules of logic and therefore in an orderly fashion; more often, however, it suggests the power to impress others that clearness of thought, soundness of reasoning, and freedom from bias underlie one's arguments, one's decisions, one's policies, and the like. "He had... the logical as opposed to the intuitive temper. He distrusted emotion for which he could not find a rational basis" (C. E. Montague). Analytical stresses the power to simplify either that which is complex or complicated, as by separating it into its constituent parts, or that which is chaotic or confused, by organization that shows the relation of the details to each other and the whole. In derogatory use it sometimes, especially when qualified by over, implies a tendency to multiply subdivisions; but in complimentary use, it commonly connotes a power to systematize, clarify, and interpret, as distinguished from the power to create or invent. "The early eighteenth century had arrived at an over-analytical dryness of mind" (Babbitt). "His [Noah Webster's] mind was analytical rather than constructive" (H. E. Scudder). Subtle (see also SUBTLE, 2) stresses the power to penetrate below the surface and to perceive fine distinctions and delicate, almost imperceptible, relations. Often its use implies a criticism, such as of being hard to follow, because of being overrefined. "John Donne... one of the most subtle... intellects that ever, before or since, expressed itself through the medium of verse" (Lowes). Usually, however, it connotes extraordinary skill in reasoning or in analysis. "That is a point of view which... would hardly have escaped the subtle intellect of the Greeks" (G. L. Dickinson). "The actual facts have required for... their interpretation the most subtle speculations of modern science" (Justice Holmes). Ana. Cogent, *valid, sound, telling, convincing: *clear, lucid, perspicuous: *rational, reasonable: inferential, illative, ratiocinative (see under INFERENCE). Ant. Illogical. — Con. Intuitive, *instinctive: *irrational, unreasonable: fallacious, sophistical, casuistical (see under FALLACY).

lonesome. Lonely, lone, *alone, solitary, forlorn, lorn, desolate.

Ana. & Con. See those at LONELY.

long, v. Long, yearn, hanker, pine, hunger, thirst come into comparison as meaning to have a strong and urgent desire for something. One longs (with for or an infinitive) when one wishes for something with one's whole heart or with great earnestness and, in some cases, strives to gain it so far as lies within one's power; often, however, the word is used when the desire is for that which is exceedingly difficult or impossible to attain; as, "Oh that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for!" (Job vi. 8); "ever have I long'd to slake My thirst for the world's praises" (Keats). One yearns (with for, after, towards, to, or an infinitive) when one regards or desires something with eager, restless, often tender or passionate, longing; as, "But Enoch yearn'd to see her face again" (Tennyson); "Then with teeming heart I yearned, O Angel of the Schools, towards Christ with thee!" (W. H. Mallock); "She gazed into his faded blue eyes as if yearning to be understood" (Conrad). One hankers (for or after something) when one is possessed with or made uneasy by a desire because of the urgency of a physical appetite (as, to hanker for strawberries, peaches, and other fresh fruits in the winter time), or because of a passion such as greed, lust, ambition, covetousness, or the like (as, "She... still hankered, with a natural hankering, after her money"—Trollope; "[Octavian's] hankering from the start after the office of tribune"—Buchan), or because it is, sometimes only for the time being, beyond one's reach or one's powers (as, "to wean your minds from hankering after false Germanic standards"—Quiller-Couch; "Too long a siege of the familiar [in poetry]... sets us hankering after the strange"—Lowes). One pines (with for, after, or an infinitive) when one languishes or grows weak through longing for something or gives oneself up to fruitless longing for it; as, "We look before and after, And pine for what is not" (Shelley); "Harry Temple was wise enough to give up pining after what he could not get" (Besant & Rice). One hungers, literally, for that which will satisfy his urgent craving for nourishment or for a given kind of food essential to his physical well-being; one thirsts, literally, for that which will satisfy his urgent need for liquid or drink; as, to hunger for fresh vegetables; to thirst for cool fresh water. In their extended senses, one hungers or thirsts (with for, after, or an infinitive) when one longs for something with the full force of one's being or works or struggles with all one's powers for something which will satisfy a compelling craving, especially of mind or soul; as, "My soul thirsteth for thee" (Psalms lxxiii. 1); "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled" (Matthew v. 6); "She hungered for a new environment in which to expand her new powers" (H. Ellis). But thirst and hunger may suggest a driving desire for that which will satisfy one's greed, revenge, etc.; as, to hunger for wealth or for power; to thirst for blood; to thirst to begin the combat.

3 Also look for. *Expect, hope, await.

Ana. *Foresee, foreknow, anticipate, divine.

look, n. 1 Look, sight, view, glance, glimpse, peep, peek, coup d'oeil are here compared as meaning both the act of seeing something and the thing that is seen. Look (see also APPEARANCE) implies the direction of one's eyes to a thing or the use of one's power of vision; as, let me have a look at the patient; "One dying look he upward cast" (Scott); he did not vouchsafe her one kind look. When applied to the thing seen, the impression produced tends to be stressed; as, judging by the look of his rash, he has scarlet fever; "The look of his face as he spoke was by no means pleasant" (Trollope). Sight, on the other hand, so strongly implies reference to the object that is seen that it suggests reception of an image by the visual powers or presentation to the sense of sight rather than a conscious use of that sense. Thus, when the term denotes the act (sometimes the power) of seeing, one takes a look at something which catches his sight; one has far sight who sees things at a great distance; "The litter is set down stage in full sight of the audience" (Millay); at first sight, he seems unkempt. When the term denotes the thing that is seen, qualifying words or phrases are necessary to suggest its character, appearance, or the effect it produces; as, there is no sight in the world equal to it; a goodly sight; a disagreeable sight; "The earth, and every common sight" (Wordsworth). View, as here compared, especially when it denotes the act of seeing, was once used in place of look when a careful looking over or inspection was implied (as, "Surveying Nature with too nice a view"—Dryden) but this sense prevails in current use only when the term implies the exercise of the mental rather than the physical vision or an attempt to comprehend something beyond the range of the physical vision; as, "bring the buried ages back to view" (Gray); "The scientific view of the world is not indifferent to quality or value. It seeks to find law, harmony, uniformity in nature" (Inge). More often, when seeing through the eyes is suggested, view takes the place of sight in either sense, with, however, a stronger implication of a directed or fixed gaze; as, "Far better scenes than these had blest our view" (Gray); "Thy dales, and hills, are fading from my view" (Keats); a house that affords a view of the ocean; the view from this hill is beautiful; trees that intercept the view. Glance, in what is probably the earliest of its senses, denotes something which is seen as a sudden flash or gleam, or the presence or movement of which is recognized by a swift sudden flash; as, "With winged expedition Swift as the lightning glance" (Millon); "Each sword's bright glance, seem'd summons from their fate" (Stirling). It is in this sense that "a glance from the eye" is often to be interpreted, especially in older writings (as, "Dart not scornful glances from those eyes, To wound thy lord"—Shak.); but the transition in sense from the flash that is seen to the quick look that is given to a thing (the chief modern sense) is not clearly marked. "Lift our heads to heaven, And never more abase our sight so low As to vouchsafe one glance unto the ground" (Shak.). "A glance satisfied him of the hopelessness of the struggle" (J. R. Green). Glimpse (which is etymologically akin to glimmer and glitter) also in an early (but not necessarily its earliest) sense applied to something seen as a flash or a gleam; as, "No dear glimpse of the sun's lovely face, Strikes through the solid darkness of the place" (Cowley); "a glimpse of the moon showed the dark and huge tower" (Scott). This sense is now rare except in poetry, for the word in current usage commonly implies a brief view of a thing or, even more often, as much of it as may be taken in at a glance; as, "I did indeed for a brief evening obtain a glimpse of the richness and still beauty of an English harvest" (Jefferies); "You remember I had a glimpse of him once" (Conrad). Peep and peek are not clearly distinguishable in meaning, but peep is generally regarded as more dignified or less childish. When they denote the act of looking, both terms imply an attempt to see what is hidden or concealed, or what can be only furtively watched, as through a hole or a crevice, through half-shut eyes, or the like; as, to take a peep (or peek) through a keyhole. When, however, they denote something which is seen by peeping or peeking, peep seems to be the favored word; as, "You've only seen a peep through the curtain" (H. B. Stowe); "none of these men has so far written a popular book of peeps into the fairyland of Reality" (T. S. Eliot). Coup d'oeil, a French phrase literally meaning "a stroke of the eye," has often been used in English both in place of glance (a quick look) and glimpse (what can be seen in a glance); as, "All this you have at one coup d'œil in entering the garden" (Gray); "The coup d'œil of the Brussels opera-house did not strike Mrs. O'Dowd as being so fine as the theatre in Fishamble Street, Dublin" (Thackeray).

Ana. Gazing or gaze, staring or stare (see GAZE): scrutiny, inspection, examination (see under SCRUTINIZE).
